PEOPLE v. CRIMM.

Cr. 4365.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 28, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 26, 1942.

1. Homicide ⇐250

In prosecution of inmate of prison for the murder of another inmate, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Stipulations ⇐14(11)

In murder prosecution wherein defendant's counsel and district attorney stipulated at beginning of trial that female members of panel should be excused and defendant also stated in response to question that it was satisfactory to be tried before jury on which there would be no women, defendant could not, after conviction, challenge the jury on ground that there were no women on jury.

3. Criminal law ⇐1086(10)

Where several defendants were tried together for murder, and there were numerous recesses, and when court would reconvene judge would inquire if it was stipulated that jurors were all present and two or more of counsel so stipulated on each occasion, appellant was not entitled to reversal of conviction on ground that because his counsel made audible stipulation on only three occasions, record was silent on whether jury ever did return after any particular recess, where entire jury was present at all stages and nowhere was it charged that jury was absent when its presence was required.

4. Criminal law ⇐720(9)

In murder prosecution, prosecuting officer was free to discuss conflict in two stories related by defendant, one implicating three others and himself and the other implicating only himself, and to advance any reasonable motive therefor.

5. Criminal law ⇐1166½(1)

Where defendant in murder prosecution at first related story implicating himself and three others, fact that during recess defendant first related to defense counsel other than his own the story that he alone had perpetrated the homicide did not require reversal, where, before reconvening of court, defendant's own counsel was likewise so advised, and court upon being informed of defendant's change of testimony took every precaution to protect him from pursuing an ill-advised course.

6. Constitutional law ⇐268

Where defendant in murder prosecution at first related story implicating himself and three others but later declared that he alone murdered deceased, and at all times defendant had advice and assistance of counsel and court admonished defendant, the circumstances surrounding revised story, which he first related to defense counsel other than his own during a recess, did not suggest a denial of "due process of law."

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Raymond T. Coughlin, Judge.

Steve Crimm was convicted for murder, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; HOUSER, J., not participating.

George W. Artz, Jr., and Benjamin D. Frantz, both of Sacramento, and Roy Daily, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and J. Q. Brown, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The appellant Crimm and three other inmates of Folsom Prison were jointly charged with the murder of one Fred E. Smith, also an inmate, in an information filed by the district attorney of Sacramento County. Each defendant entered a plea of not guilty. Early in the trial Crimm's motion to change his plea to one of guilty to a charge of manslaughter was denied. At the conclusion of a protracted trial the jury returned separate verdicts finding Crimm guilty of murder of the first degree, without recommendation, and finding each of the three codefendants not guilty. Crimm prosecutes this appeal from the judgment imposing the death penalty and from the order denying a new trial.

[1] The deceased, an elderly inmate, was found dead on December 28, 1940, in his cabin on "flower garden hill," a portion of the prison premises where he was engaged in gardening. His head and body had many lacerations and knife wounds, which the prison doctor testified had caused death. Early in the trial Crimm took the stand as a prosecution witness and related a story that implicated him and the codefendant Ferrow as "look-outs" and codefendants Freeman and Walker as the actual perpetrators of the homicide. He declared that the four of them met pursuant to previous agreement and proceeded toward the deceased's cabin for the purpose of permitting two of the group to settle certain grievances with deceased. Crimm and Ferrow assertedly remained near the cabin while the other two approached and entered the cabin. Crimm testified that he heard scuffling in the cabin. He approached the cabin, peered into it, and saw the deceased on the floor covered with blood. His assailants stood near him and a "bloody axe" lay on the floor. The four left the scene, and Crimm testified, they exchanged trousers shortly thereafter to facilitate the disposition of those that were blood-spattered. In narrating this version of the homicide, Crimm admitted that he had engaged in an earlier conversation with Ferrow as to how deceased could be "gotten rid of" and that he had "an idea" why they went to the deceased's cabin on the day of the homicide. Each of the three codefendants took the witness stand in his own defense and denied participating in the murder. In addition, defendant Walker repudiated an earlier confession to the warden on the ground that it was made solely to ascertain the effect of Crimm's story to the warden implicating the four defendants.

It would serve no useful purpose to narrate a number of circumstances tending to support the appellant's first version of the homicide. The jury by its several verdicts convicting the appellant alone and acquitting the codefendants apparently rejected that version and accepted as true appellant's second version, given at a later point in the trial, wherein he declared that he alone, unassisted by others, had murdered the deceased. On the last day of the trial, Crimm recalled as a witness for the defendant Freeman, took the stand and freely admitted that he alone had perpetrated the murder as the result of a dispute with the deceased over a narcotic deal. He repudiated his first version of the homicide and exonerated his three codefendants of any knowledge of or participation in the killing.

After deliberating more than five hours the jury returned verdicts finding Crimm guilty as charged and exonerating the several codefendants. There is no merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support Crimm's conviction. Aside from the innocence or guilt of the others, either of Crimm's versions of the homicide points to his guilt as a principal in the death of the deceased. Whatever confusion arises from his conflicting stories does not serve to establish his innocence.

[2] Likewise without merit is the contention that "the jury was not a lawful jury" because made up of men alone. In so contending, appellant concedes that "all of the reported decisions seem diametrically opposed to the theory" advanced by him. Examination of the record discloses that at the beginning of the trial it was stipulated between the several counsel representing the defendants and the district attorney that all female members of the panel should be excused and that the jury should be made up of male members only because of the probable nature of the testimony. In addition to the stipulation of counsel, each defendant personally consented to be tried by a jury without women. In response to a question of the trial court whether it is "satisfactory to you and do you desire to be tried before a jury upon which there will be no women," the appellant Crimm responded, "It is." Under the circumstances, appellant may not now successfully challenge the jury.

[3] It is next contended that the record fails to disclose that the jury was present at all stages of the trial. There were numerous recesses during the trial. When the court would reconvene the trial judge would inquire if it was stipulated that the jurors were all present and in their places. Two or more counsel so stipulated on each occasion. Because appellant's counsel made an audible stipulation on only three occasions, it is argued that "the record is entirely silent upon the matter of whether or not the jury ever did return after any particular recess." Two or more counsel, however, did stipulate to the presence of the entire jury, and the entire jury was present at all stages of the proceedings. Nowhere is it charged that the jury or any part thereof was absent at any time when its presence was required.

[4] There is neither error nor prejudice in that part of the district attorney's closing argument challenged by the appellant. The prosecuting officer was free to discuss the conflict in the two stories related by appellant and to advance any reasonable motive therefor.

[5, 6] The fact that during a recess of court appellant first related to defense counsel other than his own the story that he alone had perpetrated the homicide does not require a reversal. Before the reconvening of the court his own counsel was likewise so advised. The court upon being informed of appellant's change of testimony took every precaution to protect him from pursuing an ill-advised course. The court admonished the appellant in the following manner: "Now, you understand, Mr. Crimm, that you are now testifying in the case where you are accused of the crime of murder, and if you make any statements, they must be freely and voluntarily; if you give any testimony here, it must be freely and voluntarily, with the understanding that you are now on trial for the murder of the deceased in this case. And anything that you say, of course, would be considered by this Jury in the matter of determining your innocence, as well as by the Jury in the event that they find that you are guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree; it would also be considered by the jury in determining the amount of punishment that you would receive. Now you have your counsel, Mr. Artz, who has been appointed by this Court, and you have been accorded all of the rights that the law provides for a man charged with crime. I would suggest that you be very careful, that you tell the truth, that you be not guided by anything except the absolute truth, and aside from that, you are not required to testify against yourself unless you so desire."

In the face of this advice by the court the appellant proceeded to relate the story that implicated him as the sole perpetrator of the murder. He testified further that he had no desire to see innocent persons suffer and that his change of story was entirely voluntary and not the result of fear or duress. Appellant's counsel cross-examined him with respect to the new story and at no time requested a continuance to permit further consultation between client and counsel. At all times appellant had the advice and assistance of counsel and the circumstances surrounding the revised story in no way suggests, as contended, "a denial of due process of law."

An examination of the entire record reveals nothing in the rulings on the evidence or in the giving or refusing of instructions that requires a reversal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BEKINS VAN LINES, Inc., v. JOHNSON, State Treasurer.

Sac. 5508.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 16, 1942.

Rehearing Granted Feb. 13, 1942.

1. Automobiles ⇐98

The phrase "gross receipts from operation of motor vehicles" as used in statute imposing a license fee for transportation of property on state highway, based on a percentage of the gross receipts from the operation of motor vehicles, is plain, needs no interpretation and is intended to be limited to the transportation activities of a company which might be engaged in warehousing, selling, or other business not strictly related to transporting goods or persons. St. 1933, pp. 928, 930–933, 936, §§ 1(a, d), 4–6, 9, 14.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Gross Receipts from Operation of Motor Vehicles".

2. Automobiles ⇐98

The statute imposing license fee for transportation of property by motor vehicle on state highways, based on a percentage of the "gross receipts from the operation of motor vehicles", is not limited in its application to that proportion of the gross receipts from operation of motor vehicles which is derived from the actual use of the motor vehicles on public streets and highways, but included activities preparatory to loading and unloading of vehicles, and from which it was claimed that at least 50% of gross proceeds from the operation of vehicles was derived. St.1933, pp. 928, 930–933, 936, §§ 1(a, d), 4–6, 9, 14.

3. Constitutional law ⇐70(1)

In construing a statute, court may not supply any language which the legislature must be deemed to have omitted intentionally.

4. Automobiles ⇐73

The Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act imposing license fee for transportation of property by motor vehicle on state highways, based on a percentage of the gross receipts from the operation of motor vehicles, is not unconstitutional as "discriminatory" as applied to a van company which derived at least 50% of the proceeds of transportation from services preparatory to loading and unloading the vehicles. St. 1933, pp. 928, 930–933, 936, §§ 1(a, d), 4–6, 9, 14.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Discriminatory".

5. Automobiles ⇐98

The fact that in determining the fixed rate to be charged for transportation operations or services, the Railroad Commission computed that 40 per cent. of transportation operations was attributable to accessorial services, was not a factor bearing on the legislative intent in adopting definition of the phrase "gross receipts from operation" as used in the statute imposing a license tax for the transportation of property by motor vehicle on the state highways, based on a percentage of the gross receipts from the operation of the motor vehicles. St.1933, pp. 928, 930–933, 936, §§ 1(a, d), 4–6, 9, 14; St. 1935, p. 878, § 10.

6. Automobiles ⇐65

Though the license tax imposed by the Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act is not, strictly speaking, a so-called "in lieu tax", it may be considered in the nature of an in lieu tax, in view of the statutory provisions limiting the total taxes payable on property usable in the business of transportation, including license taxes, to five per cent. of gross receipts from operation as defined by the act. St.1933, pp. 928, 930–933, 936, §§ 1(a, d), 4–6, 9, 14.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "In Lieu Tax".

7. Automobiles ⇐98

A van company was properly taxed under the Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act on its intracity pickup and delivery service in connection with its intercity hauls as distinguished from its strictly intracity business, notwithstanding that the act provides that it does not apply to motor vehicles operating exclusively within incorporated cities or towns. St.1933, pp. 928, 930–933, 936, §§ 1(a, d), 4–6, 9, 14.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Suit by the Bekins Van Lines, Inc., against Charles G. Johnson, as State Treasurer, to recover additional taxes assessed under the Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act, and paid under protest. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

For prior opinion, see 114 P.2d 684.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and R. L. Chamberlain and Adrian A. Kragen, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff sued to recover additional taxes assessed for the years 1935 and 1936 under the provisions of the California Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act (Stats. 1933, p. 928, as amended Stats. 1935, p. 2176; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1937, Act 5130d), and paid under protest. The court rendered judgment for the defendant and the plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff was and is engaged in the business of transporting property for hire over the public highways of the state by motor vehicle and was therefore taxable for the years involved pursuant to the provisions of said act. The act is entitled,

"An act imposing a license fee or tax for the transportation of persons or property for hire or compensation upon the public streets, roads and highways in the State of California by motor vehicle." It requires operators of motor vehicles within the state engaging in the business of transporting persons or property over any public highways within the state for compensation or hire to obtain a license. The operator is required by section 4 to make a monthly report "showing the gross receipts from operation of said operator for the preceding calendar month." The section also provides that a "license tax equal to three per cent of gross receipts from operation" shall be assessed, payable monthly, § 5. Section 6 provides that every operator must keep an accurate record of all gross receipts from operation. Section 9 provides that if the total taxes paid by any operator, including license and all other taxes on property used exclusively in the business of transporting persons or property for hire over the public highways of the state exceed five per cent of the gross receipts from operation of such operator in this state, the difference between the amount paid and five per cent is credited on license taxes thereafter accruing and the balance refunded. Section 14 provides that the act does not apply to motor vehicles operating exclusively within incorporated cities or towns or operating between incorporated cities or towns where no portion of the public highway outside of the corporate limits of the cities or towns is traversed.

Section 1(a) provides that the word "operator" shall include all persons or corporations who operate motor vehicles upon any public highway in this state and thereby engage in the transportation of persons or property for hire or compensation either directly or indirectly.

Section 1(d) reads: "The term 'gross receipts from operation' shall include all receipts from the operation of such motor vehicle or motor vehicles beginning and ending entirely within this State and a proportion based upon the proportion of the mileage within this State to the entire mileage over which such business is done of gross receipts of such operator on all business passing through, into or out of this State, or partly within and partly without this state."

In its return for the years 1935 and 1936 to the Board of Equalization the plaintiff reported its gross receipts from all transportation business in the state exclusive of hauls excepted by section 14 of the act. In said returns, however, the plaintiff claimed as deductions forty per cent of the gross receipts which it computed was derived from loading and unloading operations, also additional sums derived from pick-up and delivery service within municipalities. The Board of Equalization disallowed deductions of $25,533.32 for loading and unloading operations and $1,010.68 for pick-up and delivery service on the 1935 returns; and $25,570.28 loading and unloading operations, and $1,400 pick-up and delivery service on the 1936 returns. It assessed an additional tax of $2,016.63 for those years, which the plaintiff paid under protest.

It is the plaintiff's contention that inasmuch as the Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act was formulated and enacted for the purpose of raising revenue for construction of public highways (In re Bush, 6 Cal.2d 43, 56 P.2d 511; Bacon Service Corporation v. Huss, 199 Cal. 21, 29, 248 P. 235; Valley Motor Lines, Inc., v. Riley, 23 Cal.App.2d 208, 73 P.2d 288), only that portion of the gross receipts which is derived from actual transportation activities over the highways is subject to the tax of three per cent on "gross receipts from operation." No deduction was claimed by the plaintiff for the loading and unloading time consumed between the truck and the sidewalk. The plaintiff argues that the definition contained in section 1(d) confines the word "operation" to the actual transporting of the goods over the public highways, including sidewalk loading and unloading, as distinguished from the loading and unloading of such goods between the sidewalk and the house. The record shows that whenever packing and crating labor was required as distinct from dismantling and moving furniture and goods between the house and the sidewalk preparatory to loading and unloading, a separate charge was made and the paid charges for such labor were not included by the Board of Equalization in the gross receipts subject to the tax. But the plaintiff claims that it should be allowed a deduction for a proper proportion of the gross receipts which represents the revenue from operations between the sidewalk and the house estimated by it at about 56 per cent; also that it should be permitted deductions for the amounts separately indicated on its way bills received from pick-up and delivery service within municipalities. In intercity hauls of small consignments the plaintiff found it more convenient to pick up and deliver with the use of smaller trucks between the point of pick-up and delivery and the larger truck or van which was to transport or which had transported the goods over the public highways. In other intercity hauls the van or truck received and discharged the load directly at the door. The plaintiff contends that receipts from such separate pick-up and delivery service within municipalities in connection with intercity hauls should be excepted from assessment under the act because that service is conducted entirely within municipalities and does not employ any part of the public highways.

[1-3] Both sides concede that there is no decided case which directly involves the point considered under the first claimed deduction. However, we are of the opinion that the plain language of the act determines the issue. This court has heretofore held that "gross receipts from operation" is plain language which requires no interpretation. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 176 Cal. 183, 167 P. 845. See, also, McHenry v. Alford, 168 U.S. 651, 666, 18 S.Ct. 242, 42 L.Ed. 614; State v. United Electric Light & Water Co., 90 Conn. 452, 97 A. 857. In the case of Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, supra [176 Cal. 183, 167 P. 847], somewhat similar provisions adopted in section 14 of article XIII, applying to public service corporations, were denominated "perfectly plain, unequivocal language," and the contention that "gross receipts" meant "gross earnings" was rejected. It was held that the language did not contemplate any deduction from the "gross receipts from operation." In the case of McHenry v. Alford, supra [168 U.S. 651, 18 S.Ct. 248, 42 L.Ed. 614], a similar phrase was said to mean "earnings [receipts] which arise because of its operation," without any undesignated exceptions. Likewise in the present case "gross receipts from operation" must be taken in its plain sense without limitation or deduction save as expressly modified by the Legislature. The only modification pertinent in this case is that contained in the definition of "gross receipts from operation," which adds to the foregoing quoted phrase the words "of such motor vehicle or motor vehicles beginning and ending entirely within this State * * *," etc. The plaintiff seeks to have this Court interpret the legislative language as applying only to that proportion of the gross receipts from its operation of motor vehicles which is derived from the actual use of the truck on the public streets and highways. "Gross receipts from operation of motor vehicles" is language sufficiently plain. It was undoubtedly intended to be limited to the transportation activities of a company which might also be engaged in warehousing, selling, or other business not strictly related to transportation of goods or persons. The plaintiff concedes that the words "operation of motor vehicles" as used in the definition include loading and unloading activities at the sidewalk. However, the goods must be taken to and from the sidewalk as an inseparable preparatory activity connected with the loading and unloading operations. We therefore fail to see how the plaintiff can be excused from the payment of a proportion of the license tax based on its claim that more than fifty per cent of gross receipts from operation of motor vehicles was derived from time devoted to such preparatory activities. The preparatory activities sought to be excepted are just as much a part of and essential to transportation, and therefore to operation of motor vehicles, as are actual loading and unloading operations which are also preparatory to the actual rolling of the vehicle along the highways. To adopt the plaintiff's suggestion would be to add to the language of the definition a limitation which the Legislature did not express and which it must be deemed it did not intend. If the Legislature intended to exclude from "operation" as defined every incidental service and activity customary and essential in the matter of transporting goods for compensation and hire, it could easily have said so. By failure to use any such limiting words the Legislature indicated its intention of not so limiting or circumscribing the meaning or scope of the act. In re Bush, supra. Under the applicable rules of construction this court may not supply any language which the Legislature must be deemed to have omitted intentionally.

[4, 5] There is no constitutional objection urged or which could be urged to the application of the plain language of the act. All of the required safeguards have been afforded by the Legislature in the exercise of the taxing power. No unreasonable discriminations are involved and in the absence of any such unlawful classification the act is constitutional. Bacon Service Corporation v. Huss, supra. It is not urged that imposition of a tax equal to a percentage of gross receipts from operation of the business of transportation including all of its connected incidental operations and so-called "accessorial" services or operations for the purposes stated in the act is not a proper exercise of the taxing power. The fact that in determining the fixed rate to be charged for transportation operations or services the Railroad Commission of the state computed that 40 per cent of transportation operations was attributable to accessorial services (see § 10, Highway Carriers Act, Stats.1935, p. 878; Deering's Gen.Laws.1937, Act 5129a) is not a factor bearing upon the legislative intent in adopting the definition here under consideration. The fact that the Legislature in the present act did not distinguish between actual rolling on the public highways and any accessorial services is an argument that it intended no such distinction.

[6] No special significance may be given the fact that the license tax under the present act is not, strictly speaking, a so-called "in lieu" tax, in so far as any applicability of the case of Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, supra, is concerned. It is true the license tax here involved is not an all purpose tax and that ad valorem taxes are assessable; but it may be considered in the nature of an "in lieu" tax because of the provisions of section 9 of the act which limit the total taxes payable on property usable in the business of transportation, including license taxes, to five per cent of gross receipts from operation as defined by the act.

[7] Nor may any distinction be made by the plaintiff on its returns between intercity hauls which require for convenience an intracity pick-up and delivery service, and those which do not require such service in the convenient method of initiating or terminating such intercity transportation. The plaintiff in this connection relies on Pioneer Express Co. v. Riley, 208 Cal. 677, 284 P. 663. In that case the plaintiff's activities were confined exclusively to intercity hauls. Another company, formerly a competitor of the plaintiff, abandoned all intercity activities and confined itself to intracity business exclusively, including the pick-up and delivery service required by the plaintiff. It appeared that the plaintiff in that case in good faith did not engage in intracity pick-up and delivery service as part of its intercity hauls. It was held that it had paid its tax in full, based on the report of intercity operations as conducted by it. No invalidity may be said to attach by reason of the fact that the plaintiff here is taxed on its intracity pick-up and delivery service in connection with its intercity hauls as distinguished from its strictly intracity business. In re Bush, supra. The trial court in the present case properly concluded that receipts from all hauls which originated in one city for transportation over the public highways or which terminated in a city after such transportation should be treated without distinction as taxable gross receipts from operation.

It is shown that receipts from intracity business as excepted from the act were not included in the computation of gross receipts from operation as defined by the act. Nor were charges for labor furnished for the purpose of packing and crating goods, or warehousing, included in the gross receipts subject to taxation. All exceptions and limitations provided by the act were contemplated in the additional assessment paid under protest by the plaintiff. The trial court correctly concluded that the assessment of the additional tax was in accordance with the statute.

DISTRICT BOND CO. v. POLLACK et al. (ZASLAW et al., Interveners).

L. A. 17217.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 26, 1942.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐519(1)

An assessment against realty represented by a sewer bond created a "lien" against the realty, binding upon all subsequent owners until the bond was paid, and hence purchaser of realty acquired the property subject to the assessment lien already existing against it. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8199, §§ 63, 66, 75.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Lien".

2. Municipal corporations ⇐579

The owner in possession of realty, who was not made a party to proceeding to foreclose sewer bond outstanding against the realty and who had neither actual nor constructive notice of the proceeding, could not be divested of his ownership by such proceeding.

3. Municipal corporations ⇐579

Where commissioner's deed issued pursuant to proceeding to foreclose sewer bond outstanding against realty was ineffective to pass to grantee full title to the property because owner of realty in possession was not made a party to proceeding and had no notice either actual or constructive thereof, the grantee, who had procured assignment of commissioner's certificate for value, thereby obtained the assessment lien, represented by sewer bond, which continued to exist against the realty. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8199, §§ 63, 66, 75.

4. Municipal corporations ⇐579

Where holder of commissioner's deed issued pursuant to proceeding to foreclose sewer bond, acting not as a volunteer but in order to protect his interest in the realty, paid delinquent and current taxes on the realty, he was thereby "subrogated" to the tax liens against the realty and, even though commissioner's deed was ineffective to vest complete title in holder thereof, he acquired a lien against realty not only for the amount paid for assignment of commissioner's certificate but also for such delinquent and current taxes.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Subrogate".

5. Judgment ⇐251(1)

In action to quiet title to realty in holder of commissioner's deed issued pursuant to proceeding to foreclose sewer bond to which owner in possession was not made a party, judgment, which, pursuant to request contained in owner's answer, quieted title in owner conditioned on payment of amounts expended by holder of commissioner's deed in payment of the sewer bond and taxes, did not afford relief outside the issues raised by the pleadings.

6. Equity ⇐66

A party who requests equitable relief must satisfy the equitable claims interposed by the opposing party.

7. Municipal corporations ⇐579

In action to quiet title to realty in holder of commissioner's deed issued pursuant to proceeding to foreclose sewer bond, to which proceeding owner in possession was not made a party, court could not quiet title in the owner in possession without protecting the interests of holder of commissioner's deed who had expended money in payment of sewer bond and taxes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by the District Bond Company against Florence Pollack and others to foreclose a street improvement bond, wherein Marcus Zaslaw, claiming title to realty involved under a commissioner's deed issued pursuant to a prior proceeding to foreclose a sewer bond, intervened, seeking a decree quieting title against E. W. Johnson, a purchaser in possession of the land affected, who was not a party to proceeding to foreclose sewer bond, and who by answer asked that title be quieted in him. From a judgment quieting the title of the defendant in intervention, conditioned on payment of amounts expended by plaintiff in intervention in payment of the sewer bond and taxes, defendant in intervention appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

R. L. Carlisle, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas J. Clark, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff.

Paul Magasin and Charles H. Heustis, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

In 1935, appellant, defendant in intervention in the court below, purchased certain real property located in Burbank, California, and went into immediate possession. In 1936 an action was brought to foreclose a sewer bond outstanding against the property. Appellant was not made a party to this action and had no actual or constructive notice thereof. A judgment of foreclosure was entered, pursuant to which a sale was held. The property was purchased at the foreclosure sale by Eva Zaik, and a commissioner's certificate of sale was issued to her. Eva Zaik assigned this certificate of sale to respondent, plaintiff in intervention in the court below, who secured a commissioner's deed to the property. Respondent paid Eva Zaik the amount bid at the foreclosure sale, paid delinquent taxes on the property, and costs. In the following year he paid the current taxes on the property. The various expenditures amounted to $656.81.

In 1937 the District Bond Company filed an action to foreclose a street improvement bond outstanding against the property. Respondent obtained leave to file a complaint in intervention, wherein he claimed to be the owner of the property by virtue of the deed obtained pursuant to the prior foreclosure proceeding, offered to pay the Bond Company's lien, and asked that his title be quieted as against appellant, who was named as defendant in intervention. Respondent's ownership of the property was denied by appellant, who asked in his answer that title be quieted in his favor against respondent.

The trial court found that the sewer bond foreclosure proceeding was ineffective as to appellant because he had no notice thereof. It decreed that title to the property should be quieted in appellant's favor and that appellant pay to respondent the $656.81 expended by respondent in payment of the sewer bond and the taxes against the property on condition that respondent deed all his interest in the property to appellant, respondent to have a lien against the property for this amount.

Appellant appeals from that part of the judgment ordering the payment to respondent of the sums expended by him and providing for a lien against the property.

[1-3] The assessment represented by the sewer bond created a lien against the property binding upon all subsequent owners until the bond was paid. Street Improvement Act of 1911, secs. 66, 75, 63; Stats. 1911, page 730; 2 Deering's General Laws, 1937, Act 8199, secs. 66, 75, 63. Appellant therefore acquired the property in question subject to the assessment lien already existing against it. The proceeding to foreclose this lien could not operate to divest appellant of his ownership because he was not made a party to the proceeding and received no notice thereof. Lee v. Silva, 197 Cal. 364, 240 P. 1015; Page v. W. W. Chase Co., 145 Cal. 578, 79 P. 278; Noble v. Blanchard, 120 Cal. App. 664, 8 P.2d 523. The commissioner's certificate of sale and the commissioner's deed issued to respondent by virtue of the foreclosure sale were ineffective to pass to respondent full title to the property. Respondent, however, by his purchase obtained the lien, which continued to exist against the property. Burns v. Hiatt, 149 Cal. 617, 620, 87 P. 196, 117 Am.St.Rep. 157; Tutt v. Van Voast, 36 Cal.App.2d 282, 97 P.2d 869; Warden v. Barnes, 111 Cal.App. 287, 292, 295 P. 569; Chapman v. Rudolph, 58 Cal.App. 233, 208 P. 370; Street Improvement Act of 1911, sec. 75, 2 Deering's General Laws, 1937, Act 8199, sec. 75. The transaction amounted to a transfer to him of the assessment lien for value, and in no way prejudiced the rights of appellant who continued to own the property subject to the lien. Ibid.

[4] Respondent, acting not as a volunteer, but to protect his interest in the property, paid the taxes, past and current, and was thereby subrogated to the tax liens against the property. See cases cited in 16 Cal.Jur. 349-351, secs. 48, 49. The trial court therefore properly adjudged respondent to have a lien against the property for the full amount of his expenditures.

[5-7] Appellant contends that the relief afforded respondent was outside the issues raised by the pleadings. Appellant, however, in his answer affirmatively requested the trial court to quiet title to the property in his favor. Islais, etc., Water Co. v. Allen, 132 Cal. 432, 64 P. 713; Hough v. Wright, 127 Cal.App. 689, 16 P.2d 301; Brooks v. White, 22 Cal.App. 719, 136 P. 500; Beck v. Wilson, 49 Cal.App. 281, 193 P. 158; Green v. Palmer, 68 Cal.App. 393, 229 P. 876. Young, 98 Cal.App. 400, 406, 277 P. 163. The trial court could not quiet appellant's title to the property without protecting the interests of respondent therein. Ellis v. MILGATE et al. v. WRAITH.

Sac. 5504.

Supreme Court of California.

Jan. 21, 1942.

1. Negligence ⇐89(1)

The statute imputing negligence of driver of automobile to the owner for all purposes of civil damages is not limited to actions by third persons against the owner, but includes actions by the owner against third persons. Vehicle Code § 402(a), St.1937, p. 2353.

2. Negligence ⇐89(1)

The construction of the section of the Vehicle Code as imputing of automobile borrower's negligence to automobile owner in an action by owner against a third person does not violate the settled law that a bailor may recover from a bailee for bailee's negligence in injuring the bailed property. Vehicle Code, § 402(a), St.1937, p. 2353.

3. Statutes ⇐117(8)

The section of the Vehicle Code construed as preventing recovery from a third person by an automobile owner because of imputed negligence of borrower of automobile, and entitled as "an act to amend" and add to certain specific sections of the Vehicle Code, relating to civil liability and financial responsibility of owners and operators of vehicles, is not unconstitutional on ground that the subject is not mentioned in the title. Vehicle Code, § 402(a), St.1937, p. 2353; Const. art. 4, § 24.

4. Statutes ⇐109

An amending title of a statute is sufficient if it reads: "An act to amend" a certain section of the code or a statute. Const. art. 4, § 24.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; Dal M. Lemmon, Judge.

Action by Doris Milgate, a minor, etc., Frank E. Milgate, and Hugh Cunningham against Lawrence Wraith to recover for personal injuries and property damage sustained in automobile collision. From an adverse judgment, Frank E. Milgate appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Prior opinion, 113 P.2d 503.

Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, and A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for appellant.

Huston, Huston & Huston and Robert H. Schwab, Jr., all of Woodland, for respondent.

Parker & Stanbury, Raymond G. Stanbury, and Vernon W. Hunt, all of Los Angeles, George E. Sandford and Bronson, Bronson & McKinnon, all of San Francisco, and Reginald I. Bauder, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ, on behalf of respondent.

CURTIS, Justice.

Appellant, Frank E. Milgate, loaned his automobile to Hugh Cunningham, who took appellant's daughter, Doris Milgate, riding with him in the car. While the car was being so used it collided with another driven by Lawrence Wraith. Doris Milgate and Cunningham were injured and the car was damaged. This action was then instituted by Doris Milgate, through her father as guardian ad litem, for recovery for injuries suffered by her, and also by her father, Frank E. Milgate, appellant herein, for damage to his car and for hospital and medical bills incurred by him as the result of the injuries sustained by his daughter. Cunningham joined as plaintiff, requesting damages for personal injuries suffered by him. The trial court, sitting without a jury, found Wraith negligent in the operation of his car but also found Cunningham guilty of contributory negligence. An award of damages was made to the minor daughter, but relief was denied to Cunningham because of his contributory negligence. Relief was also denied to appellant for damages to his car and for money expended for medical and hospital treatment of his daughter. This latter denial of relief was based on the trial court's conclusion that the negligence of Cunningham should be imputed to appellant, as owner of the car, so as to bar appellant's claim, because of the provision of section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 153, as amended in 1937, St.1937, p. 2353, providing that the negligence of a borrower of a car should be imputed to the owner for all purposes of civil damages. On this appeal it is urged that the trial court erred in holding that the negligence of Cunningham was thus imputed to appellant.

Subdivision (a) of section 402 of the Vehicle Code provides: "Every owner of a motor vehicle is liable and responsible for the death of or injury to person or property resulting from negligence in the operation of such motor vehicle, in the business of such owner or otherwise, by any person using or operating the same with the permission, express or implied, of such owner, and the negligence of such person shall be imputed to the owner for all purposes of civil damages." (Italics added.) The italicized portion was added by amendment in 1937.

[1] Appellant contends that the above-quoted section should be so construed as to limit the imputation of negligence to actions by third persons against the owner. Whatever might have been the proper construction prior to the 1937 amendment, it is now clear that since the passage of that amendment, said section is not susceptible of such construction. The phrase "the negligence of such person shall be imputed to the owner for all purposes of civil damages" can be interpreted in no other sense than to include actions by the owner against third persons. Indeed, that was undoubtedly the very purpose of the amendment. If the section were not so interpreted, the added portion would be meaningless, for as stated by the trial court: "The addition to the section did not add to the liability of an owner; neither did it clarify the existing liability. Its purpose, then, would seem to be that which its wording is sufficiently comprehensive to cover, namely, the imputation of such negligence in all cases where the rights and obligations of the owner are involved in civil actions for damages. Its only effect, which may also be considered its purpose, was to definitely extend the imputation to actions in which the owner sought redress in damages."

Appellant refers to the case of Mills v. Gabriel, 259 App.Div. 60, 18 N.Y.S.2d 78, in support of the contention that the negligence of a driver should not be imputed to the owner in an action by the owner against a third party. Of course, a New York court's interpretation of a statute of that state is not controlling on this court's interpretation of a statute of this state. If the statutes were identical and if the law were clearly established in New York, the opinion would have considerable persuasive force, but such is not the case. The New York statute is similar to the California statute as it read prior to the 1937 amendment, but it was by the 1937 amendment that the legislature of this state clearly included the imputation of negligence to the owner in actions by the owner against third persons. Therefore, the interpretation given to the New York statute by the court in the Mills case, supra, can be of no aid to appellant here. Furthermore, it is questionable whether the New York law has been finally and definitely determined in accordance with the Mills case. The Court of Appeals did affirm the decision of the Appellate Division in a memorandum decision, but it did not express its own ideas on the problem. See Mills v. Gabriel, 284 N.Y. 755, 31 N.E.2d 512. Even under the limited New York statute there are numerous decisions of the Appellate Division directly contrary to the Mills case. See Renza v. Brennan, 165 Misc. 96, 300 N.Y.S. 221; Darrohn v. Russell, 154 Misc. 753, 277 N.Y.S. 783; Shuler v. Whitmore, Rauber & Vicinus, 138 Misc. 814, 246 N.Y.S. 528; Swartout v. Van Auken, 132 Misc. 89, 228 N.Y.S. 671. The Renza case, supra, contains an excellent review of the conflict in the New York decisions. What was said there in regard to the rule that negligence should not be imputed is particularly applicable to the instant situation. For these reasons that opinion will be quoted at some length. Beginning on page 223 of 300 N.Y.S., Judge King states:

"Counsel for plaintiff freely admits that the Legislature has fastened upon his client herein a new responsibility (unknown at common law). He claims, however, that it is a responsibility to answer to others for damage done to them and that the common-law immunity from the negligence of the bailee still exists when the damage is to bailor's car and the bailor is a plaintiff rather than a defendant.

"I do not so construe the statute. Do the words 'responsible for * * * injuries to * * * property' fix responsibility for injuries only to property of others? The statute does not so state. Where are the words that exempt the bailor's property from this 'responsibility'? To hold with plaintiff's counsel in his argument would be to interpolate into the statute something which is not there in order to create an inequality among users of the highways which would be as shocking as it would be unjust.

"Judge Wilder in Darrohn v. Russell, 154 Misc. 753, 754, 277 N.Y.S. 783, 785, stated the problem thus: 'But, in abrogating the common-law rule of non-liability where the car is not operated in the owner's service, does the statute destroy both immunities or but one? Is it both a sword and a shield? Does it impale him upon a new liability to third persons but protect him from responsibility for his own damage?'

"Judge Wilder goes on to conclude that the owner is barred by the negligence of his bailee, adding that 'he shall not be permitted to capitalize a situation identical with that for which he is expressly made responsible, and, in the phrase of Judge Tompkins of this court, that the Legislature has not generated and the courts will not sponsor, a hybrid offspring.'

"Directly contra is the decision of the Appellate Division, Fourth Department, in Gochee v. Wagner, 232 App.Div. 401, 403, 250 N.Y.S. 102, 105. [Cited and relied upon by the court in Mills v. Gabriel, supra.] There, by a divided court, two justices dissenting, it was held that 'While the statute is remedial, it is remedial solely in favor of an injured third person. It is not to be wrenched out of its intended purpose and its language distorted in order to conform it to the conventional pattern of common-law agency.' Also contra is Nannes v. Ideal Garage, Inc., 150 Misc. 522, 269 N.Y.S. 777, decided by the Appellate Term, First Department.

"Gochee v. Wagner, supra, was reversed by the Court of Appeals, 257 N.Y. 344, 178 N.E. 553, but the reversal is based upon the ground that, since the owner or bailor was present in his car at the time of the accident and had dominion over it, the statute did not apply and the common law made him responsible for his operator's negligence. Thus the decision rests upon common-law grounds and is not helpful to the problem at bar. * * *

"The shocking effect of the holding of the Appellate Division in the Gochee case could hardly have been more strikingly illustrated than in the trial of the case at bar, for tried with it before the same jury was a companion action in which the present plaintiffs were defendants and the defendant Brennan was the plaintiff. He sued for damages to his motorbus. Was the jury to be charged in the case at bar that the sole issue was the negligence of the defendant, because the negligence of John Renza (even if found) could not bar the recovery of Rose J. Renza, and at the same time be charged in the case of Brennan v. Renza that Rose J. Renza was answerable for the negligence of John Renza?

"An even greater absurdity was presented in the City Court of Rochester in Darrohn v. Russell, supra. There two borrowed cars collided, each being operated upon the business of the borrower. The owners sued each other for damages to the respective cars. Both drivers were found to be negligent. The judgment of the court, following Gochee v. Wagner, would be to award each his damage against the other. Is it any wonder that Judge Wilder declined to sponsor such a 'hybrid offspring'?"

If this court were to accept appellant's contention and confine imputed negligence to actions by third persons against an owner, situations as absurd as those referred to by Judge King would inevitably arise at some future time. It is reasonable to assume that the Legislature had this in mind when it passed the 1937 amendment imputing negligence to the owner for all purposes of civil damages.

Other jurisdictions have passed upon the question involved here. An Iowa statute (Section 5026, Code 1927) provided: "In all cases where damage is done by any car driven by any person under fifteen years of age and in all cases where damage is done by the car, driven by consent of the owner, by reason of negligence of the driver, the owner of the car shall be liable for such damage." Under this statute, which is more limited than the California statute, the Supreme Court of Iowa in the case of Secured Finance Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 207 Iowa 1105, 224 N.W. 88, 61 A.L.R. 855, held that the negligence of the driver was imputable to the owner and consequently barred the owner's recovery in an action against a third party for damage to the owner's car. In the case of DiLeo v. DuMontier, La. App., 195 So. 74, it was held, under a statute making a father liable for the negligent acts of his minor son, that the plaintiff father was barred from recovery from a third person for damage done to his car because of the contributory negligence of his driver son. See, also, Meisenheimer v. Pullen, 271 Mich. 509, 260 N.W. 756; 5 Am.Jur. 781; 5-6 Huddy on Automobiles, 9th Ed. pp. 295–297.

[2] There is no merit to appellant's contention that the imputing of a borrower's negligence to the owner in an action against a third party will violate the settled law that a bailor may recover from a bailee for the latter's negligence in injuring the bailed property. It is obvious that section 402 of the Vehicle Code has no effect on the bailor-bailee relationship in actions by the bailor against the bailee.

[3, 4] It is further contended by appellant that if section 402 of the Vehicle Code prevents recovery from a third person by an owner because of imputed negligence, then said section is unconstitutional under article IV, section 24, of the state Constitution, in that the subject is not mentioned in the title. The title of the original act reads (Stats.1929, p. 566): "An act to add a new section to the Civil Code to be numbered 1714¼ relating to imputed negligence." In 1935 this section became 402(a) of the Vehicle Code. The title to the 1937 amendment reads (Stats.1937, p. 2353): "An act to amend sections 402, 404, 410, and 415 of the Vehicle Code, and to add thereto sections 410.5, 415.5, 417 and 418, relating to civil liability and financial responsibility of owners and operators of vehicles." The phrase "relating to imputed negligence" in the original title is, of course, sufficient, and apparently the phrase "relating to civil liability and financial responsibility of owners and operators of vehicles" in the title to the amendment refers only to the added sections, and not to the amended sections. An amending title is sufficient if it reads: "An act to amend" a certain section of the code or a statute. In re Elliott's Estate, 165 Cal. 339, 132 P. 439; Beach v. Von Detten, 139 Cal. 462, 73 P. 187; People v. Parvin, 74 Cal. 549, 16 P. 490. Even assuming that the additional words relate to section 402, we are satisfied that the phrase "financial responsibility of owners" is sufficiently broad in meaning to include damage to a person's own property. The addition of further descriptive words cannot vitiate a sufficient title, unless such further words indicate a subject not really related to the matters covered by the body of a bill. In re Elliott's Estate, supra.

The trial court properly concluded that under section 402 of the Vehicle Code the negligence of a borrower of a car should be imputed to the owner in an action by the owner against a third party.

The judgment is affirmed.

Jan. 15, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1942.

1. Mortgages ⇐543, 549, 591(1)

The law grants to mortgagor the right to redeem the property and to personally remain in possession pending expiration of period of redemption, but where property is leased to a tenant the title acquired by purchaser at foreclosure sale carries with it the right to receive rent from tenant in possession. Code Civ.Proc. § 700; Civ.Code, § 1111.

2. Mortgages ⇐549

A purchaser at a mortgage foreclosure sale, during period of redemption, is entitled to sue for reasonable value of land occupied by a tenant. Code Civ.Proc. § 700; Civ. Code, § 1111.

3. Mortgages ⇐549

Where mortgaged property is subject to a lease, a sale under foreclosure, in effect, is equivalent to an assignment of the lease until the time for redemption expired. Code Civ.Proc. § 700; Civ.Code, § 1111.

4. Mortgages ⇐549

Where a lease covered both realty and personalty, the realty only being covered by a mortgage, the lessor, following a mortgage foreclosure sale of the realty, was entitled to receive only reasonable value of use of personalty. Code Civ.Proc. § 700; Civ. Code, § 1111.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1013

In action by lessor of realty and personalty for reasonable value of use of furniture and fixtures after foreclosure of a mortgage covering realty, where evidence as to reasonable rental value of property ranged from $5 to $45 per month, District Court of Appeal was not authorized to disturb trial court's finding that reasonable rental value was $5 per month.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇐80½

In action by lessor of realty and personalty against original lessee and others to whom lease was allegedly assigned to recover reasonable rental value of personalty after a foreclosure of mortgage on the realty, evidence supported findings that no assignment of the original lease had been made to one of the defendants sought to be held as an assignee, but that such defendant had signed a later lease for the realty after the foreclosure only as an accommodation to his son to guaranty rental payments, and hence such defendant was not liable for reasonable rental value of personalty. Code Civ.Proc. § 700; Civ.Code, § 1111.

7. Landlord and tenant ⇐208(4)

Where a lease of real property and furnishings and fixtures therein was assigned by lessee, and assignee without a subsequent written assignment turned premises and equipment over to another, assignee was still liable to original lessor for reasonable rental value of furniture and fixtures subsequent to foreclosure of a mortgage on the realty, at least for the time he was occupying premises and using furnishings and fixtures.

8. Landlord and tenant ⇐208(1)

Privity of contract between landlord and tenant is not affected by tenant's assignment of lease, but continues until end of term, notwithstanding tenant is no longer in possession of property.

9. Landlord and tenant ⇐208(1)

Where a lease of real property and furnishings and fixtures therein was assigned by lessee, in absence of any showing of release of liability of original lessee, original lessee was still liable to original lessor for reasonable rental value of fixtures and furnishings subsequent to foreclosure of a mortgage on the realty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Leonora Munzinger against Harry Caffrey, John W. McMurray, Roland McMurray and Ray McMurray, for declaratory relief and for money claimed to be due under a lease. From a judgment against only defendant Ray McMurray, the plaintiff appeals.

Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Halverson & Halverson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hugh E. Brierly and Glenn E. Tinder, both of Bishop, and Robert Loundagin, of Lone Pine, for respondents.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

Plaintiff and appellant instituted this action against defendants and respondents Harry Caffrey, John W. McMurray, Roland McMurray and Ray McMurray, for declaratory relief and for money claimed to be due under the terms of a lease wherein appellant, on May 19, 1934, leased to respondent Harry Caffrey lot 4, block 12, in Bishop, together with certain card and pool tables, bar and fixtures, candy and cigar cases, and other furnishings and fixtures located in the building on that property. The lease was for a term of five years with a monthly rental of $125. At the time the lease to Caffrey was given the real property, but not the personal property, was subject to a mortgage in favor of Johann Albers. Suit for foreclosure of the mortgage was brought through one Tinder, executor of his estate, on the 21st day of September, 1933, and lis pendens recorded before the lease was made. Order of sale was issued March 12, 1934, and after the execution of the lease to Caffrey, the real property was sold to Tinder, as executor, on July 16, 1934, and a sheriff's certificate of sale issued therefor. On June 24, 1935, Tinder, as executor, sold and assigned the real property and certificate of sale to the city of Los Angeles, the assignment being dated December 23, 1935, and the acceptance by the city of Los Angeles being dated February 18, 1936. After the sale on foreclosure, beginning on the 20th day of September, 1934, Tinder, as executor, collected from John W. McMurray, through Ray McMurray, as manager, the sum of $125 per month, until the real property and certificate of sale was sold to and accepted by the city of Los Angeles, deducting $97.30 each month from that amount, which was one per cent of the total purchase price at the foreclosure sale. The balance of the $125 was paid to appellant. On October 22, 1934, Caffrey assigned the lease, with the consent of appellant, to John W. McMurray. John W. McMurray immediately went into and remained in possession until the end of 1935, when the business was transferred to Ray McMurray under some oral agreement of sale. Thereafter, the respondent Ray McMurray alone occupied the premises. On March 2, 1936, Ray McMurray, with Roland McMurray and wife, took a direct lease from the city of Los Angeles at $80 per month for a period of three years on the above-mentioned real property. On March 3, 1939, at the termination of the former lease, Ray McMurray alone took a new lease thereon on the same terms.

Rentals at $125 per month had been paid by all tenants to the executor and the city of Los Angeles up to March 2, 1936. No rental in excess of $80 per month was paid by Ray McMurray or any one of the lessees or assignees subsequent to March 2, 1936. On July 5, 1935, and prior to the expiration of the period of redemption, appellant Munzinger, the mortgagor, filed her petition for a moratorium and, upon stipulation of the city of Los Angeles and orders of the court made thereon, the period of redemption was extended to August 12, 1940, beyond the date of trial hereof. This action was then brought to determine whether Harry Caffrey, the original lessee, and John W. McMurray, the assignee of Caffrey, Ray McMurray and Roland McMurray were liable under the terms of the lease to appellant in the sum of $45 per month from March 2, 1936, to the date of trial, totaling $1,980, for value of the use and occupation of the property for that period.

The question of the liability of the respondent Ray McMurray for the reasonable rental value of the personal property used by him for the period he used it is not raised on this appeal. It is undisputed that the respondent John W. McMurray paid all rental demanded of him during his period of occupancy of the mortgaged premises, and that the respondent Roland McMurray never at any time personally occupied the premises or personal property. The testimony before the court was that Roland McMurray signed the lease from the city of Los Angeles to Ray McMurray, as an accommodation to his son Ray McMurray. The court rendered judgment for plaintiff and appellant against Ray McMurray only, in the sum of $254.75, being for the reasonable rental value of the personal property mentioned in the lease.

It is now contended by appellant (1) that the lease in the instant case was given subject to the mortgage and that since the mortgage was foreclosed the purchaser could not legally abrogate the lease or lease the property before it received the sheriff's deed; (2) that even though the lease was assigned, both the lessee and assignees are liable to appellant for the amount of the agreed rental price in excess of $80 per month.

[1-4] It has been determined on many occasions in this state that title passes to the purchaser at a foreclosure sale. Sec. 700, Code Civ.Proc. The law grants to the mortgagor the right to redeem the property and to personally remain in possession pending the expiration of the period of redemption, but where the property is leased to a tenant the title acquired by the purchaser carries with it the right to receive rent from the tenant in possession. Pollard v. Harlow, 138 Cal. 390, 71 P. 454, 648; Shintaffer v. Bank of Italy, etc., Ass'n, 216 Cal. 243, 13 P.2d 668. A purchaser at a mortgage foreclosure sale, during the period of redemption, is entitled to sue for the reasonable value of the land occupied by a tenant. Munkelt v. Kumberg, 22 Cal.App. 2d 369, 70 P.2d 997. As the purchaser would be entitled to the rents of the property sold under foreclosure or the value of the use and occupation thereof, it must necessarily follow that the mortgagor, during the redemption period, was not entitled to receive them. Becker v. Munkelt, 27 Cal.App.2d 761, 81 P.2d 1041; Reynolds v. Lathrop, 7 Cal. 43; McDevitt v. Sullivan, 8 Cal. 592. In the last two cited cases it was held, under similar circumstances, that the sale under the foreclosure, in effect, was equivalent to an assignment of the lease until the time for redemption expired. See, also, Clarke v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 595, 54 P. 74. In other words, the tenant in possession is liable as such to account to the purchaser for the value of the use and occupation during the period in question. Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 594, 12 P. 723; sec. 1111 Civ.Code; Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Pfenninghausen, 57 Cal. App. 655, 207 P. 927; Harris v. Foster, 97 Cal. 292, 32 P. 246, 33 Am.St.Rep. 187. The appellant in the instant case, therefore, not being entitled to receive the rents from the real property, is confined to a recovery for the reasonable value of the use of the personal property for the period from March 2, 1936, to the date of trial.

[5] The trial court awarded judgment against Ray McMurray only, on this count, in effect holding that the remaining defendants were not liable. The reasonable value of the use of the furniture and fixtures used by Ray McMurray was found to be the sum of $5 per month from March 2, 1936. The evidence discloses that much of the furniture and fixtures leased under the original lease had been stored by previous assignees of the lease and had become antiquated or destroyed and was not used by Ray McMurray during the period in question. The evidence produced on the question of the reasonable value of the use of the fixtures remaining in his possession during this period was that the rental value of this property was from the sum of $5 to $45 per month. Under the evidence we are not authorized to disturb this finding. Donato v. Lopopolo, 20 Cal.App.2d 409, 66 P.2d 1256.

The only other question is whether the remaining defendants are jointly and severally liable with Ray McMurray for this amount.

[6] The complaint in this case alleges that Caffrey, as the original lessee, was in possession of the property and paid full rent therefor until November 22, 1934, when he assigned the lease, by written consent of appellant, to John W. McMurray, who occupied the premises and paid the rent in full until about January 1, 1935. It is also alleged that about that date John McMurray assigned the lease to the remaining defendants, Roland McMurray and Ray McMurray, who have occupied the premises ever since but who have paid rent only to March, 1936. The answers of Caffrey and John W. McMurray admit these general allegations, but allege that all rental was paid. Ray McMurray denied that he went into possession under the terms of any lease executed by appellant. Roland McMurray denied generally all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint and alleged that no assignment of appellant's lease was ever made to him by any person; that he never did own any interest therein; that he never entered into possession of the property; and that he was made a party to the lease from the city only to guarantee to it the rental payments therein provided. The trial court so found. Although this respondent was named as a lessee of the real property under the lease from the city of Los Angeles, this fact would not be conclusive evidence that he was liable for the reasonable rental value of the furniture and fixtures. The court's determination that he was not liable therefor cannot be disturbed on this appeal.

The nature of the assignment of the lease from Caffrey to McMurray is not before us. The record indicates that there was some form of written assignment made and the lease turned over to John W. McMurray or his attorney about October 22, 1934. The evidence shows that John W. McMurray never assigned the lease to Ray McMurray, but about the end of the year 1936, while Ray McMurray was working for him he, John, "just stepped out" and the premises and equipment were turned over to Ray, apparently under some oral contract of sale.

[7, 8] So far as the evidence is concerned, this respondent John W. McMurray was still liable for the reasonable rental value of the fixtures and furnishings subsequent to March 2, 1936, at least for the time he was occupying the premises and using the furnishings and fixtures. Treff v. Gulko, 214 Cal. 591, 595, 7 P.2d 697; Ellingson v. Walsh, O'Connor & Barneson, 15 Cal.2d 673, 675, 104 P.2d 507. Privity of contract between landlord and lessee is not affected by the latter's assignment, but continues until the end of the term notwithstanding he is no longer in possession of the property. Samuels v. Ottinger, 169 Cal. 209, 146 P. 638, Ann.Cas.1916E, 830. The original lessee was "to have and hold the premises together with the said personal property unto the said lessee, from June 19, 1934, for and during the full term of five years * * * paying therefor * * * every month * * * $125 * *."

[9] In Samuels v. Ottinger, supra, it was held that such a lease expressed a contractual obligation on the part of the lessees to pay the stipulated rent, and that such obligation continued notwithstanding the lease had been assigned with the consent of the lessor. In the absence of any showing of release of liability of the original lessee, Harry Caffrey, he is liable for the reasonable rental value of the fixtures and furnishings during the period in question.

That portion of the judgment in favor of Harry Caffrey and John W. McMurray is reversed with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in accordance with the conclusions expressed. That portion of the judgment in favor of Roland McMurray is affirmed. Judgment against Ray McMurray is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇐113(3)

Where superior court rendered judgment dismissing action with prejudice after plaintiff failed to file an amended complaint within time specified when defendant's demurrer to complaint was sustained, plaintiff's proper procedure was by motion to set aside the default and appeal from order made thereon.

2. Appeal and error ⇐544(3)

Where plaintiff appealed from superior court's judgment dismissing action with prejudice after plaintiff failed to file an amended complaint within time specified when defendant's demurrer to complaint was sustained, and only record before reviewing court on appeal was judgment roll, order sustaining demurrer and notice of service of order upon plaintiff could not be considered by reviewing court, since they were not part of "judgment roll", and reviewing court was bound to assume that time to amend had expired before entry of judgment. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 472b, 472c; § 670, subd. 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Rosalie Yurkas against Victor Zampatti. From a judgment dismissing the action with prejudice after plaintiff's failure to file an amended complaint within specified time, plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll.

Affirmed.

S. T. Hogevoll, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Victor Zampatti, of Eureka, in pro. per., for respondent.

CURLER, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff brought action in the Superior Court of Humboldt County. Defendant demurred to plaintiff's complaint, and on the 27th day of January, 1941, defendant's demurrer was sustained and plaintiff granted twenty days in which to amend. On the 17th day of February, 1941, no amended complaint having been filed by plaintiff, the court rendered judgment dismissing the action with prejudice. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment of dismissal.

[1] Appellant contends that the record on appeal shows that default judgment was entered prematurely. Respondent contends that the notice of sustaining the demurrer, and service thereof, and upon which appellant relies, are not a part of the judgment roll, and that the proper proceeding in such a situation was a motion to set aside the default and appeal from the order made thereon. The latter relies upon the case of Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 P. 349, which appears to support his vew, and which we believe to be correct.

The only record before this court on appeal is the judgment roll.

The judgment roll in this case should be one prepared under subdivision 1 of section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides as follows:

"In superior courts and municipal courts the following papers, without being attached together, shall constitute the judgment roll:

"1. In case the complaint is not answered by any defendant, the summons, with the affidavit or proof of service; the complaint with a memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment; if defendant has appeared by demurrer, and such demurrer has been overruled, then notice of the overruling thereof served on defendant's attorney, together with proof of such service; and in case the service so made is by publication, the affidavit for publication of summons, and the order directing the publication of summons."

[2] However, in the clerk's transcript there is a paper purporting to be an affidavit that notice of sustaining the demurrer was served on plaintiff by depositing the same in the United States Post Office at Eureka, California, on the 29th day of January, 1941, and that plaintiff's residence was in San Francisco, California. The order sustaining demurrer and the notice are not legally a part of the record, and therefore cannot be considered by us. Section 472b of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that when a demurrer is sustained, time to amend runs from service of notice of decision. If this court could consider the affidavit of service of notice of sustaining of demurrer, it would appear clear that the default judgment of the trial court was prematurely entered. However, in view of the fact that the only part of the record which is properly before this court is the judgment roll, as defined in said section 670, there is nothing upon which the court can act to set aside or reverse the judgment. We must therefore assume that the time to amend had expired prior to the entry of judgment.

Plaintiff cites section 472c of the Code of Civil Procedure as being conclusive of the issues involved in this case, but inasmuch as that section simply sets forth that one may appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, even though no request to amend the pleading was made—we do not find the section helpful on the question of how a record on appeal should be prepared.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Michael M. Logan and another against John Vernon Richards and others to quiet title to certain realty. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

W. H. Morrissey, of Redwood City, for respondents.

MONCUR, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to quiet title of appellants in and to certain real property situated in Daly City, San Mateo County, California. The complaint contains the usual allegations in an action to quiet title and in addition some six separate counts in which practically all of the probative facts are also alleged. In the answer of respondents it is alleged that John Vernon Richards is the owner of the property and therein the allegations as to the probative facts set forth in the complaint are specifically denied. The trial court found against the appellants on the allegations of the complaint and in favor of John Vernon Richards and entered judgment quieting the latter's title to the property. It is from this judgment that the appeal is taken.

The negotiations for the purchase of the property involved were carried on by Ellen Logan, wife of Michael Logan, the mother of respondents by a former marriage. Ellen Logan died on May 27, 1935, and on March 9, 1937, appellant Anna Nieri was appointed adminstratrix of her estate by the superior court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and she duly qualified as such. The deed was taken in the name of Ellen Logan. It is claimed by appellant Michael Logan that he furnished the money with which to purchase the property and that it was the understanding that it should be the community property of himself and his wife Ellen Logan. Ellen Logan and Michael M. Logan were married on or about December 10, 1922. Respondents claim that between them they furnished the money for the purchase of the property and that it was, until the execution and delivery to respondent John Richards of the deeds hereinafter referred to, the separate property of Ellen Logan.

The first of these deeds was one executed and delivered to respondent John by his mother, on August 31, 1931, conveying to him the property. Michael M. Logan was not named as a party in this deed, but he signed and acknowledged it. The other deed was one by appellant Michael M. Logan, dated June 1, 1935, and acknowledged June 3, 1935. There were at least two other deeds involved and also a lease. This lease was from respondent John to appellant Michael. It was for the term of Michael's life and the rental was $1 per year.

In view of the findings of the trial court, it is not deemed necessary to notice particularly the two last-mentioned deeds or to discuss the controversy arising concerning them. The question of the consideration for this lease was involved, respondents contending that this consideration had failed. The court found specifically in accordance with the contention of respondents. Also, at the trial appellant Michael M. Logan testified that he was not claiming any title under the lease.

[1-4] The evidence was sharply conflicting. These conflicts were resolved in favor of respondents, the court having found in favor of respondents upon all of the issues raised by the pleadings. Unless the conclusions reached by the trial court were erroneous or there were errors in the admission or rejection of evidence which were prejudicial to the rights of appellants, this court is without authority to disturb the conclusions reached by the trial court. It is the contention of appellants that the court erred prejudicially in rejecting proffered evidence on behalf of appellants; that in a prior action in which respondent John Richards was plaintiff his complaint omitted all mention or reference to a deed which he claims was delivered to him by Michael Logan on June 3, 1935. We do not find it necessary to determine whether it was erroneous for the court to reject this proffered evidence. After an examination of the entire evidence, we conclude that no prejudice resulted to appellants by reason of its rejection. It is not material that Michael was not designated as a party in this deed to John Vernon Richards on August 31, 1931. In view of the findings of the trial court that at that time the property involved was the separate property of Ellen Logan, Michael M. Logan had no interest to convey and his signature to, and acknowledgment of the execution of the deed was all that was required. Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564; Dentzel v. Waldie, 30 Cal. 138; Cordano v. Wright, 159 Cal. 610, 115 P. 227, Ann.Cas.1912C, 1044. It appears that respondent John withheld the deed of August 31, 1931, from record; it is claimed that this was done for the purpose of making it appear that the property was Mrs. Logan's, as she was entitled to a tax exemption by virtue of Michael M. Logan's having served in the Spanish-American War, respondent John not being entitled to an exemption; that this was a fraud upon the county of San Mateo; and that by reason of this fact respondent John Richards is precluded from asserting the title to the land as against his mother's administratrix, as he does not come before the court with clean hands. This matter was gone into quite thoroughly at the trial. The court found against the contention. As there is evidence to support this finding, it cannot be disturbed by this court.

[5] In relation to the contention of appellants respecting the other deeds which we have deemed it unnecessary to specifically mention, these contentions are based upon appellants' view of the evidence favoring these contentions. However, as the trial court found upon conflicting evidence contrary to appellants' position respecting the effect of these deeds, their contention cannot be sustained.

The trial court having made its findings of fact and conclusions of law upon conflicting evidence; the conclusions reached by the trial court being found to be supported by the evidence; and there appearing no error resulting in prejudice to the rights of appellants, it is ordered that the judgment be, and it is hereby affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William J. Palmer, Judge.

Action by Samuel C. Hawkins against David R. Faries and others for an accounting of alleged "secret profits" allegedly made by defendants while acting as attorneys for plaintiff. From a judgment for the defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Roland Rich Woolley, Joseph F. Rank, and Ralph C. Curren, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Faries & McDowell, Charles E. McDowell, Leonard S. Janofsky, and Wayne R. Hackett, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DORAN, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of respondents as defendants in an action brought against them by appellant, wherein the complaint was denominated one for an accounting of "secret profits." Respondents had acted as attorneys for appellant in obtaining certain permits for the drilling of oil wells on tidelands owned by the state; and thereafter appellant sold his interest in the said permits either through or to respondents. The basis of the instant action is appellant's claim that in procuring the sale of his interest, respondents fraudulently withheld certain material information from appellant affecting the value of the permits in question. The complaint in effect charges that respondents, while acting as attorneys for appellant, and under authority from him, sold the certain properties owned by appellant, and failed to account to plaintiff for all the proceeds from such sales. The events from which the alleged cause of action arose took place some eight or nine years prior to the commencement of the action and about ten years prior to the trial thereof. The trial of the action consumed approximately three months and the transcript of the proceedings had thereat runs over 4,700 pages. The supplement to appellant's brief, summarizing the proceedings, consists of four volumes totaling over 1,800 pages.

The following constitutes appellant's statement of the questions involved:

"In this action where the fiduciary relationship of attorney and client is involved: (a) Did the defendant attorney, who purchased from his client valuable oil interests for $30,000, overcome the presumption that said sale was fraudulent by clear and convincing proof that he made a full and complete disclosure to his client of all facts pertinent to such purchase? (b) When the attorney sold said interests less than four months later as part of an entire transaction wherein he also sold other interests of his client, did the attorney actually shift the respective consideration properly due to his client and himself so as to allow himself a purported profit of approximately $700,000 at the expense of his client? (c) Where the fiduciary relationship existed and continued to exist until shortly before action was commenced, can the attorney avoid liability on the ground that the action is barred by the Statute of Limitations where it appears that the fraudulent nature of the transactions was kept secret and was only accidentally discovered shortly before the action was commenced?"

[1, 2] Respondents state that the question involved on this appeal is whether there is any substantial evidence in the record of the case to support the findings of the trial court. Actually, the transactions here involved having been between attorneys and their client, the question is whether the respondent attorneys overcame by clear and satisfactory evidence the presumption of invalidity which arises from such transactions. "All dealings between an attorney and his client for the benefit of the former are not only closely scrutinized, but are presumptively invalid, on the ground of constructive fraud, and such presumption can be overcome only by the clearest and most satisfactory evidence. Not only must the attorney offer clear and satisfactory evidence that the transaction between himself and his client was fair and equitable, and no advantage was taken by him, but he must also offer proof that the client was fully informed of all matters relative to the transaction, and was so placed as to be able to act understandingly and to deal with the attorney at arm's length." In re Estate of Witt, 198 Cal. 407, 419, 245 P. 197, 202. To the same effect see Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 425, 91 Am.Dec. 644; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 P. 981; Clark v. Millsap, 197 Cal. 765, 242 P. 918. Upon appeal, the inquiry in this connection is directed toward a determination of whether the trial court made a proper finding as to the nature and character of the transaction, supported by substantial evidence.

The trial court found the following facts. That the respondent firm of Faries & Williamson was employed by the respective permittees involved and by appellant to represent them as attorneys at law in connection with the filing of applications for the permits referred to in the complaint herein, and in obtaining the said permits on the property in question, together with leases thereon, and in the bringing and defending of any litigation in connection with the said permits and other matters which might require legal services in connection with the said permits or leases; and that this employment continued up to and including portions of the year 1930, but was terminated in the year 1930 by reason of the sale or disposal by the permittees and appellant of all of their right, title and interest in the said permits and leases issued thereon, and in and to any and all operating agreements relating to said leases, and in and to any proceeds resulting from the sale or other disposal of oil, gas and other hydrocarbons to be produced therefrom. That the termination of the said employment was promptly followed by an accounting by the said permittees and the respondent firm to appellant during the years 1929 and 1930 of any and all sums of money to which the appellant was entitled upon any sale or disposal of any right, title or interest of any permittee, or otherwise, in and to the said permits or leases, or otherwise. That the respondent firm of attorneys was dissolved on or about April 30, 1932, and that thereafter appellant did not employ said firm for any purpose in connection with any matter; and that at no time prior to the dissolution of the said firm did the appellant employ or deal with any member of the said firm as an individual, but that subsequent to the dissolution of the said firm appellant has employed respondent David R. Faries as his attorney in connection with various matters up to, and subsequent to, the time of the filing of this action, but not as to any matters referred to in the complaint herein. That "as to said permits and as to any leases based thereon, and as to any real property described in said permits and/or leases, and as to all matters and transactions pertaining to or affecting plaintiff's rights or interests therein or any financial benefit that plaintiff might derive therefrom, that the plaintiff (appellant) himself was at all times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, trained and experienced in the oil business and particularly in buying, selling, leasing and dealing in tideland permits, oil-bearing lands and oil leases, and was familiar with the value of each and all of the said permits * * * and each and all of the interests of all of the persons interested therein or the proceeds to be derived from any sale or disposal thereof, and was at all such times familiar with the preparation of, and accustomed to draw, contracts and agreements relating to the sale, lease, disposal or operation of real property for the purpose of producing or endeavoring to produce, oil, gas, or other hydrocarbon substances therefrom, and was familiar at all times mentioned in said complaint with the statutes and laws relating to tideland permits, and that the plaintiff did not at any time referred to in plaintiff's said complaint implicitly, completely, wholly, or at all, rely upon any advice, instructions or request of the defendant attorneys * * * in fixing or agreeing to, the terms upon which he disposed of any of his interests in, or related to, said permits"; and that appellant knew the said attorneys were not experienced in the oil business or in matters relating thereto. That for their legal services in connection with the said permits respondents were to receive one-sixth of the gross proceeds received by the permittees and appellant as a result of the issuance of such permits and the sale or disposal thereof or of any interest therein, or from any operations for the production of oil or gas conducted on the property therein described; and that respondents as attorneys, for their services in selling any royalty or other interest, were to receive an additional compensation equal to 10 per cent of the gross selling price thereof. The court made specific findings as to the disposal and sale of appellant's interest in the permits in question; that the sales thereof made to respondents were at the instance and request of appellant; that appellant disposed of all of his said interests in the permits; that a portion of said interests were transferred in settlement of pending litigation; that all such sales, assignments and transfers were made with appellant's knowledge and consent; and that respondents fully accounted to appellant for all moneys received from the sales, transfers and assignments in question; and that the sale of appellant's certain interests to respondents was not induced by concealment on the part of respondents; that appellant was fully informed by respondents of all facts known to them; that the price paid for said interests was fair and adequate; and that the transaction was not void but was a valid sale, by which respondents obtained title to the property in question; and that the subsequent sale of the said property by respondents was a sale of their own property. That the members of said respondent, firm, or any of them, never conspired or agreed or attempted with the buyers or buyer of any interest in any of the properties involved in this action to juggle or misrepresent or conceal or depress the price or consideration paid or agreed to be paid therefor, for the purpose of depriving plaintiff (appellant) of a fair return, or of the true return from such sale or of enabling the members of the said firm, or any of them, to obtain for themselves an excessive price or any advantage which they would not otherwise have obtained. "* * * that the said plaintiff was fully and completely advised by the said firm of Faries & Williamson and the members of said firm as to all facts relating to all sales and transactions had by or through them or any of them, in which was involved any right, title or interest of the plaintiff, or any right, title or interest claimed now or at any other time by the plaintiff in or to any permit, lease, land, contract, or any proceeds from the sale or disposal of any interest in any such or other property, or in or to any oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances to be produced or saved or sold from any such permit * * * that at all times while the defendant attorneys, Faries, Williamson and Heizman, represented the plaintiff in any transactions referred to in these findings, they exercised their best and sincere judgment in his behalf, handled all matters entrusted to them diligently, efficiently, to the best of their ability, and with marked success, dealt with him fairly, acted throughout in good faith and with honest purpose and intent in his behalf * * * that throughout all such transactions, they made a continuing and conscientious endeavor to keep him fully and correctly advised as to all matters with reference to which the said firm of Faries & Williamson or any member thereof, were acting for said plaintiff, and for the purpose of obtaining his approval of every transaction affecting his interests; that they carried out to the best of their ability and their sincere judgment in his behalf, all his instructions to them, and faithfully, to their best judgment, performed every task assigned to them by him * * *."

[3] It is true that many of the court's findings are in negative form; and "in a case such as this, proof of mere negative conduct on the part of an attorney dealing with his client is not sufficient 'to overcome the presumption of fraud and unfair dealing which is automatically raised by the law as a protection to a client.'" Thornley v. Jones, 96 Cal.App. 219, 229, 274 P. 93, 97. However, it is to be noted that the trial court also affirmatively found that appellant, the client, had knowledge of the facts relative to the transactions here in question, that respondents had fully informed appellant of all facts within their knowledge, that appellant had received a fair and adequate price for the interests which he sold, and that respondents had acted honestly and in good faith and had handled all matters entrusted to them to the best of their ability and with the exercise of sincere judgment in appellant's behalf. It is to be inferred from such findings that the trial court was satisfied with the manner in which respondents had met the burden of proof cast upon them.

[4, 5] Appellant's brief reveals that the evidence was largely conflicting and that even where a conflict did not exist the evidence was not of such a conclusive nature as to compel the drawing of only one inference therefrom. Appellant has expended much of his efforts in attacking the credibility of the witnesses for respondents. Upon an appeal from a judgment all conflicts in the evidence must be resolved in favor of the judgment, and all reasonable inferences must be drawn in support thereof. The evidence adduced on behalf of respondent is not shown to be inherently improbable, and it was for the trial court to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses.

[6, 7] The record reveals that the transaction forming the basis of the complaint herein was the outgrowth of business brought to respondents as attorneys by appellant. The transaction, as a result of which respondents profited, was one in competition with appellant's interests. However, respondent Faries testified that he fully informed the appellant of the transaction; and although this statement of respondent is emphatically denied by appellant, nevertheless, this serves but to raise a conflict in the testimony, which conflict was resolved in favor of respondents by the trial judge. Whether the uncorroborated testimony of the respondent under such circumstances is that substantial evidence required by the law to support a finding was a question addressed to the trial judge. However controversial the question of the propriety of such a conclusion might be in this or any other similar situation attending a trial, it is well settled that such a conclusion cannot be disturbed on appeal. See Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 33 P. 836; Zeller v. Knapp, 115 Cal.App. 486, 1 P.2d 1071; Moore v. Hoar, 27 Cal.App.2d 269, 81 P.2d 226. It must of course be assumed that the trial court gave to the evidence that close scrutiny required in cases involving a transaction between an attorney and his client. There is, therefore, no ground upon which this court may set aside the findings of the trial court as not supported by the evidence. The efforts of appellant in this regard amounts to little more than an attempt to retry the issues of the case upon appeal.

[8] The trial court also found for respondents upon three affirmative defenses of accord and satisfaction, upon one of laches, and found that appellant's cause of action was barred by sections 337 (1) (2), 338 (4), 339 (1), and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. These findings likewise may not be said to lack support in the evidence.

Appellant sought to avoid the defense of the statute of limitations by showing that the facts constituting respondents' concealment of vital information were not discovered until a time within the period provided for commencement of an action such as the instant one; but the trial court expressly rejected appellant's theory of discovery as unsubstantiated; and for the reasons already given the court's finding in this regard may not be disturbed.

[9] Appellant contends that the court erred in making a finding that appellant knew respondents were the actual purchasers of one-half of a royalty interest ostensibly sold to the Signal Oil Company and in refusing to permit appellant to amend his complaint to include that transaction. Appellant's proposed amendment set out the entire transaction in question, the proceeds received by respondents as a result of their purchase, in excess of the amount paid for the interests, and prayed judgment for the amount of this difference. Inasmuch as the court found that the sale of appellant's interest to respondents was fair and valid and that respondents thereby acquired title to the property in question, proceeds thereafter received by respondents from said property were the property of respondents, for which they were not accountable to appellant; and appellant's attempt to amend his complaint in order to show the proceeds thus received by respondents was without relevance or materiality. The proposed amendment was properly refused under the circumstances.

[10, 11] Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to allow evidence as to appellant's drinking habits, stating that "the habitual use of intoxicants leaves an imprint upon the mind in some instances to the extent that one may suffer a temporary or permanent impairment thereof." If appellant's case was such an instance the burden was upon him to show it. Appellant fails to point out where there was any showing or offer to prove that his intoxication produced such an abnormal condition of mind as to render him incapable of comprehending or appreciating the effect of his acts, and the court found that appellant was sober at the time of the transactions and negotiations above mentioned. Obviously, there could be no error in refusing to permit evidence as to appellant's drinking habits under the circumstances here presented.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

HAKE et al. v. CITY OF BAKERSFIELD et al.

Civ. 2687.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 15, 1942.

1. Appeal and error ⇐781(4)

Where parking meter ordinance had been repealed at time for hearing on appeal from judgment refusing to enjoin operation of parking meters, all questions raised by the appeal became "moot" and appeal must be dismissed.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Moot Question".

2. Costs ⇐232

Rule for assessing costs is the same where appeal is dismissed because questions raised have become moot as where appeal is dismissed for other reasons. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 955, 1034.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by Harry E. Hake and others against the City of Bakersfield and others for injunction against operation of parking meters. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Frederick E. Hoar and Siemon & Siemon, all of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Walter Osborn, City Atty., R. Y. Burum, Asst. City Atty., and John Shortridge, Deputy City Atty., all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This was an action attacking the validity of an ordinance of the city of Bakersfield providing for the installation and operation of parking meters on portions of certain streets in that city, and seeking to enjoin and restrain the defendants from operating said parking meters. The court found for the defendants and entered a judgment, from which the plaintiffs appealed.

[1, 2] When this appeal came on for hearing the court was informed that the ordinance in question has been repealed, and it therefore appears that all questions raised have become moot. The only thing argued at the hearing was with respect to the right of the respondents to recover their costs on appeal in the event of a dismissal. We know of no reason for a different rule, with respect to costs, where an appeal is dismissed because the questions raised have become moot than in a case where the appeal is dismissed for other reasons. The usual rule should be applied here (see secs. 955 and 1034 of the Code of Civil Procedure), and it is so ordered.

The appeal is dismissed.

CRUIKSHANK v. CRUIKSHANK.

Civ. 13311.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 14, 1942.

1. Appeal and error ⇐907(3)

On appeal on the judgment roll, the evidence considered by the trial court must be deemed to be adequate to support its conclusions on the merits of the case in absence of a showing in the record of an abuse of discretion.

2. Divorce ⇐241

Though a lump sum award to a divorced wife for her support may be upheld, the possible termination by death or remarriage of the right of a divorced wife to claim support supplies a cogent reason for preferring a judgment which by its terms provides for installment payments. Civ.Code, § 139.

3. Divorce ⇐240(5)

Where trial court retained jurisdiction to modify divorce decree awarding allowance to divorced wife for her support in event it became necessary, an award of $2,500 to wife for her future support and maintenance, payable in installments, was not excessive under the circumstances if wife lived and remained unmarried until the last installment was paid. Civ.Code, § 139.

4. Divorce ⇐241

Where trial court retained jurisdiction to modify divorce decree awarding allowance to divorced wife for her support, payable in installments, construction of decree as providing for payment in installments did not invalidate provision of decree impressing a lien on husband's property for payment of installments as they became due, but its only practical effect would be to terminate payments in event of wife's death or remarriage. Civ.Code, §§ 139, 140.

5. Divorce ⇐240(5)

Where husband had separate property worth $6,000 producing $30 per month income, and husband's income at time of trial of divorce action was $12 per week sick benefit payments, but as soon as he returned to regular duties as a postal employee he would receive $150 per month, there were no children, and there was no finding that wife, who was awarded divorce decree, was incapable of obtaining and holding employment, award to wife totalling one-half of husband's gross income after deducting payments for taxes, encumbrances, and repairs was excessive, and husband was entitled to an additional monthly deduction of $50 for his own living expenses before an equal division was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Fred B. Cruikshank against Sophie S. Cruikshank, wherein defendant filed a counterclaim for divorce. From a decree granting a divorce and awarding an allowance for her support to defendant and cross-complainant, plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll.

William E. Fox and Joseph A. Sprankle, Jr., both of Pasadena, for appellant.

William B. Etheridge, of Pasadena, for respondent.

SCOTT, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll from a decree granting a divorce and awarding an allowance for her support to defendant and cross-complainant.

The parties were married in June, 1938, and separated in November, 1939. The decree of divorce was granted to the cross-complainant on the ground of extreme cruelty. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment in its entirety, but now objects to that portion only which relates to an award to his wife for her support. The only community property was found to be some furniture and an equity in certain real property amounting to $240.17. Plaintiff was found to have separate property of a total value of $6,000, consisting of interest in real estate and securities and producing $30 per month income, with "the prospect of receiving several hundred dollars" from certain investments. It was found that the husband's income at the time of the trial was $12 per week sick benefit payments, and that as soon as he returned to regular duties as postal employee he would receive $150 per month. Defendant's separate property consisted of certain furniture. It was found that she "has received no income for several years past and has no immediate prospect of earning or otherwise receiving an income." There was no finding that she was physically or mentally incapable of obtaining and holding employment, or that she had made any effort to do so.

The trial court awarded to the defendant wife the furniture which was found to be community property, and the judgment directed the husband to pay to her for future support and maintenance the total sum of $2,500, for attorney's fees the sum of $175, plus her court costs, and an additional sum of $240.17 as the value of the total equity in the community real property. A lien was impressed upon the husband's separate property to secure the payment of the amounts thus awarded. One-half of the husband's gross income, after deducting payments for taxes, incumbrances and repairs, was ordered paid to the wife to be credited on the amounts ordered. Forty per cent was to go to the wife and ten per cent to the attorney until his fee should be paid, after which the entire one-half was to be paid to the wife. The trial court retained jurisdiction to modify its decree in the event it became necessary.

[1-4] This appeal being on the judgment roll, the evidence considered by the trial court must be deemed to be adequate to support its conclusions as to the merits of the case, in the absence of a showing of abuse of discretion in the record before us. As to the total assistance the divorced wife should receive from her former husband, we cannot say that the award was excessive if defendant lives and remains unmarried until the last installment shall have been paid. From the reservation of jurisdiction in the decree it is apparent that the trial court had in mind the provision of Civil Code section 139, added by the amendment of 1933 (Stats.1933, p. 1039), terminating the obligation of the husband to support his former wife in case of her remarriage. Even in the absence of the paragraph of the section which was added by the 1933 amendment, it was held that the husband's duty toward the wife from whom he was divorced terminated upon her death or remarriage. Although a lump sum award may be upheld (Robinson v. Robinson, 79 Cal. 511, 21 P. 1095), the possible termination by death or remarriage of the right of a divorced wife to claim support supplies a cogent reason for preferring a judgment which by its terms provides for installment payments. Tremper v. Tremper, 39 Cal. App. 62, 177 P. 868. In Honey v. Honey, 60 Cal.App. 759, 214 P. 250, 251, while upholding a judgment for a lump sum under circumstances substantially different from those in the instant case, the court observed that "as this provision for support money is intended to cover prospective wants of the wife it is more in keeping with the reason of the law that the judgment should provide for installment payments." This construction of the decree would not have the effect of invalidating the provision impressing a lien on the husband's property for the payment of the installments for maintenance as they became due. Civ.Code, § 140; Huellmantel v. Huellmantel, 124 Cal. 583, 57 P. 582. See, also, Murray v. Murray, 115 Cal. 266, 47 P. 37, 37 L.R.A. 626, 56 Am.St.Rep. 97. Its only practical effect would be to terminate the payments in the event of the wife's death or remarriage, when in equity they should no longer be subject to her claim.

[5] The question remaining is whether an award totalling one-half the monthly gross income, after deducting payments for taxes, repairs and on encumbrances, is excessive. The findings do not show definitely to what sum the deductions thus allowable would amount, although there is some intimation they may equal the amount which the plaintiff receives in addition to his salary or sick benefits. The monthly amount, therefore, that would be left for division between the parties would appear to be $50 in time of illness and $150 in time of health of plaintiff. It would appear that if the husband has continued disabled the award would be unfair, because the remaining one-half would not be adequate to supply his needs at a time during which his former wife was not shown to be unable to contribute substantially toward her own support, if she made the effort. Upon his return to work it would appear that an equal division of the income would be excessive. A man who is regularly employed by the federal government in a responsible position requiring an alert mind, healthy body and good character must be able to do his work free from worry or undue fatigue. His requirements for transportation, clothes, food, recreation, social and religious obligations are such that he should not be limited to one-half of his salary. The marital venture herein was brief; no children are involved and the wife is not shown to be in any way disabled. A monthly deduction of $50 by the husband to help provide his own living expenses should be permitted in addition to the other deductions provided by the decree before an equal division is made between the parties.

The judgment is therefore modified to provide: (1) that plaintiff shall pay defendant as alimony one-half of his gross income after making the following deductions: (a) payments for taxes, repairs and on encumbrances as provided in the judgment in this case; (b) $50 per month toward plaintiff's own living expenses; (2) that these payments shall be applied toward the support of defendant and the attorney's fees in the proportion provided in the judgment; (3) that these payments shall continue until the total sums provided in the judgment shall have been paid, and shall then terminate; provided, however, that in case of death or remarriage of the defendant before the total sum shall have been paid, the trial court shall make an order terminating such payments as of the date of such death or remarriage, and upon such payment in full or the making of such order the lien on plaintiff's property to secure such payments shall thereupon be terminated. In all other respects the judgment is to remain the same.

As so modified the judgment is affirmed, appellant to pay the costs of this appeal.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 22, 1942.

Hearing Denied Feb. 19, 1942.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1178(6)

In surviving wife's action to cancel written waiver and election to take under husband's will, judgment refusing cancellation would be reversed in order that specific evidence could be taken on question whether husband's property was community or separate, where minds of counsel did not meet on stipulation relating to nature of property, and trial judge was misled as to nature of property by statements of counsel, and decision could not be upheld if in fact the property was community property.

2. Wills ⇐785

If there was a "hurt" to the wife, a husband, procuring wife's signature to waiver and election to take under husband's will, derived an "advantage" within rule that all transactions between husband and wife by which one obtains any advantage from the other are presumed to be entered into by the latter without consideration and under undue influence. Civ.Code, § 158.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Advantage".

3. Appeal and error ⇐909(4)

On appeal from judgment refusing to cancel wife's written waiver and election to take under husband's will, District Court of Appeal was required to presume that the entire estate which passed under husband's will was community property, in absence of evidence on the point.

4. Wills ⇐785

A wife signing waiver and election to take under husband's will was "hurt", and therefore husband obtained "advantage" within rule that all transactions between husband and wife by which one obtains any advantage from the other are presumed to be entered into by the latter without consideration and under undue influence, where wife would receive a lesser amount through waiver and election than she would have received had she not signed waiver and election. Civ.Code, § 158.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Hurt".

5. Wills ⇐785

In surviving wife's action to cancel written waiver and election to take under husband's will, finding that it was not true that wife did not receive any consideration for her waiver and election was not sustained, where the presumption was that the property was all community property, and was not that the property was all the husband's separate property.

6. Wills ⇐785

In surviving wife's action to cancel written waiver to take under husband's will, husband's representatives had the burden to show not only that there was some consideration, but an adequate consideration for the waiver and election by the wife, in view of rule that all transactions between husband and wife by which one obtains any advantage from the other are presumed to be entered into by the latter without consideration and under undue influence. HANSON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the surviving wife of the decedent testator from a judgment refusing to cancel her written "waiver and election," which she signed in her husband's lifetime, to take under his will. The instrument, in question, not only authorized the husband to dispose of his separate property but the community property as well, with an election on the wife's part to take in accordance with the will. There was no consideration for the wife's unilateral promise at the time the instrument was executed by her, other than a legally implied promise of the husband that he would not make a testamentary disposition except by the will, to which her written "waiver and election" was annexed. On the record before us the controlling question is whether the evidence sustains the judgment.

The facts necessary to be stated as a background in the light of which our decision must be resolved are these: Plaintiff-appellant was born and reared in England. She was educated by a governess until she was 15 years of age, and thereafter by her mother until her marriage. She married the testator in 1906. The following year they came to America to reside, and from 1918 to the death of her husband in October, 1936, they lived in California. They had no children. The record indicates that the parties were on the very best of terms throughout their married life. The wife had no business experience whatsoever, and so she was accustomed to sign whatever leases, deeds or business papers her husband placed before her without reading them or questioning him concerning them.

On or prior to March 4, 1936, the testator wrote out his will in longhand. While the record is not too clear on the point, it seems that the waiver and election clause here involved, which likewise was in his own hand, was not appended to the will at the time he first brought the will to his wife's attention. But whether it was or was not, it is clear that she did not see the clause until she actually attached her signature to it. According to her testimony the first intimation she had that her husband proposed to draft or had drafted his will was in their home on March 4, 1936, when he brought it out and proceeded to read it to her. In the course of his reading he got as far as the paragraph which provided that his own sister was to receive the sum of $100 per month for the balance of her natural life. At that point in his reading his wife interrupted to observe that the amount was inadequate, as his sister had been accustomed to much more in the past. It appears that this observation nettled the husband, and he immediately got up, threw the will upon his chair and stalked from the room. While the wife then, and for several days after, had an opportunity to read the will, as he had left it with her, she did not do so. After the incident mentioned the wife placed the will on her husband's desk in his den. In the course of a few days he took it and then kept it until on a morning subsequently, when he called his wife into the den, handed her a pen and requested that she sign the will. When she then asked him why it was necessary for her to sign his will, he replied: "Edith, I am in a hurry. Sign this will." Thereupon she signed the waiver and election clause upon the blank line provided for her signature, without reading either the will or the clause, and without knowledge of the contents of either and without having had the waiver and election clause read over to her or by her. She testified that she did not know she was making an election with reference to her property rights, and that her husband never explained the provision he was making for her in his will nor the effect of her act. Moreover, she did not have the slightest knowledge of the size of his estate or how much of it was community property. As a matter of fact, the testimony is that for some time prior to his death his monthly allowance to her for the payment of living expenses was in the neighborhood of $100. During that period it was her understanding that "he had lost all of his possessions." Actually, when he died his estate inventoried in excess of $500,000.

[1] In his opening statement on the trial below, counsel for the executors announced that as the action was for cancellation of the "waiver and election" it appeared to him it was unnecessary that any evidence should be introduced showing the nature of the property of which the husband died possessed—that is to say, whether it was community or separate property—and accordingly he sought a stipulation to that effect from counsel for the wife. Counsel for the wife thereupon, in substance, stated that he saw no need for an exact determination as to what property was community and what was separate, if it was understood, for want of evidence on the point, that the presumption would be that the property was community property and hence that the wife, by her waiver and election, had given up one-half of the property without any adequate consideration therefor. Without relating in detail the statements made by respective counsel, we think it is clear from the record that the minds of the respective counsel never met on the stipulation; that counsel for the executors did not appreciate the point made by counsel for the wife, and that the trial judge was misled by the various statements of counsel into believing that not only would there be no issue as to separate or community property upon which he would have to find, but additionally we think that he understood that he was entitled to class the estate as being separate property rather than community property. As we are of the opinion that the trial court was required to assume that all of the property was community property, and if it in fact was community property that the decision below cannot be upheld, we conclude that the case must be reversed in order that specific evidence may be taken on the question. Our reasons for so holding will be made clear as we proceed.

Initially it needs to be pointed out that the trial court specifically found that when the wife signed the waiver and election she had complete trust and confidence in her husband and in his business ability and legal knowledge, and that she did not know the nature of community or separate property or her rights thereto, nor did she know the extent of her husband's estate. The court additionally found she was not familiar with business practices, customs or usages, and that her husband did not explain to her the nature and extent of her act in signing the waiver and election.

Notwithstanding these findings the court found that the husband did not use any coercion in procuring his wife's signature; that he made no misrepresentations respecting the "waiver and election," and did not exert any undue influence upon her; that she could have sought independent counsel and advice before she signed, and that there was plenty of opportunity on her part to have done so. Additionally the court found that it was not true, as she had averred, that she received no consideration for signing the waiver and election. Upon the findings as made the court drew the conclusion that the waiver was valid and that there was no ground for its cancellation as prayed.

Upon the facts as narrated appellant bases her claim that, as a matter of law, there was undue influence and coercion of a character that should permit her to avoid the waiver and election, thus enabling her to claim her statutory right in the estate.

[2] Our statute (Civ.Code, sec. 158) provides that all contract transactions between a husband and wife are subject to the general rules which control the acts of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined in the title on trusts. In passing upon that statute our Supreme Court, in White v. Warren, 120 Cal. 322, 49 P. 129, 52 P. 723, said: "As applied to the relations of husband and wife, the aforesaid section 2235 may be read as follows: 'All transactions between the husband and wife, by which one obtains any advantage from the other, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without consideration, and under undue influence.'" (Italics ours.) The foregoing case lays down the test which we must apply in consideration of the facts of the instant case.

The phrase "any advantage," as used in the statute and in the case cited above, has not been defined by any decision in this state. Yet the same phrase is found in a federal statute; and while it is there used in an altogether different setting, it has been defined by the Supreme Court of the United States in a manner which we think suggests the definition we should likewise give to the phrase as here used. In Gorin v. United States, Jan. 13, 1941, 312 U.S. 19, 61 S.Ct. 429, 435, 85 L.Ed. 488, it was held that under the Espionage Act, 50 U.S.C.A. § 31 et seq., making it a crime for a person to obtain information relating to the national defense "to be used * * * to the advantage of any foreign nation," the word "advantage" meant "either to our hurt or another's gain." (Italics ours.) In short, the Supreme Court held that it was not necessary in a case involving the statute to show that a foreign country had gained an advantage, but it was sufficient to show the "hurt" to the United States. If that definition be here accepted as appropriate, then an advantage may be said to have been derived by the husband in this case if it be shown that there was a "hurt" to the wife.

[3, 4] In the instant case we are required to presume, as no evidence was introduced on the point, that the entire estate which passed under the decedent's will was community property. Estate of Bryant, 3 Cal.2d 58, 43 P.2d 529; Estate of Jolly, 196 Cal. 547, 238 P. 353.

That being true, it follows that except for the waiver and election the wife would have been entitled to one-half of the estate, or in excess of $250,000. All she gets under the will of her husband, except for a small amount of personal property, is a monthly payment, to be made to her by the trustees of the will, of $250 for a period of 15 years, and thereafter at the age of 69, if she should live so long, she will be entitled to receive one-third of the then existing estate. In short, if she lives until she attains 69 years of age she will have received over the fifteen years period the sum of $45,000, and she will then be entitled to one-third of the then existing estate. Whether these two items, added together, would amount to as much as $250,000 is of course problematical. But aside from that, she will not receive the interest which the one-half of the estate has earned over the years. Accordingly it is clear that through the waiver and election she will receive a lesser amount, in any view, than she would have received had she not signed it—assuming, of course, that the entire estate is community property, which is the assumption which we must here make. Therefore it is clear that the wife was "hurt"; and likewise it seems clear that except for the mutual promises there was no consideration whatever for the signature, and that the husband received a definite advantage.

[5, 6] While the court did find that it was not true that the wife did not receive any consideration for her waiver and election, there is no evidence to sustain the finding. Such a finding could be sustained on this record only if there was a presumption that the property was the husband's separate property; but, as we have seen, the presumption is that it was all community property. Moreover, the statute which is here controlling places the burden upon the husband's representatives to show not only that there was some consideration, but an "adequate consideration," for the waiver and election by the wife.

In Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 204 P. 583, 589, the wife by a post-nuptial agreement relinquished her right in her husband's estate, valued upon his death at $200,000, for a present consideration, which was paid to her, of $14,000 in cash. In affirming a holding that the consideration was inadequate the court said: "* * * she [the wife] * * * released her expectancy to a substantial portion of a $200,000 estate in return for a consideration obviously inadequate; * * * the agreement was drafted at the direction of the deceased and executed by the widow at his instigation 'in respect for the wishes' of the deceased, without any disclosure by him to her of the then value and character of his estate or of the rights which she was called upon to surrender by the agreement. * * * Accepting the agreement in the belief that the deceased was dealing honestly with her, she was justified in resting in that belief, and was not called upon then or thereafter to make independent inquiry as to his good faith." The following later cases cite the rule stated in the Cover case, supra: Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 1924, 194 Cal. 73, 227 P. 715; Bryson v. Byrer, 1927, 87 Cal.App. 320, 262 P. 461—wherein the court states that it was the duty of the defendant to overcome the statutory presumption of lack of sufficient consideration and the exercise of undue influence; Dale v. Dale, 1927, 87 Cal.App. 359, 262 P. 339; Smith v. Lombard, 1927, 201 Cal. 518, 258 P. 55; Donze v. Donze, 1928, 88 Cal.App. 769, 264 P. 294; Brown v. Canadian Industrial Alcohol Co., Ltd., 1930, 209 Cal. 596, 289 P. 613.

Accordingly, as we are of the view that the judgment cannot stand because no adequate consideration for the waiver and election is shown, we need not stop to discuss the other contentions urged by appellant.

Judgment reversed.

McCOMB, J., concurred.

W. J. WOOD, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. In my opinion the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court. In Estate of Cover, cited in the majority opinion, the trial court found that the agreement between the husband and the wife was brought about by undue influence, and the reviewing court held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings. In the case now before us the findings are in favor of respondents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles W. Fricke, Judge.

Alex L. Grijalva was convicted of selling marihuana and from judgment of conviction and an order denying application for probation and from the sentence, he appeals.

Appeals from order denying probation and from sentence dismissed and judgment of conviction affirmed.

Jesse Bach Porter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Gilbert F. Nelson, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

Appellant was found guilty by a jury of violations of section 11160 of the Health and Safety Code, St.1939, p. 758, as charged in an information containing two counts, to-wit: (1) of selling, furnishing or giving away marihuana on or about February 27, 1941; (2) a similar offense committed at a later date. This appeal is taken from the judgment of conviction, from the order denying application for probation and from the sentence.

[1, 2] No appeal lies from the sentence (People v. Dunlap, 12 Cal.App.2d 333, 336, 55 P.2d 522), and the order denying the application for probation is not appealable, it having been made before judgment. People v. Brock, 21 Cal.App.2d 601, 604, 70 P.2d 210.

Appellant urges that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence and is not supported by competent evidence; that because of prejudice of the trial court, error was committed in the pronouncement of sentence and in the denial of appellant's application for probation; and that the court acted without jurisdiction in pronouncing the judgment and sentence.

The evidence presented by the prosecution reveals that officer Simmons of the Narcotic Division of the Los Angeles Police Department was introduced to appellant on February 27, 1941, by a man named Willis, who was acquainted with appellant, and who told officer Simmons that appellant "would be in a position to maker proper connections." Said officer and appellant drove to a place designated by the latter and after considerable discussion the officer gave appellant $5 "to go and get the marihuana from the particular connection where he was going." A short time thereafter appellant returned in company with one Ramon Contreras, and handed officer Simmons a package containing twenty cigarettes (People's Exhibit 1) which was identified by said officer by markings which he had made thereon. The police chemist testified that these were marihuana cigarettes.

It was testified by officer Simmons that he again saw appellant on March 6, 1941, the date on which it is alleged the second offense was committed. On this occasion said officer again gave appellant $5, but this time asked for a can rather than for cigarettes. Appellant returned in about half an hour and "said he was sorry he could not get a can but he could get me sticks which would be the same as cigarettes, the term for cigarettes." After an interval and some conversation, appellant returned and gave said officer "two packages of sticks * * * twenty cigarettes," which, when introduced in evidence, were marked "3-6-41" together with the initials of officer Simmons.

At a later date, testified by officer Simmons as being "on Sunday morning about 10 o'clock the 30th of March of this year," officer Smith accompanied officer Simmons to a meeting place with appellant, where officer Simmons talked to appellant and spoke about the good quality of the marihuana appellant had furnished theretofore. At this time officer Simmons gave appellant $6 in the presence of officer Smith, and appellant left to obtain a can of marihuana. On this occasion appellant failed to obtain the drug and officer Simmons called the police department and had officers Chitwood and Kearney come out and place appellant under arrest.

Officer Chitwood testified to a conversation with appellant after his arrest, to-wit:

"We arrested the defendant at—down on Stanford Avenue—that is, on Pico near Stanford, I should say, and had him brought into the office. This was about 7:15 p. m., I believe. When he saw Simmons—I introduced Simmons to him as an officer, and I said, 'Do you recall selling some marihuana cigarettes?' and mentioned the date to him, 'to this officer here?' 'Well,' he said, 'I remember selling them, but I wasn't in the business.' He said, 'I just sold them for another fellow on commission;' and he said, 'I needed a little money, I wanted to make 50 cents for myself to buy a drink or something like that, so I sold the marihuana.' As I recall, I then asked him about the time that the two officers testified to, regarding the sale of six dollars worth, and he laughed and said, 'Well, I just meant to take them for that $6.00'."

As a defense witness, appellant produced Ramon Contreras who, according to officer Simmons' testimony, was present when appellant made the first delivery of marihuana cigarettes to him. In testifying for the defense, Contreras stated the first time he had ever seen officer Simmons was in the county jail on April 8, 1941, subsequent to the time the offenses here charged were committed. On cross-examination, however, Contreras admitted that he had been convicted of selling narcotics and that the officers who testified against him were officers Simmons and Smith.

Appellant took the stand in his own defense and denied ever having had any marihuana in his possession or of ever having known any of the officers prior to the time of his arrest.

Appellant argues that there is no evidence that he made a sale of marihuana, and that if he did make a sale the evidence discloses the defense of entrapment.

[3] It was shown by the prosecution that the officer gave appellant $5 on two different occasions and on each occasion appellant returned and gave to the officer twenty marihuana cigarettes. In each transaction appellant took the money of the officer, obtained the cigarettes and delivered them to said officer. This constituted a sale.

On the question of entrapment, it was stated in the case of People v. Rucker, 121 Cal.App. 361, 364, 8 P.2d 938, 939:

"The appellant claims that he was entrapped. The evidence furnishing the basis for this argument is to the effect that one Aristo introduced one Robinson, a police officer, to the defendant; that Robinson thereupon asked defendant for some morphine. The defendant left the officer and Aristo, brought some of the forbidden drug and gave it to Robinson in exchange for ten dollars. In People v. Harris, 80 Cal.App. 328, 251 P. 823, the defendant was asked to sell liquor to one of the arresting officers, and we held that there was nothing to authorize the jury in believing that the defendant was inveigled into the commission of the crime, or that the officers had been the procuring cause or instigators of the criminal intent. That authority forecloses appellant's argument."

[4, 5] In the case of People v. Lee, 9 Cal. App.2d 99, 109, 48 P.2d 1003, 1007, the court stated on the same subject: "It is our understanding that the defense of entrapment is a positive defense imposing upon an accused the burden of showing that he was induced to commit the act for which he is being prosecuted. The invocation of the defense necessarily assumes that the act charged as a public offense was committed. The record shows that both appellant and his wife testified in his behalf during the trial. Neither of these witnesses at any time admitted that appellant made the sales or either of them. On the contrary, both denied that any sale was made or that appellant had any narcotics in his possession. There was no intimation that appellant was ever lured or persuaded into making a sale to Ng Loon. The record is bare of any evidence which tends to show that any persuasion or inducement was offered to appellant to make the sales outside the ordinary transaction of purchase and sale between a willing purchaser and a willing seller. People v. Makovsky, supra, [3 Cal.2d 366, 44 P.2d 536]. It is our conclusion that appellant's claim that the evidence established the defense of entrapment is untenable. People v. Harris, 80 Cal.App. 328, 251 P. 823; People v. Rucker, 121 Cal.App. 361, 8 P.2d 938."

[6] Appellant contends that the verdicts rendered do not refer to the information for the reason that there is no "State Narcotic Act." The verdicts read: "We, the Jury in the above entitled action, find the Defendant guilty of Violation of the State Narcotic Act, a felony, as charged in Count #1 of the Information * * * as charged in Count #2 of the Information."

Section 1404 of the Penal Code provides: "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect of a substantial right."

Both verdicts refer to the information and unmistakably express an intention to convict appellant of the crimes charged therein, therefore the form of the verdict must be regarded as immaterial.

[7, 8] Appellant urges there is no competent evidence to support the verdict in that officer Simmons was an accomplice and there was no corroboration of his testimony. There is no merit in this contention. One "who feigns complicity in the commission of a crime merely for the purpose of detecting and prosecuting the perpetrators is not an accomplice." 8 Cal.Jur. 175; People v. Fitzgerald, 14 Cal.App.2d 180, 199, 58 P.2d 718.

It is contended that certain remarks made by the trial judge at the time he denied appellant's application for probation indicated that he "had pre-judged the defendant." The remarks objected to are as follows:

"This defendant seems to believe the way to get out of difficulty is to make false accusations against the officers on some theory that relieves him from liability for the offense committed by him."

In answer to the statement of appellant's counsel: "I am thoroughly convinced there is some doubt as to his guilt," the trial judge replied: "There isn't any doubt in my mind.

I think one of the officers on the Los Angeles Police force whose integrity I have never heard questioned is Captain Chitwood, who for quite a long while was head of the Narcotic Squad. Among other things there appears in this file the following: 'This subject is well known to the officers of this Department as a persistent violator of the Narcotic Laws. This man was a partner of Ramon Contreras, one of the larger dealers in marihuana who was recently convicted. This subject is known as a bad man and has made threats to get the officers who apprehended him when he gets out'."

[9, 10] The granting or denying of an application for probation is a matter within the discretion of the trial judge, and the fact that he made the quoted remark and read the quoted excerpt from the probation officer's report is not sufficient to show an abuse of such discretion.

There is no merit in appellant's final point.

The appeals from the order denying probation and from the sentence are dismissed; the judgment of conviction is affirmed.

WESTERN PIPE & STEEL CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 11755.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 13, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 11, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 12, 1942.

1. Workmen's compensation ⇐768

Generally, compensation is not allowed under the Compensation Act for injuries received by an employee while going to or from meals, since an employee on such an errand is not rendering any service for his employer.

2. Workmen's compensation ⇐719

Generally, under what is known as the "going or coming rule," compensation is denied under the Compensation Act for injuries received by an employee while going to or coming from work, since such injuries normally do not arise out of, nor occur in course of, the employment.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Going or Coming Rule".

3. Workmen's compensation ⇐766

For recovery of compensation under the Compensation Act, it is not indispensable that at time of injury an employee was rendering service to his employer.

4. Workmen's compensation ⇐654, 655, 660

Acts of an employee for his personal comfort and convenience, while at work, such as taking a drink of water, lighting a cigarette, warming himself, etc., do not interrupt the continuity of the employment, and do not preclude recovery of compensation under the Compensation Act, and such exception to the general rule is not limited to acts performed on the employer's premises.

5. Workmen's compensation ⇐768

Though injuries received by employees while going to or from their meals are generally not compensable, the employer may expressly or impliedly agree that service shall continue during such period, and when the employer pays the employee at an hourly rate during his meal hours, especially when the meals are taken during an overtime period, the employer is deemed to have impliedly agreed that the service will continue during the meal hours.

6. Workmen's compensation ⇐719, 721

Generally, an injury sustained by an employee in going to or from work is not an injury "arising out of and in course of employment" within meaning of the Compensation Act, but an exception is made where the employee's compensation covers the time involved in going to or from his work, or an allowance is made for the cost of transportation.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Arising Out Of And In Course Of Employment".

7. Workmen's compensation ⇐768

When an employee is required to work overtime immediately after his normal period of work, and such overtime period includes the normal eating period, and the employer agrees that the employee may eat off the premises and shall be paid during the period, the finder of fact is justified in inferring that by such arrangement the employer has impliedly agreed that the employment shall continue and that the employee shall be deemed to be rendering service during such period, so as to entitle the employee to compensation for injuries sustained during that period.

8. Workmen's compensation ⇐1575

Where employer allowed employees working overtime a half hour off for dinner, paid them during the dinner period, and permitted them to eat off premises, and employee left employer's premises to eat dinner and was struck by automobile during dinner period, evidence sustained commission's finding that the injuries were compensable as "arising out of and in course of employment".

9. Workmen's compensation ⇐1558

Where employer allowed employees working overtime a half hour off for dinner, paid them during the dinner period, and permitted them to eat off premises, and employee left employer's premises for purpose of eating dinner, and during the dinner period employee received fatal injuries when he allegedly stopped to buy cigarettes, evidence supported commission's implied finding that the alleged purchase of cigarettes was such a slight "deviation" that it did not take employee outside his employment and did not preclude recovery under the Compensation Act.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Deviation".

10. Workmen's compensation ⇐610

If a particular act is reasonably contemplated by employment, injuries received by an employee while performing the act are compensable injuries "arising out of employment".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Arising Out Of Employment".

11. Workmen's compensation ⇐606

In determining whether a particular act is reasonably contemplated by employment so that an injury received while performing such act may be compensable, the nature of the act, the nature of the employment, the custom and usage of a particular employment, the terms of the contract of employment, and other factors should be considered, and any reasonable doubt as to whether the act is contemplated by the employment, in view of the policy of liberal construction in favor of the employee, should be resolved in favor of the employee.

Proceeding by the Western Pipe & Steel Company of California, petitioner, to annul a death benefit award made under the Workmen's Compensation Act by the Industrial Accident Commission, respondent, in favor of Harriet E. Henderson, respondent, widow of John H. Henderson, deceased employee.

Award affirmed.

Hearing denied; GIBSON, C. J., and HOUSER, J., dissenting.

Keith & Creede, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

By this review proceeding petitioner, Western Pipe and Steel Co. of California, seeks to annul a death benefit award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the widow of John H. Henderson. Henderson was employed by petitioner at the time of his death. It is urged by petitioner that the death of Henderson did not arise out of, nor did it occur in the course of, Henderson's employment.

The facts are not substantially in dispute and are as follows: The decedent was employed as a shipwright-carpenter at the shipyards of petitioner. His regular hours of work were from 8 a. m. to 4:30 p. m., with half an hour off for lunch. Employees were frequently required to work overtime because part of their work had to be adjusted to the tides. When they did work overtime they would work from 4:30 p. m., their normal quitting time, to 8:30 p. m., and would receive compensation for these four hours at a rate stated by petitioner to be double their regular hourly wage. Under the arrangement with petitioner the employees were permitted to take half an hour off for dinner during the four-hour overtime period, and the company paid them during this dinner period at the double time rate. The employees took this half hour for dinner at no set time, but whenever the employee in charge found it most convenient. The company maintained a cafeteria on its premises for the convenience of its employees. If employees ate at the cafeteria the meals were paid for by the employees. The employees were free to eat elsewhere if they desired.

A fellow employee of decedent testified that on the evening in question the cafeteria was closed at the period when decedent took time off for dinner. He communicated this fact to decedent shortly before 6 p. m. The decedent determined to eat at a restaurant in nearby South San Francisco. He, thereupon, left in his automobile for the purpose of securing his dinner. While on this errand, and apparently while crossing the street after parking his car, he was struck by an unidentified passing motorist, and was injured so severely that he died a short time thereafter.

The commission found, and in support of its holding urges, that the death arose out of, and in the course of, the employment. The petitioner contends that the law is well-settled that an employer is not responsible for the act of, or injury to, an employee while the latter is off the premises for the purpose of securing his personal meals. There are many cases holding that injuries received by an employee while on his way to or from meals are normally not compensable. California C. I. Exch. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 433, 213 P. 257; Peccolo v. City of Los Angeles, 8 Cal.2d 532, 66 P.2d 651; Kish v. California S. Automobile Ass'n, 190 Cal. 246, 212 P. 27; Clapp's P. Station v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 51 Cal.App. 624, 197 P. 369; Adams v. Tuxedo Land Co., 92 Cal. App. 266, 267 P. 926; Carnes v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 21 Cal.App.2d 568, 69 P.2d 998, 70 P.2d 717; Helm v. Bagley, 113 Cal.App. 602, 298 P. 826; Cain v. Marquez, 31 Cal. App.2d 430, 88 P.2d 200; Martinelli v. Stabnau, 11 Cal.App.2d 38, 52 P.2d 956; California Highway Comm. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 61 Cal.App. 284, 214 P. 658.

[1-4] The basis of some of the cases which deny the employee compensation for injuries received while going to or from meals is that while the employee is on such an errand he is not rendering any service for his employer. Other cases recognize that this is merely one part of the so-called "going or coming" rule—i. e., that injuries received while going to or coming from work normally do not arise out of, nor occur in the course of, the employment. There are, of course, many exceptions to both rules. It is not indispensable to recovery that at the time of the injury an employee must be rendering service to his employer. Acts of the employee for his personal comfort and convenience while at work, such as taking a drink of water, lighting a cigarette, warming himself, etc., do not interrupt the continuity of the employment. This exception is not limited to acts performed on the employer's premises. In Western Pac. R. R. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 413, 224 P. 754, a messenger was struck by an automobile while returning on his bicycle to his place of employment from his home where he had gone to get his raincoat when a storm came up while he was outside performing service for his employer. The injury was held conpensable. In Leffert v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 219 Cal. 710, 28 P.2d 911, the deceased employee, a salesman, was required to report each morning at the employer's plant to receive directions for the day. After getting their instructions, salesmen customarily had a cup of coffee together at a nearby coffee shop. On the morning in question the salesmen, on arrival, found the plant on fire and were directed to report at another office to receive instructions. Before going to this office the employees followed their usual custom of having a cup of coffee. The deceased, after finishing his coffee, announced his intention of returning to the burning building to retrieve his overcoat. While crossing the street to the building he was hit by an automobile. It is held that the injury was compensable, and an award denying recovery was annulled. See, also, Whiting-Mead Commercial Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 505, 173 P. 1105, 5 A.L.R. 1518.

There are also many exceptions to the "going and coming" rule. These exceptions need not be summarized here except to point out that in two recent decisions the Supreme Court has considerably broadened the scope of such exceptions. Freire v. Matson Navigation Co., 19 Cal.2d 8, 118 P.2d 809; Smith v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 18 Cal.2d 843, 118 P.2d 6.

[5] Although the above cases have only an indirect bearing on the specific problem involved in this proceeding, they do demonstrate that the "going and coming" rule, and the rule that the employee must be rendering service for the employer at the time of injury are not of inevitable application. The cases cited by petitioner certainly establish that injuries received while going to or coming from meals are normally not compensable. None of the cases cited, however, involved a factual and legal situation comparable to that involved in the instant case. Here we have an employee whose normal day's work would terminate at 4:30 p. m. When he came to work in the morning he had no way of knowing whether or not he would be asked to work overtime that night, so that it was impossible to plan for his dinner. When he worked overtime, as he did on the night of his death, the overtime period started at 4:30 p. m., his normal quitting time, and continued to 8:30 p. m. He was paid double his normal hourly wage during this four-hour period. The employer apparently realized that men could not be expected to work at their highest efficiency without food during this overtime period, and for that reason agreed that they should have half an hour off for the purpose of securing their dinner. As already pointed out, normally when employees are going to or from their meals they are not rendering a service to their employers and for that reason injuries received during those periods are not compensable. But, of course, the employer may expressly or impliedly agree that service shall continue during the period the employee is going to or coming from his meals taken off the premises. When the employer pays the employee at an hourly rate during his meal hours, especially when those meals are taken during an overtime period, it seems to be, and is a reasonable inference, that by such an arrangement the employer has impliedly agreed that service will continue during such period.

[6] This is not a new or novel concept. The problem has frequently been presented in connection with cases where the employee's compensation covers the time he is going to or coming from work. In such situations the courts have quite uniformly held that injuries received while going to or from work are compensable. The problem is discussed in an annotation appearing in 87 A.L.R. 250 entitled: "Right to compensation for injury while going to or from work as affected by fact that compensation covers the time involved or cost of transportation, or both." It is there stated:

"It is a general though not invariable rule, so common as to require no citation of authority, that an injury sustained in going to or from work does not arise out of and in the course of the employment within the meaning of workmen's compensation acts.

"An exception to this rule, however, is generally recognized where the employee's compensation covers the time involved in going to or from his work, or an allowance is made for the cost of transportation."

Many cases are then discussed. Running through the cases is the thought that by agreeing to pay the employee from the time he leaves home until the time he returns, the employer has agreed that the employment shall be continuous during such period. The courts frequently emphasize that such rule has special application to cases where the employee is required to work extra hours. This thought was expressed by the United States Supreme Court in Voehl v. Indemnity Ins. Co., 288 U.S. 162, at page 169, 53 S.Ct. 380, 383, 77 L.Ed. 676, 87 A.L.R. 245, in the following language: "While service on regular hours at a stated place generally begins at that place, there is always room for agreement by which the service may be taken to begin earlier or elsewhere. Service in extra hours or on special errands has an element of distinction which the employer may recognize by agreeing that such service shall commence when the employee leaves his home on the duty assigned to him and shall continue until his return. An agreement to that effect may be either express or be shown by the course of business. In such case the hazards of the journey may properly be regarded as hazards of the service, and hence within the purview of the Compensation Act." See, also, MacClelland v. Dodge Bros., 233 App. Div. 504, 253 N.Y.S. 773, appeal dismissed, 259 N.Y. 565, 182 N. E. 183; Ohmen v. Adams Bros., 109 Conn. 378, 146 A. 825; Cymbor v. Binder Coal Co., 285 Pa. 440, 132 A. 363; Sapulpa Refining Co. v. State Industrial Commission, 91 Okl. 53, 215 P. 933; and other cases cited in the A.L.R. note, supra.

[7, 8] Obviously, if an employee is deemed to be acting in the course of his employment in going to or coming from his work when his compensation covers that time, it would seem clear that he is likewise acting within the course of his employment when his hourly wage continues during the time he is permitted to eat lunch or dinner off the premises. Certainly it can at least be said that, when the employee is required to work overtime immediately after his normal period of work, and such overtime period includes the normal eating period, and the employer agrees that the employee may eat off the premises and shall be paid during the period, the finder of the fact is justified in inferring that by such arrangement the employer has impliedly agreed that the employment shall continue and that the employee shall be deemed to be rendering service during such period.

The above discussion is based on the premise that the employee was either going to or coming from his dinner when he was killed. In its petition for rehearing, which was denied, the employer offered to prove by after-discovered evidence, that decedent, at the time he was struck, was crossing the street to his parked car after having purchased cigarettes. The evidence introduced at the original hearing was quite sketchy. It was simply that shortly before 6 p. m. decedent left the employer's premises for the purpose of going to South San Francisco to get his dinner, and that a very short time thereafter he was killed in South San Francisco.

[9-11] Even if it be assumed that the deceased at the immediate moment was crossing the street after purchasing cigarettes, if the commission was justified in finding that the implied agreement was that service should continue during the half-hour eating period, such service would not terminate simply because the employee stopped to buy cigarettes. If such evidence had been introduced on the original hearing or on the rehearing, the commission could have found as a fact that such personal act was reasonably contemplated by the employment. In such event the act would be deemed to have arisen out of and to have occurred in the course of the employment. Whiting-Mead Commercial Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 37 Cal.App.2d 567, 99 P.2d 1089. The question is one of fact. By its denial of the petition for rehearing, it may be assumed that it was the opinion of the commission that, had the evidence in reference to the purchase of the cigarettes been introduced, nevertheless it would have found as a fact that such slight deviation did not take the employee outside his employment. Such implied finding is amply supported by reasonable inferences from the record. As was said in Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra, 37 Cal.App.2d at page 573, 99 P.2d at page 1092: "If the particular act is reasonably contemplated by the employment, injuries received while performing it arise out of the employment, and are compensable. In determining whether a particular act is reasonably contemplated by the employment, the nature of the act, the nature of the employment, the custom and usage of a particular employment, the terms of the contract of employment, and perhaps other factors should be considered. Any reasonable doubt as to whether the act is contemplated by the employment, in view of this state's policy of liberal construction in favor of the employee, should be resolved in favor of the employee."

For the foregoing reasons the award is affirmed.

SIMMONS et al. v. BOARD OF POLICE PENSION FUND COM'RS OF SAN MATEO COUNTY et al.

Civ. 11749.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Dec. 23, 1941.

1. Evidence ⇐29

It is common knowledge that the act enacted in 1889 to create a police relief pension fund was designed when passed to reach the police department of the city and county of San Francisco. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 6012.

2. Statutes ⇐225

Where two acts bear on the same or on kindred subjects, they must be construed together to ascertain the meaning of either.

3. Counties ⇐69(3)
Towns ⇐29

The County Peace Officers' Retirement Law constitutes a legislative declaration that the Police Pension Act, which refers expressly to a regularly constituted police department as distinguished from the miscellaneous group of peace officers such as sheriffs, constables, and their deputies, does not apply to elective peace officers of a county or township, and the provisions of the Police Pension Act are limited to those public agencies which maintain a regularly constituted police department. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 5848, §§ 9, 10; Act 6012, §§ 3, 12.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Maxwell McNutt, Judge.

Proceeding in mandamus by Fred A. Simmons and another against the Board of Police Pension Fund Commissioners of the County of San Mateo, State of California, and others, to effect petitioners' retirement under the Police Pension Act. From a judgment for defendants following the sustaining of a demurrer to the petition without leave to amend, petitioners appeal.

Affirmed.

E. C. Mahoney, of Burlingame, for appellants.

Gilbert D. Ferrell, Dist. Atty., and D. E. Sullivan, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Redwood City, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

The two petitioners sought a writ of mandate to effect their retirement under the Police Pension Act. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend.

The petitioners are both constables who have served as such in separate townships of San Mateo County for more than thirty years. The respondents are the three public officials of the county designated by the act of March 4, 1889 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1937, Act 6012) to serve as the board of police pension fund commissioners of the county, except that the sheriff is sued as one of said commissioners instead of the "chief of police" who is named as such in the act.

It is the contention of appellants that they are entitled to retire under the provisions of the foregoing act because of their service as "peace officers" for the required number of years. It is the contention of respondents that the act does not apply to "peace officers" of a county, or township, but is made applicable only to those public agencies "where a regular police department is maintained"; that a constable is an officer of a township, chosen by the electors of the township, which is a distinct political entity, citing Kenyon v. Johnson, 97 Cal.App. 552, 555, 276 P. 110. Reference is made to the statute of May 5, 1931 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1937, Act 5848), which in plain terms creates a pension fund and provides for the retirement of sheriffs, constables, and other "peace officers," but which is not applicable to San Mateo County because it provides that its terms shall be approved and accepted by the board of supervisors before it shall become effective or applicable in any specific county.

The question presented is simply one of statutory construction—whether the legislature intended Act 6012 to apply to the elective peace officers of a county or township, or whether its provisions were limited to those public agencies which maintained a "regularly constituted police department."

Section 9 of Act 5848 defines "county peace officers" as including "all sheriffs, under-sheriffs * * * constables, deputy constables * * *." Section 10 makes all such "peace officers" eligible for participation in the act after a fixed term of employment. It is entitled an act relating to "county peace officers as defined in the act" and is commonly known as the "County Peace Officers' Retirement Law."

[1] Act 6012 is entitled "an act to create a police relief * * * pension fund * * *." It was enacted in 1889 and was designed for and made use of by the city and county of San Francisco. Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 266, 22 P. 176. It was made available to anyone who had served for more than twenty years as a member "of the regularly constituted police department of any such county, city and county, city, or town * * *." Section 3. The "pension fund" out of which the benefits are to be paid is made up of certain license fees, fines for certain misdemeanors, fines imposed upon the members of the "police force" for violations of the rules of the police department and from a special appropriation "equal to two per cent of the salaries paid to the policemen * * * payable from the funds of such municipal corporation." Section 12. Prior to the amendment of 1917 this section required the treasurer to "retain from the pay of each member of police department the sum of two dollars per month" to be added to the "pension fund." It is a matter of common knowledge that this act when passed was designed to reach the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, as stated in the early case of Pennie v. Reis, supra; it was made to apply to all "counties, cities and counties, cities, and towns of the state" to avoid the constitutional inhibition against special legislation. It expressly refers to a "regularly constituted police department" as such organization is distinguished from the miscellaneous group of "peace officers" such as sheriffs, constables, and their deputies. It left the administration of the act to the "board of police commissioners" or to a special commission of three of which the "chief of police" was one. None of these officers is known to the political organization of the ordinary county.

[2] We are in accord with the view of the trial judge that "It is a familiar principle of statutory construction that where two acts bear upon the same, or upon kindred subjects, to ascertain the meaning of either they must be construed together. * * *"

[3] "It is my opinion that 5848 constitutes a legislative declaration that 6012 is inadequate to cover the instant situation which it was contemplated might arise, and it was adopted with a view of giving relief under the circumstances here involved."

The judgment is affirmed.

Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, for respondent.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for damages arising from the death of John Fowler, who was struck and killed by a truck owned and operated by the defendant. A jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant and the plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment.

The deceased was employed by a contracting firm which was engaged in building a new portion of the state highway between Beaumont and Banning. The new portion was just south of the old highway so that when it was completed there would be two roads with an unpaved strip between them. The work had commenced at Banning and was proceeding west toward Beaumont. The pavement on the new road was 26 feet wide and the paving was being done in two parallel sections each 13 feet wide. On the day in question, the southerly 13 feet of the new road had been paved several hundred feet further toward Beaumont than had the northerly 13 feet. The ground on the northerly 13 feet had been prepared for the paving material and on the northerly edge thereof a ridge of dirt about nine inches high, called a "berm," had been built up for the purpose of keeping the paving material in its proper bed.

The method used was to bring the paving material in dump trucks from a plant near Beaumont, some ten of these trucks being used on this occasion. These trucks were driven easterly on the old highway and when they arrived near the scene of the operations the drivers would turn south and after crossing the berm would head west and stop on the northerly 13 feet of the new road. The truck would then be backed between the berm and the completed half of the pavement to the point where the work was going on, where the load would be dumped in front of a spreader operated by a diesel engine. The truck would then drive away and another truck would back in, the trucks coming and unloading as often as every two or three minutes.

As these trucks passed back and forth the berm at the northerly edge of the new road would be broken down in spots and it was constantly necessary to build up and straighten this berm. This work was done with shovels by some of the men assisting in the spreading operations. At the time of the accident, John Fowler and another employee were thus working on this berm at the northerly edge of the new road and at a point about midway between the spreader and the westerly end of the completed pavement on the south half of the new road. Fowler had been employed by the general contractor for two or three months before the accident, working half a day as a truck driver and half a day as a helper around the job. For two or three weeks he had been spending half his time shoveling on this berm. He was a young man with good eyesight and hearing. In addition to the knowledge that may be assumed from his experience there was testimony that he had been warned several times by his superiors and fellow employees to watch out for the trucks, the last time being but a few days before the accident. One witness, an inspector for the State Highway Department, testified that on one occasion he pulled Fowler out of the way of a truck that was backing into the spreader and pointed out to him that he was working on the blind side of the trucks and that the truck drivers could not see him.

At the time in question, a clear day about 10 o'clock in the morning, while Fowler was thus working on the berm he was struck and killed by respondent's truck as it was being backed in to dump the load in front of the spreader. The respondent was an independent contractor, owning his own truck. It was customary, while the trucks were backing in for a man on the front end of the spreader to indicate where he wanted the truck to come on the 13-foot strip by holding a shovel at a spot near the front of the spreader where he desired the left-hand wheels of the truck to come. The respondent testified that on this occasion he lined up his left wheels with the shovel held by the man on the spreader, as he had done on previous trips, and that for this purpose he was looking back through the left cab window of his truck. There is evidence that at the time of the impact the respondent's truck was traveling at about the center of the 13-foot strip down which it was backing. There is also evidence that at the time Fowler was struck he had his back partly toward the spreader and that he was hit partly on his left side and partly on his back.

[1] The appellants mainly rely for reversal upon asserted errors in instructions and in this connection argue that the evidence presents a close case with a preponderance thereof favoring them and, therefore, "errors in the instructions readily assume prejudicial proportions." We are unable to agree with this contention as to the preponderance of the evidence. Had the verdict been the other way a rather close question would have been presented as to whether it was sufficiently supported.

[2] An instruction that "contributory negligence as used in these instructions means the want of ordinary care on the part of the deceased person which contributed proximately to the accident" is first attacked. It is argued that the instruction as thus given assumed that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence and, in effect, directed a verdict for the defendant. No such assumption appears and the contention is without merit. The instruction was offered by the appellants but then contained another portion applying the rule more directly to John Fowler and this accident. The court struck out that portion because the same was included, almost word for word, in another instruction which was given. The net result is that the court gave a general definition of contributory negligence which was followed by another instruction correctly giving the law of contributory negligence as it was involved in this case.

[3, 4] The appellants next contend that two instructions were improperly given as covering the doctrine of assumption of risk, which doctrine was not applicable here. The first of these instructions stated that Fowler, when he went upon the premises, "assumed all of the ordinary reasonable risks of dangers involved in the general conditions as they existed there, as they were apparent or should have been apparent to him." The second was as follows: "You are instructed that one who works at a dangerous vocation, or one who voluntarily places himself in a position of danger, cannot close his eyes to such danger or momentarily forget a known danger, but is required to exercise a quantum of care that is commensurate with such danger as may be known to him. And if he momentarily forgets such known danger or closes his eyes to such danger, and is thereby injured, and the proximate cause of his injury is his forgetfulness of such danger, or his failure to make reasonable use of his faculties under such circumstances, he cannot recover for the injury."

No attempt was made to rely on the doctrine of assumption of risk and these instructions related to the issue of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, and they were neither erroneous nor prejudicial in view of the issues and the evidence. Potts v. Crafts, 5 Cal.App.2d 83, 42 P.2d 87; Warnke v. Griffith Co., 133 Cal.App. 481, 24 P.2d 583; Ramos v. Service Bros., 118 Cal.App. 432, 5 P.2d 623. It is next urged that an instruction to the effect that the defendant could rely on the presumption that the decedent would exercise ordinary care was prejudicially erroneous because it failed to include a statement that the defendant himself must be exercising ordinary care. While the omitted matter should have been included, as has been frequently pointed out, it does not follow that the omission thereof constitutes reversible error especially under such a factual situation as here appears. This was held in a case which was strikingly similar in its essential facts to the one now before us. Ramos v. Service Bros., supra. In other instructions the jury was told that it was the duty of the defendant to exercise ordinary care in operating his truck and to avoid injuring persons engaged in working near his truck; that just as the respective rights of the deceased and the defendant were equal in every respect so also was the duty of each to exercise ordinary care under all the circumstances; and that the deceased was entitled to a similar presumption that the defendant would exercise ordinary care and obey the law. While the instruction in the form given is not to be commended no reversible error appears under the circumstances of this case.

[5] Error is next assigned in the giving of two instructions which were to the general effect that a duty rested upon the deceased to exercise an amount of care commensurate with the danger surrounding his position at the time, that the amount of care required of him must be measured by the circumstances and conditions surrounding him, and that while the rights of the deceased and of the defendant were equal in every respect, including the right to be where they were at the time, it was the duty of each to exercise ordinary care under all of the circumstances and the deceased could not rely upon the assumption that he would not be injured by a passing truck but was required to keep such a lookout for such trucks as an ordinarily prudent person would keep under similar circumstances. The appellants concede that these instructions are in themselves correct but argue that they become erroneous and prejudicial for the reason that the court refused to give two other instructions offered by them, with the result that the criticized instructions placed a greater burden of care on the decedent than on the defendant. The instructions were not only proper but they were not rendered erroneous by the refusal of the two other instructions referred to, the substance of which was sufficiently covered in other instructions which were given. The instructions did not place a greater burden of care on the decedent than on the defendant and the point thus raised is without merit.

[6, 7] The appellants next complain of the court's refusal to give an instruction to the effect that forgetfulness of a known danger in order to constitute negligence must be such that the forgetfulness or lack of memory constitutes a failure to use ordinary care, and that the deceased was not chargeable with contributory negligence, as a matter of law, merely because he momentarily forgot the existence of the trucks. No claim was made that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law and the issue was presented to the jury as a question of fact. The first part of this refused instruction was sufficiently covered in another instruction which was essentially to the same effect and in which the jury was told that while a person could not close his eyes to known dangers it was necessary that forgetfulness of a known danger must be such as to be a failure to exercise care under the circumstances in order that the same constitute negligence. The jury was sufficiently instructed in this regard and no error in that connection appears.

[8, 9] The last point raised is that the court erred in admitting two items of evidence over the objection of the appellants. One of the other workmen was allowed to testify that when he shoveled on this berm he watched out for trucks backing into the area where the accident occurred. Conceding that this was error no prejudice appears since at least three witnesses for the appellants testified, without objection, that this was the customary procedure. In the other instance, a witness who had been a superintendent on this job, was allowed to testify that the respondent had been driving a truck on that job for nearly three weeks and that he had had no trouble with him in the methods of his operations. While we think this evidence should not have been admitted no prejudice appears and it cannot be held, under the circumstances of this case, that its reception could have conceivably affected the result. As we view it, this is not a close case and any errors which appear are neither sufficient to justify nor to require a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by Nackey S. Meanley, as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Ellen Browning Scripps, deceased, against Charles J. McColgan, as Franchise Tax Commissioner, etc., to recover state income taxes paid under protest. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney and Valentine Brookes, Deputy Attys. Gen., for appellant.

Irve C. Boldman, of San Diego, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Defendant Franchise Tax Commissioner appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff ordering that certain state income taxes paid by plaintiff under protest be refunded. The action involved several different items and the judgment entered was a lump sum money judgment. Defendant has appealed from the entire judgment. On this appeal, however, appellant concedes the correctness of the judgment in part, and attacks only the items hereafter mentioned.

So far as the issues involved on this appeal are concerned, the amended complaint alleges that Ellen Browning Scripps died testate on August 3, 1932; that the will of decedent was duly admitted to probate; that certain persons who later died were appointed executors; that plaintiff was appointed administratrix with the will annexed in June of 1939; that the executor of the estate employed two sets of attorneys to represent him as counsel in the administration of the estate; that statutory attorneys' fees allowed to the executor totaled $33,287.26; that the attorneys rendered extraordinary services "in the adjustment and payment of extensive and complicated estate and inheritance taxes, and in collecting income and conserving and managing the estate for the production of income as distinguished from the usual administrative duties incident to the collection and distribution of the assets and payment of the debts of the estate;" that the total attorneys' fees paid by the executor was $90,000. The action involves a portion of the above-mentioned fees paid for extraordinary services of the attorneys for the taxable years 1936-1937, and 1937-1938. The amended complaint alleges that during 1936-1937 $11,712.74 was paid to one attorney for his extraordinary services, and that during the second period $17,500 was paid to the other firm for such services. These sums were claimed by the estate as deductions from the income of the estate as a business expense. The complaint further alleges that the Franchise Tax Commissioner refused to allow the $11,712.74 for 1936-1937 as a deduction and reduced the $17,500 to $8,750; that the taxpayer paid a tax on these sums under protest, and instituted this action for a refund.

The trial court found that the above allegations of the amended complaint were true, and, as a conclusion of law, stated that the extraordinary attorneys' fees were paid "for extraordinary services rendered to the executor * * * in carrying on a trade or business," and, further, that the estate during the period here involved "was engaged in carrying on a trade or business in the collecting of income and in conserving and managing the assets of the estate for the production of income." Based on these findings and conclusions it was determined that the items involved were deductible and a refund ordered.

[1] The question presented on this appeal is whether the extraordinary attorneys' fees are deductible from the income of the estate under the provision of the state income tax act which permits deductions from gross income to be made for "All the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred during the taxable year in carrying on any trade or business. * * *." Personal Income Tax Act of 1935, Stats. of 1935, p. 1090, at page 1097, § 8(a); Deering's General Laws 1937, Act 8494. There can be no doubt that the attorneys' fees paid were "ordinary and necessary expenses," within the meaning of the above-quoted section, so that the real question presented is whether the estate was engaged "in carrying on any trade or business."

The record shows the following as to the activities of the estate: The assets of the estate consisted of bonds of the value of $286,550; notes of the value of $2,774,641; stocks of the value of $770,235; real property of the value of $201,933; miscellaneous $21,064. From 1935 to 1939 some of the promissory notes were renewed from time to time, some refinanced, some paid off, and some new notes issued. From 1935 to 1939 the estate received $4,894,500, as repayment on the principal of the notes, $713,140 in interest, $276,937 in dividends, $280,540 from the sale of bonds, $181,950 from the sale of stock, and $7,000 from rentals of its real property.

From 1935 to 1939 the executor employed four persons for the management of the estate in addition to the attorneys whose fees are involved in this proceeding. At least two of these employees had been employed by the testatrix in similar capacities since 1924. The attorneys rendered constant services to those in charge of the affairs of the estate, not only in connection with tax matters but in connection with the management of the estate generally.

The question as to whether such activities constitute the carrying on of a trade or business has frequently been presented to the federal courts in interpreting a similar provision of the Federal Income Tax Act from which our section was copied. In one sense, any activity that has for its aim the production of income or the conserving of assets is the carrying on of a "business." Such a definition has in fact been given by the United States Supreme Court in interpreting a different statute. Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U.S. 107, 31 S.Ct. 342, 55 L.Ed. 389, Ann.Cas.1912B, 1312. That court has determined, however, that the words "trade or business" as used in the Federal Income Tax Act have a much more limited meaning. It has been held that active concern over one's own financial interests is not sufficient to constitute the carrying on of a trade or business within the meaning of the income tax law; that before an individual or an estate can be held to be engaged in a trade or business there must be activity for profit by service to the general public. Mr. Justice Frankfurter clearly expressed this thought in his concurring opinion in the case of Deputy v. Dupont, 308 U.S. 488, at page 499, 60 S.Ct. 363, at page 369, 84 L.Ed. 416, where he stated: "To avail of the deductions allowed by § 23(a) [26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev. Code, § 23(a)], it is not enough to incur expenses in the active concern over one's own financial interest. '* * * carrying on any trade or business,' within the contemplation of § 23(a), involves holding one's self out to others as engaged in the selling of goods or services. This the taxpayer did not do. Expenses for transactions not connected with trade or business, such as an expense for handling personal investments, are not deductible."

This concept has been applied to a variety of factual situations. In Van Wart v. Commissioner, 295 U.S. 112, at page 113, 55 S.Ct. 660, 79 L.Ed. 1336, it was held that an attorney's fee paid by a guardian "for conducting litigation to secure income for [his] ward" was not a business expense. In this case the commissioner and Circuit Court of Appeals had held the expenditure personal, while the Board of Tax Appeals had held it deductible as a business expense.

Higgins v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 312 U.S. 212, 61 S.Ct. 475, 85 L. Ed. 783, involved a taxpayer with extensive interests in stocks and bonds and some real estate. He devoted a considerable portion of his time to managing his investments. He maintained an office for the supervision of his investments and paid his employees there employed $16,000 per year. He claimed that the salaries of these employees and expenses of his office were deductible as a business expense. The commissioner, Board of Tax Appeals, and circuit court held that these items were not deductible as business expenses except in so far as they were based on activities in connection with the rental of the real property. This position was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. The court specifically rejected the contention of the taxpayer that where an investor continuously and regularly devotes his time to his investments he is engaged in a business, and adopted the contention of the commissioner that "mere personal investment activities never constitute carrying on a trade or business, no matter how much of one's time or of one's employees' time they may occupy." Page 477 of 61 S.Ct. The court specifically refused to follow the definition of "business" contained in its decision in Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., supra, and expressly disapproved that definition for income tax purposes. The court emphasized that no matter how large the estate may be, or how continuous or extended the work in connection therewith may be, such facts do not establish as a matter of law, that the person involved is carrying on a business.

This case was followed by City Bank Farmers Trust Co. v. Helvering, 313 U.S. 121, 61 S.Ct. 896, 85 L.Ed. 1227. Here the question presented was whether two testamentary trusts aggregating $10,000,000 were engaged in a trade or business. The specific question presented was whether trustees' fees paid to the trustees for handling the extensive investments of the trusts were deductible as a business expense. The Board of Tax Appeals and the Circuit Court of Appeals had denied the deduction. This was affirmed on the authority of the Higgins case, supra. The important holding in the case, so far as the problem involved in the appeal in the instant case is concerned, was that in determining whether or not a testamentary trust is engaged in the carrying on of a trade or business the same tests must be applied as are applied to an individual.

In all of the above cases the trier of the fact had found that the item in dispute was not a business expense, and in each case the Supreme Court of the United States emphasized that the question was one of fact, and that they were affirming the lower court. However, in United States v. Pyne, 313 U.S. 127, 61 S.Ct. 893, 85 L.Ed. 1231, that court held, as a matter of law, that activities substantially similar to those involved in the instant case did not constitute the carrying on of a trade or business, and reversed the court of claims that had held to the contrary. In the Pyne case the question involved was whether an estate could deduct attorneys' fees incurred in the administration and management of the investments of the estate. The court of claims, the trier of the facts, had held that such fees were properly deductible as a business expense. The facts were that the decedent, before his death, was a financier with extensive interests. He maintained an office with seven employees to assist him in handling his investments. After his death the estate adopted substantially the same method of operation. The lower court found that the attorney advised the executors with reference to both legal and economic problems that arose in connection with the business activities of the estate, with reference to tax matters, and with reference to investments. The court held that these activities did not constitute the carrying on of a trade or business as those terms are used in the income tax act, again held the definition of business contained in Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. inapplicable to income tax cases, reaffirmed its holding in the Higgins case, supra, and stated (page 895 of 61 S.Ct.): "Nor can the judgment of the Court of Claims be supported by that court's statement that the executors were engaged 'in the business of conserving the estate and protecting its income.' Such activities are the traditional duty of executors. Executors who engage actively in trade and business are the exception and not the rule. Rather obviously, there could be clear cases where executors 'carry on * * * business' by continuing to operate a store, a factory or some other well known, well marked type of business activity. But in the absence of evidence showing activities coming within the general acceptation of the concept of carrying on a trade or business, it cannot be said as a matter of law that an executor comes into this category merely because he conserves the estate by marshalling and gathering the assets as a mere conduit for ultimate distribution. And determination of what constitutes 'carrying on * * * business' under the Revenue Act does not depend upon the size of the estate or the number of people whose services are required in order properly to conserve it."

If the reasoning adopted by the United States Supreme Court in the above cases is sound, it requires a reversal of the judgment in the instant case. It should be stated that the decision in the instant case was rendered by the trial court before the United States Supreme Court had decided the Higgins, City Bank Farmers Trust Co. and the Pyne cases, supra. The record discloses that the trial court relied partially at least on the lower court's decision in the Pyne case which was favorable to the taxpayer and which contained a definition of doing business consonant with the taxpayer's contentions in the instant case.

[2, 3] The above decisions of the United States Supreme Court are, of course, not binding on this court as to the proper interpretation of the state statute. Although the state statute was copied from the federal statute, the decisions having been rendered subsequent to such adoption constitute but argumentative authority, and are not binding authority as to the proper interpretation of the state statute. However, such decisions of the highest court in the land are obviously entitled to great weight in interpreting identical language appearing in a state statute. There is a strong public policy favorable to interpreting similar statutes dealing with the same subject matter in a similar fashion. For this reason, and because we are convinced that the reasoning of the Supreme Court is sound, we are of the opinion that the activities of the estate here involved do not constitute the carrying on of a trade or business within the meaning of the state income tax statute.

[4] Respondent urges that the Pyne and other cases cited, supra, only hold that activities aimed at conserving an estate and preparing it for distribution do not constitute engaging in a trade or business, but that activities aimed at producing income should be held to constitute engaging in a trade or business. This is a far too technical interpretation of these cases. A fair reading of them demonstrates that merely taking care of personal investments, no matter how extensive, and how much time and help are required, does not constitute the engaging in a trade or business—to reach that status within the meaning of the income tax law there must be activity for a profit in connection with dealings directly or indirectly with the general public.

As already pointed out, the estate owned, managed, and rented some real property. That activity admittedly constitutes the carrying on of a trade or business. No attempt was made by the plaintiff taxpayer to segregate the portion of the attorneys' fees involved attributable to the real estate activities. The commissioner did allow a deduction of $8750 to be made. Whether this was done on the theory that that sum was reasonably attributable to the real estate activities does not appear. Such deduction constitutes approximately one-third of the attorneys' fees here involved. Considering the small amount of real property in the estate as compared with the total estate it would appear that this deduction is amply sufficient to take care of any activities in connection with the real property. However, if the taxpayer desires to offer proof that more than this amount was attributable to the real property activities of the estate he should be permitted to do so.

As already pointed out, the action involved several items in addition to the attorneys' fees. The trial court rendered a lump sum judgment. The commissioner does not challenge the correctness of the refund except as to the attorneys' fees items. The refund as to all the other items should be affirmed. However, the findings, conclusions, and judgment will have to be modified, and, if the taxpayer be so advised, a new trial had on the issue above-discussed.

The judgment is reversed with instructions to the trial court to proceed as in this opinion indicated.

Jan. 14, 1942.

1. Schools and school districts ⇐40

After adjoining school districts were united to constitute a joint union school district, offices of trustees of former separate districts terminated, and such trustees were without authority to employ teachers or control affairs of joint union district, and trustees of joint district regularly selected in the manner provided by statute had exclusive authority to employ teachers for joint district. 2. Schools and school districts ⇐28

Where attempt is made in good faith to organize a school district pursuant to or under color of law and officers have actually exercised duties in conducting district's affairs, district may be deemed to be a "de facto corporation" so as to enforce its just obligations, even though it subsequently develops that there were legal defects in procedure of accomplishing organization, or even where statute under which district was incorporated proves to be unconstitutional.

3. Schools and school districts ⇐28

A school district which united with adjoining district to form joint union school district, was thereafter nonexistent, and did not continue to operate as a "de facto corporation" so as to make joint district liable for salary of teacher employed by trustees of nonexistent district to teach in nonexistent district's school while legality of organization of joint district was being challenged. THOMPSON, Acting Presiding Justice.

Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff in a suit to recover her salary as a teacher in an elementary school district in Mendocino County. That district was united with an adjoining district in southern Humboldt County to constitute a joint union school district pursuant to section 2.200 et seq. of the School Code. The joint district was managed by a separate board of trustees and school was conducted in buildings on the Humboldt side of the district. The plaintiff was not employed by the Board of Trustees of the joint district. After the union of the two districts the defunct board of the former Mendocino County district purported to renew her contract from year to year and she continued to teach in the old school building of the Mendocino County district. After serving in that manner for three years she brought suit for compensation against both the former Mendocino County district and the joint union district. During the trial she dismissed the action against the Mendocino County district. Findings were adopted favorable to the joint union district to the effect that plaintiff was not employed by it, and that she never did teach in the schools of or for that district. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff that she take nothing by her suit. From that judgment this appeal was perfected.

Prior to April 28, 1933, the Bear Harbor School District, adjacent to the northern boundary of Mendocino County, maintained an elementary school therein. For several years the plaintiff, who had attained the status of a permanent teacher, had previously taught school in that district. Prior to that date the White Thorn School District of Humboldt County, which was contiguous to the district above mentioned, also maintained a separate school within its territory. These two districts were united on April 28, 1933, as a joint union district, by means of an election which was held for that purpose pursuant to law. The joint district was named the Thorn Valley Joint Union School District. A board of trustees was duly selected which employed teachers and regularly maintained school in buildings located on the Humboldt side of the district. The plaintiff was not employed by that board and never taught school in the buildings maintained therefor by the joint district.

There were some residents of the former Bear Harbor School District in Mendocino County who were opposed to the organization of the joint district. The legality of the joint district was challenged by means of a writ of quo warranto. It was finally decided that the joint union district was lawfully organized. In the meantime the defunct board of trustees of the former Bear Harbor District purported to continue to perform their former duties, in spite of the termination of their offices. They maintain school in the old school building on the Mendocino County side of the joint district, renewing their contract of employment with the plaintiff for three successive years at $1,260 per annum. She continued to teach school therein until June 30, 1936. No part of that salary was paid after the creation of the joint union district. This suit was commenced in 1938, against both the former Bear Harbor School District and the joint union district. During the trial the action was dismissed as to the Mendocino County district. Findings were adopted adverse to the plaintiff. A judgment was rendered against her that she take nothing by this suit. From that judgment she has appealed.

The appellant concedes the legality of the organization of the joint district. She also acknowledges that she was not employed by the trustees of the joint district. But she asserts that she was regularly employed as a teacher by the Board of Trustees of the Bear Harbor School District and performed services as a teacher for three years, during the time when the legality of the organization of the joint district was challenged in good faith; that the Mendocino County district was a part of the joint district and constituted a de facto corporation entitling her to compensation for her services.

[1] The findings and judgment are adequately supported by the evidence. It appears that the plaintiff had actual knowledge of the formation of the joint union district, in April, 1933. She was not employed by the trustees of the joint district. She did not teach in the school building maintained by the joint district. After July 1, 1933, the Bear Harbor School District ceased to exist and its school property vested in the joint district. §§ 2.252 and 2.253, School Code. The control and management of the affairs of the joint district, including the hiring of teachers, thereafter devolved exclusively upon the trustees of the joint district. § 2.254, School Code. After the uniting of the two districts into a joint union district the offices of the trustees of the former separate districts terminated and they were without authority to employ teachers or control the affairs of the joint union district. The trustees of the joint district were regularly selected in the manner provided by section 2.910 et seq. of the School Code. They had the exclusive authority to employ teachers for that joint district.

[2] We are of the opinion the theory of appellant that the Bear Harbor School District continued to operate as a de facto corporation after the union of the two districts has no application to the present situation so as to make the joint district liable for plaintiff's salary. It is true that when an attempt is made in good faith to organize a school district pursuant to or under color of law and its officers have actually exercised duties in conducting its affairs, it may be deemed to be a de facto corporation so as to enforce its just obligations, even though it subsequently develops there were legal defects in the procedure of accomplishing the organization, or even when the statute under which it was incorporated proves to be unconstitutional. Hamilton v. County of San Diego, 108 Cal. 273, 41 P. 305; Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44; Westlake Park Inv. Co. v. Jordan, 198 Cal. 609, 246 P. 807; Tulare Irr. Dist. v. Shepard, 185 U.S. 1, 13, 22 S.Ct. 531, 46 L.Ed. 773; 56 C.J. 254 § 90.

[3, 4] The rule, however, has no application to the facts of this case to bind the joint union district for the obligation created by the defunct officers of a district which had ceased to exist. The Bear Harbor School District became non-existent when the joint district was created. Both the plaintiff and the trustees of the Mendocino County district knew that the joint district was formally created in April, 1933. They knew the two contiguous districts, by a majority vote of each, had merged in one joint district. That merger effectively terminated the existence of both former districts. The Mendocino County district and the joint district could not exercise jurisdiction over the same territory at the same time. It has been held that two elementary school districts may not exercise separate jurisdiction at the same time over the same territory. 56 C.J. 206, § 52b.

It is not contended the Bear Harbor School District attempted to reorganize a separate district after the creation of the joint district. It made no effort to withdraw or to sever its connection with the joint district, as it might have done under section 2.270 of the School Code. The rule with relation to de facto organizations might have applied to the Thorn Valley Joint Union School District, since it was created according to law and continued to function in good faith as a union school district if there had been defects in the process of its creation, but we are unable to perceive how that principle could apply to a district which has ceased to exist under the plain letter of the law. After the creation of the joint district the former Mendocino County district had no authority to employ teachers for its own territory, and certainly not for the joint district which included a portion of Humboldt County. It possessed no de facto, or other jurisdiction, over the joint district. It had no authority to even attempt to maintain a separate school district. Even though the defunct officers of the former district might incur an obligation which would be binding on that district, which we do not concede, certainly they had no authority to create an obligation which would be binding on the joint union district, over a considerable portion of which territory they never claimed to have jurisdiction. The plaintiff was not employed by the joint union district. No contract existed between them. She was never recognized as a teacher in that joint district and she never taught in the school which was maintained by that district. The joint union district is therefore not indebted to plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank A. Leonard, Judge.

Action by Florence E. Fisher against Franklyn T. Chaffee and others to quiet title to land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Randolph Marketing Company appeals.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied; TRAYNOR, J., dissenting.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and John Henry Peckham, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Richard A. Ibanez, of Upland, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to quiet title and for declaratory relief.

On December 1, 1936, the plaintiff and the defendants Chaffee entered into a written contract for the sale and purchase of a 10-acre orange orchard on deferred payments. The Chaffees took possession and on December 2, 1936, executed a crop mortgage to the defendant Randolph Marketing Company covering the oranges to be produced on the land until the debt was paid. Sometime in December, 1939, the defendants Chaffee, being delinquent in some seven payments called for by the contract, refused to further perform the contract and notified the plaintiff that they would not make any further payments thereunder. Thereupon, the plaintiff took possession of the property and shortly thereafter directed the defendant Etiwanda Citrus Fruit Association to pick the oranges then growing thereon. This association picked that crop and still has in its possession the money accruing from the sale thereof.

This action was filed on September 6, 1940, the plaintiff praying that her title to the land be quieted and that she be given a judgment declaring that the defendant Randolph Marketing Company has no right, title or interest in and to the returns from the crop of oranges picked during the 1940 season or in the crops growing or to be grown on said land. At the trial, it was stipulated that there was no controversy insofar as the defendant Etiwanda Citrus Fruit Association is concerned and it seems to be conceded that that defendant is merely holding the proceeds of the 1940 crop pending a determination of who is entitled thereto. The court found in all respects in favor of the plaintiff and entered a judgment quieting her title to the real property and declaring that the defendant Randolph Marketing Company has no lien upon the crops harvested during 1940, or upon any crops to be produced upon the land in question, and further ordering the Etiwanda Citrus Fruit Association to pay the proceeds of the 1940 crop to the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant Randolph Marketing Company alone has appealed.

It is conceded, as it must be, that appellant's rights under its crop mortgage are dependent upon whether the Chaffees still had any interest in the property as vendees under the purchase contract. Ap-pellant's main contention is that the rights of these vendees had not been terminated and that the plaintiff and respondent, who will be hereafter referred to as the respondent, wrongfully took possession of the premises and harvested the 1940 crop. It it argued that the parties had by their contract agreed that, in the event of a breach or default, the rights of the vendees were to be terminated in either of two ways; that the setting forth of these two ways excluded any others; and that the contract was not terminated in either of those ways. The contract provided that in the event of a default the vendor could at her option declare the entire remaining indebtedness due and payable, advertise, and sell the property at public auction, either party being allowed to bid, and the proceeds to be applied so far as necessary in payment of the amounts due, with the alternative provision that the vendor might bring an action to recover the entire principal and interest and to foreclose and determine the interest of the vendees. It is conceded that neither of these methods was pursued and the appellant contends that it follows that the respondent has not terminated the contract in the manner provided for therein, and that the same is still in force in favor of the vendees with the resulting protection to the lien of appellant's crop mortgage.

[1-3] The appellant may not thus rely upon the provisions of the contract when, as the court found, the vendees had repudiated and refused to further perform its terms. In Mayer v. West, 96 Cal.App. 31, 273 P. 849, 851, the court reviewed many of the authorities, and said: "It is elementary that a vendor may recover possession in ejectment from a vendee in possession who repudiates his contract." Where a vendee in possession has refused to complete the contract he may be treated as one who has abandoned the contract under which he entered. Andrews v. Karl, 42 Cal.App. 513, 183 P. 838. In Whittier v. Stege, 61 Cal. 238, it is said: "When, therefore, the defendants, after they had obtained possession lawfully, substituted repudiation of the contract and refusal to comply with its terms, for performance or willingness to perform, they divested themselves by their wrongful act of the equitable estate which they acquired under the contract, and became trespassers or tenants at will, against whom their repudiated vendors could maintain ejectment. The vendors were remitted to their legal title, and in an action upon it the defendants could not invoke as a defense to it a contract of sale which they repudiated and refused to perform."

[4-6] When a vendee has repudiated the contract and has refused to pay anything further upon it a vendor is entitled to take possession and proceed to clear his title and is no longer bound by the provisions of the contract. Woodard v. Hennegan, 128 Cal. 293, 60 P. 769. When it appears, as it does here, that a vendor was able and willing to comply with the contract and that the vendee was not able to do so and had declared that he intended to pay no more, the vendor may maintain a quiet title action. Stratton v. California Land & Timber Co., 86 Cal. 353, 24 P. 1065. It follows, under these established rules, that having refused to further perform the contract these vendees could not invoke or rely upon the terms of the contract as against the vendor. Mayer v. West, supra. The vendor was, therefore, free to maintain an action in ejectment to recover possession of this land and equally free, having taken possession without objection from the vendees who were not living upon the land, to quiet her title thereto. Having repudiated the contract the vendees had no right to insist that the respondent proceed in accordance with the terms of the contract and the appellant, claiming under the vendees, is in no better position.

[7, 8] The appellant contends that there is no evidence to sustain the finding that the defendants Chaffee refused to further perform the contract. While the evidence is conflicting in that regard it amply sustains the findings made. The appellant particularly relies upon a letter written to Mr. Chaffee by the respondent's attorney on February 17, 1940, after possession had been taken by the respondent and a part of the orange crop harvested. The letter suggested a conference for the purpose of finding out if Mr. Chaffee would like to continue with the contract and if so what arrangements he could make for doing so. At most, the letter was an offer which was never accepted and it was far from sufficient to constitute a renewal of the contract which had previously been terminated. Viewed in its entirety the record discloses nothing more than a conflict in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

STEEL, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for injunctive relief wherein plaintiffs sought to restrain the defendants from mining certain creek bottom lands situated in Amador County, the fee in which vests in the plaintiffs, subject to a reservation of the mineral rights vesting in the defendants. Both parties deraign title through a common grantor.

To the complaint in the action, the defendants interposed a demurrer alleging that the complaint failed to state a cause of action against the defendants for the reason that plaintiffs purchased only the surface rights in the property, subject to the mineral reservation reserved and owned by the defendants, which, it was argued, carries with it the right to extract said minerals from the property. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, hence this appeal.

The sole issue presented, therefore, is whether or not the defendants, respondents herein, have a right to extract the minerals so owned by them, even though they may injure or destroy the surface of said lands in so doing.

While this point is somewhat novel in this jurisdiction we do find that it has received the attention of the Supreme Court of this state in considering two cases arising in Yuba County, to-wit: Yuba Investment Co. v. Yuba Consolidated Gold Fields, 184 Cal. 469, 194 P. 19, and again in the same entitled case reported in 199 Cal. 203, 248 P. 672, wherein the court affirmed the judgment of the trial court rendered pursuant to the law and directions of the court as set forth in the opinion in the first case supra.

While one of the points considered in the Yuba County cases, supra, had to do with the right of the defendant, successor in title to the United States Government, to deposit detritus in a settling basin on another tract of land to which plaintiff had succeeded as owner of the minerals therein, the court very thoroughly considered the respective rights of the parties arising by virtue of the deed involved which contained the same mineral reservation as the one we are here considering.

The court held that the expressed mineral reservation contained in the deed carried with it, by necessary implication, the right to remove such minerals by the usual or customary methods of mining and thus reduce them to possession even though the surface ground may be wholly destroyed as the result thereof.

After a consideration of the authorities submitted, many of which are here cited by appellant, the Supreme Court, in the case reported in 184 Cal. 481, 194 P. 25, states:

"The principle that the right to precious metals implies the right to mine the same, fortified by the statutory rule that reservations and exceptions are to be construed in favor of the grantor, and by the express reservation and exception of the right to use the premises, in any manner not inconsistent with the use by the grantee, and by the further fact that the premises could still be used by the grantee as a settling basin, if the minerals were extracted with due regard to that use, and that the only known method of extraction in contemplation by the parties was dredge mining, all lead to the conclusion that the plaintiff, as grantee of O'Brien's mining rights in tract 'First,' is entitled to extract the precious metals therefrom, even though the effect thereof is to wholly destroy the surface."

It is contended by the appellant here that the two cases, supra, limit the rule to the right to extract the minerals so far as not inconsistent with the use of the owner of the surface rights. We do not think such a limitation can reasonably be accepted as the rule stated in the decision. The court had before it the interpretation of a quitclaim deed containing the reservation hereinbefore referred to, and the question presented was whether the deed conveyed the fee or merely an easement. The court held, after considering the facts and circumstances involved, that the deed, on its face, was sufficient in form to convey the fee to the government, and that it was clear from the deed itself that the government intended to use the premises for the construction of reclamation works and a portion thereof as a settling basin; that dredge mining was not inconsistent with such use, although the deed contained no express provision limiting the use by the government to that purpose but on the contrary it was expressly provided that the premises may be used for any and all purposes. Continuing, the court says that dredge mining destroys the surface, leaving the top composed of cobblestones and its value destroyed for agricultural purposes, but on the other hand, it is pointed out, that if the reservation and exception of the precious metals do not authorize the owners to operate a mining dredge in the customary manner, the reservation would be of no effect and of no value, as no other method of mining was practicable.

In the instant case we have a similar situation, a reservation excepting the minerals from a comparatively shallow creek bed deposit of gravel, which is unlike an underground river channel such as may be found in the higher altitudes, and worked by means of a shaft and tunnel or drifts far beneath the surface in much the same manner as a vein or lode claim is worked, and in such cases a different rule applies as to the rights of the surface owner as the deposits may be extracted without injury to the surface.

It is generally recognized that the only methods used in mining surface gravel deposits is by hydraulic mining, the use of sluice boxes which were used to a considerable extent in the early days, or the more recent dredge or dragline process, all of which methods of extracting the gold from the gravel deposits necessarily mean the destruction of the surface ground.

We conclude, therefore, that the logical rule is the one that will permit the owner of surface minerals to remove them in the usual methods practiced generally in conducting placer mining operations. To hold otherwise would, in effect, amount to a determination that the deed is void as the owner of the mineral rights would be precluded from enjoying or recovering that which he owned.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; Donald Geary, Judge.

Action by Benjamin A. Cober and others against P. Connolly and others to quiet title to realty, which had been conveyed in trust by plaintiffs as security for a promissory note, and to compel a reconveyance thereof by the trustee. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed.

Preston & Gibson, of Ukiah, for appellants.

Hale McCowen, of Ukiah, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

In this action defendants appeal from a judgment quieting plaintiffs' title to certain real property situated in Ukiah, Mendocino County, California. The essential facts may be summarized as follows:

On October 30, 1929, the plaintiffs, husband and wife, executed their promissory note in the sum of $850, payable one year after date, together with a deed of trust of even date therewith and as security therefor, in favor of Keith C. Eversole, W. D. L. Held, and P. Connolly. Shortly thereafter the note, together with the deed of trust, was delivered to the defendant Mendocino County Title Company, trustee named therein, and in whose custody the documents remained thereafter.

In the year 1932 it appears that plaintiff Cober, and Eversole, then a practicing attorney and one of the payees of the note, agreed between themselves that Cober might liquidate this indebtedness by rendering services to Eversole in the way of job printing, newspaper subscriptions, publication of legal notices, and the use of hotel credit cards issued to Cober, all to be done and performed as Eversole might direct. This arrangement continued along over a period of some five years, according to the testimony of Cober, and the total of the services so rendered and credits received amounted to the sum of $1,255.97, which, it is claimed, paid the note in full.

The record shows, and it is not disputed, that the defendant Connolly did not participate in this arrangement, nor did he at any time receive any money, services, or goods of any nature, either from the plaintiff Cober or through Eversole as co-payee. It further appears that Eversole is insolvent.

Plaintiffs by this action sought to quiet their title to the property involved and to compel a reconveyance thereof by the defendant trustee. After trial judgment was rendered in their favor accordingly.

[1] It is the contention of appellants that Eversole, in his dealings with Cober, acted as an agent for his co-payees, and that consequently he could not, as such agent, accept performance by Cober in any manner other than to receive payment of the note in cash. Section 1475 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "An obligation in favor of several persons is extinguished by performance rendered to any of them, except in the case of a deposit made by owners in common, or in joint ownership, which is regulated by the title on deposit."

The law appears settled and it is conceded that one co-payee can accept payment for his fellow payee, the rule being based upon the proposition they are mutual agents of each other, at least impliedly, to receive or collect performance on behalf of either.

[2, 3] As to the question of whether or not a co-payee, such as Eversole, in this case acting in the capacity of an agent, could accept payment in goods or services in lieu of cash, the general rule appears to be that an agent who is authorized to receive payment has no authority to accept or receive anything in extinguishment of a debt other than money. 1 Cal.Jur. 722 and cases cited.

[4, 5] It is next contended by appellants that the respondent Cober cannot be entitled to credit for goods or services rendered to third parties. The record here discloses that of the total credits claimed by Cober only a portion thereof was rendered directly to Eversole, while the balance of the credits such as printing legal notices, newspaper subscriptions, etc., were rendered to third parties for which Eversole took credit. While generally a joint payee cannot direct or authorize payment to a third person without the consent of all co-payees (48 Corpus Juris 590; Moore v. Bevier, 60 Minn. 240, 62 N.W. 281) we do not consider that the facts here bring the case within such rule. Cober dealt with Eversole, and all services rendered were primarily for the benefit of Eversole who profited by reason thereof and was no doubt compensated therefor through his clientele.

[6] Respondents herein, while conceding that a joint creditor in accepting performance is acting in the capacity of an agent for the others, and that the payees here were joint creditors, urge most strenuously that the question for decision is not dependent upon section 1475 of the Civil Code, but argue that section 1476 of the Civil Code is controlling. This section provides as follows: "If a creditor, or any one of two or more joint creditors, at any time directs the debtor to perform his obligation in a particular manner, the obligation is extinguished by performance in that manner, even though the creditor does not receive the benefit of such performance."

This section of the code enacted in 1872 codifies the common-law rule, and we find no case wherein it has had the attention of the courts of this state. The issue, therefore, is whether section 1476 of the Civil Code permits performance to be rendered by paying something other than the consideration called for in the obligation, which in the instant case is money. (We are not here concerned with accord and satisfaction as will later be referred to.)

Respondents contend that the word "manner" is the important word in the section, and is defined by Webster's International Dictionary as "way of performing or effecting anything," and by the Century Dictionary as "the way in which an act is performed, method of doing anything, mode of procedure in any case, or situation; mode, way or method"; and that "manner" embraces both method and mode, which of course is correct. It will be noted that the section states that if the creditor at any time directs the debtor to perform his obligation in a particular manner—the gist of the obligation and the important word therefore is the word "perform," and to perform means to deliver or render the consideration mentioned in the obligation. Consequently the section must necessarily mean in what manner (which as we have seen includes the method and mode) shall the consideration called for be paid? For instance, a creditor may direct the debtor to remit money by mail, if the letter is lost the risk falls upon the creditor, as the posting of the letter as directed would constitute payment "even though the creditor does not receive the benefit of such performance."

It will be observed that the last-quoted portion of the section, if applied here, could have no significance whatever, as the goods and services were accepted by the joint creditor and obviously some benefit was received.

In Kerr's Cyc. Codes under section 1476, Civil Code, the cases cited relate not to a substituted performance but to the manner in which the money or consideration is to be transmitted to the creditor. See, also, Annotations Field's Code of New York, section 702, which section contains the same language as our Civil Code, section 1476.

The case of Peck v. Lampkin, 200 Ala. 132, 75 So. 580, 581, cited by appellant, contains the following pertinent language: "But we apprehend that, if one of the joint obligees would accept property, other than money, in satisfaction, in whole or in part, of the jointly held demand, he, and the debtor as well, must be able to refer their act to some express previous authorization to that end by the co-obligee, or else present a ratification of the act by the co-obligee."

As heretofore mentioned, we are not concerned with the question of an accord and satisfaction as that is covered in sections 1521–1524 of the Civil Code, but solely with whether or not this particular section (1476, Civil Code) in effect applies to the facts involved in the instant case.

We are of the opinion that it does not, for as already indicated, it relates to the manner of transmission of the consideration called for, and that question is not an issue here.

For the reasons stated the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

JOHNSON et al. v. CAMUFFO et al.

Civ. 11247.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 15, 1942.

1. Quieting title ⇐47(2)

In an action to quiet title, the trial court's finding, supported by competent evidence, that the deed to the lot in controversy was delivered by plaintiff to defendant in payment of a previous indebtedness, and not as security, was sufficient to dispose of the case, since it met plaintiff's contention that the deed was delivered to an escrow holder as security for plaintiff's note to defendant, and was wrongfully delivered to defendant by the escrow holder.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)

The Court of Appeal is concluded by the trial court's findings on conflicting evidence.

Action to quiet title by Gus Johnson and wife against Richard J. Camuffo and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

John E. Truman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

The question presented on this appeal is purely a factual one. Appellant Gus Johnson and respondent Elizabeth Petzold, who will be hereinafter referred to as Johnson and Petzold, had engaged in a long series of business transactions prior to August 7, 1933. On that date they entered into an agreement of settlement of their respective claims which contained the following provision: "First party (Petzold) consents that F. R. Webb, escrow holder, shall return to the second parties (Johnson and wife) a certain mortgage on farm property, as well as a deed to certain property in San Francisco."

Thereafter Johnson and his wife commenced this action to quiet title to a certain lot on Moultrie Street in San Francisco claiming that the "deed to certain property in San Francisco" mentioned in the clause of the agreement above quoted referred to this property.

On the trial Johnson testified that as a part of an earlier settlement of their accounts between himself and Petzold he had delivered a deed of the Moultrie Street property with Petzold as grantee to Webb as escrow holder to hold the deed as security for the payment of a promissory note in Petzold's favor, and that Webb had wrongfully delivered this deed to Petzold who had caused it to be recorded on March 25, 1931.

In defence the note in question was introduced in evidence. It contained the following provision: "This note is secured by an unrecorded deed to Munich Street property and unrecorded mortgage on property in Madera County, which are to be recorded on default."

Admittedly the Munich Street property referred to in this provision of the note was also located in San Francisco, and there is no dispute that the "mortgage on property in Madera County" is the "mortgage of farm property" which by the agreement of October 7, 1933, was to be returned to Johnson by Webb as escrow holder.

Johnson testified that the provision of the promissory note that it was secured by an unrecorded deed to Munich Street property was not in the note when he signed it. This was contradicted by Webb who testified that the note as introduced into evidence was in the same condition as when Johnson signed it.

[1] Petzold and Webb both testified that as a part of the 1931 settlement a deed to the Moultrie Street property was delivered to Petzold by Johnson in part satisfaction of her claims against Johnson and that Johnson at that time told Petzold to record it. The trial court found in accordance with this testimony that the deed to the Moultrie Street property was delivered to Petzold by Johnson in payment of a previous indebtedness and not as security. This finding, supported by competent evidence, was sufficient to dispose of the case since it met the contention of Johnson that the deed to the Moultrie Street property was delivered by him to Webb to hold in escrow as security for his promissory note and by Webb was wrongfully delivered to Petzold. With that claim so disposed of it is obvious that the provision of the settlement "that F. R. Webb, escrow holder, shall return to the second parties * * * a deed to certain property in San Francisco" could not refer to the deed to the Moultrie Street property, which the trial court found not to have been delivered to Webb as "escrow holder" but to Petzold absolutely in satisfaction of a debt.

It was Petzold's testimony, which was supported by the provision of the note quoted above, that it was the agreement of the parties in 1931 that Johnson should deliver a mortgage of the Madera County property and a deed to the Munich Street property to Webb as escrow holder to record them upon any default of Johnson in the payment of the note as provided in the provision of the note quoted herein. However, Webb could not remember whether a deed to the Munich Street property had ever been delivered to him and appellants seize upon this uncertainty to argue that since it does not appear that any deed to San Francisco property was ever delivered by Johnson except that to the Moultrie Street property the deed to that property must have been the one referred to as "a deed to certain property in San Francisco" in the settlement of 1933.

Petzold's testimony on this matter is clear that a deed to the Munich Street property was to be delivered to Webb to hold in escrow, that she believed that this deed had been so delivered to Webb, and that it was this deed that was referred to in the settlement of 1933 as "a certain deed to San Francisco property."

[2] The appeal presents no more than the familiar case of findings on conflicting evidence by which this court is concluded.

Judgment affirmed.

Action by the Homeland Building Company against Glenn Q. Reynolds and another for declaratory relief and to set aside an alleged fraudulent transfer of realty. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Liggett & Liggett, of San Diego, for appellant.

Charles B. Provence, of San Diego, for respondents.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for declaratory relief and to set aside an alleged fraudulent transfer of real property from Glenn Q. Reynolds to his wife Esther Reynolds. The plaintiff sought to have it declared that a judgment it held against Glenn Q. Reynolds was a valid lien against the property and unaffected by a homestead declaration filed by the wife.

The defendants were married in 1919 and had three children. On March 4, 1935, Mrs. Reynolds bought the property in question, which consisted of some lots with an unfinished house thereon, agreeing to pay about $1,000 therefor. At that time she paid $100 down and received some sort of receipt agreement. On March 13, 1936, she entered into a more formal agreement with the owner of the property, which agreement was also signed by her husband. This agreement provided that $450 should be paid from money expected to be received from a veteran's bonus payment due to Reynolds and some $500 out of a loan of $1,880 being made by a savings and loan association.

In December, 1936, through an escrow, this savings and loan association increased its loan to $2,500 and the balance due was paid to the owner of the property who conveyed it to Mrs. Reynolds by a deed which was recorded December 26, 1936. Under the arrangement, the remainder of the loan was used in completing the house on the property. On March 9, 1937, Mrs. Reynolds recorded a declaration of homestead. In the meantime and on June 24, 1936, the plaintiff herein recovered a judgment for $428.15 against Mr. Reynolds, an abstract of which judgment was recorded on June 26, 1936. The record fails to show when this obligation was incurred.

The court found in all respects in favor of the defendants finding, among other things, that at the time the abstract of the judgment was recorded Glenn Q. Reynolds was not the equitable owner of this property; that Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds did not procure a conveyance in the name of Mrs. Reynolds without any consideration paid by her and did not procure such conveyance for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of Mr. Reynolds and in particular this plaintiff; that the property was not the community property of the defendants; that it was the separate property of Mrs. Reynolds; that Mrs. Reynolds has not held and does not hold the legal title as trustee for Mr. Reynolds; that Mrs. Reynolds is the owner of the property; that Mr. Reynolds has never held the legal title to and has never been the legal owner of said property; and that prior to December 26, 1936, he made a gift of any interest he might have in the property to his wife. As conclusions of law, it was found that the judgment lien of the plaintiff has never attached to the property and that the declaration of homestead filed by Mrs. Reynolds is valid as against any claim of the plaintiff. From the judgment which followed the plaintiff has appealed.

The appellant contends that the taking of title in the name of Mrs. Reynolds was fraudulent because it appears that Mr. Reynolds was unable to pay the judgment held by the appellant and that the property was in fact the community property of Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds, that because of this fraudulent conveyance Mr. Reynolds had an equitable interest in the property which was subject to the lien of appellant's judgment under the provisions of section 674 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that this lien attached to such interest before the declaration of homestead was filed.

The appellant concedes that it had no lien so long as the property was being purchased on a contract (citing Oaks v. Kendall, 23 Cal.App.2d 715, 73 P.2d 1255; Belieu v. Power, 54 Cal.App. 244, 201 P. 620), but maintains that when a deed was taken in the name of Mrs. Reynolds, for the purpose of defrauding the appellant, Mr. Reynolds had an equitable interest in the property which then became subject to the lien of appellant's judgment.

[1] The general rule in this state is that legal interests only, as distinguished from equitable interests, are subject to judgment liens established under section 674 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Poindexter v. Los Angeles Stone Co., 60 Cal.App. 686, 214 P. 241; Graves v. Arizona Central Bank, 205 Cal. 715, 272 P. 1063; McGee v. Allen, 7 Cal.2d 468, 60 P.2d 1026; Belieu v. Power, supra; Oaks v. Kendall, supra. The appellant contends, however, that where property is conveyed to another for the purpose of protecting a judgment debtor's real interest in the property and in order to defeat a judgment the judgment-debtor has an interest, whether legal or equitable, which should be held subject to the judgment lien. Assuming this to be true, we are not here called upon to decide such a question.

[2] The appellant's contention that the court failed to find on the issue of fraud is without merit. The court found that each and every allegation of the complaint bearing on the question of fraud was not true. No failure of the evidence to sustain these findings is pointed out other than the general claim that Mr. Reynolds was insolvent, that the property was community property, and that there was no valid gift of the property to Mrs. Reynolds. It appears without contradiction that Mr. Reynolds, who was gassed in the World War, was in very bad health and unable to work. He testified that between 1930 and 1934 he was very ill and was told by his doctor that he could not live; that during this period he gave the adjusted service certificates which he had received from the United States Government for his services in the World War, amounting to $450, to his wife in order to protect her and the children because of his health and condition; that he never saw this property until after his wife had bought it; and that he signed no papers except as he was required to do so by the loan association from which his wife secured a loan.

[3, 4] In our opinion, the court's findings to the effect that this property was the separate property of Mrs. Reynolds and not the community property of herself and her husband was sufficiently sustained by the evidence. The property was conveyed to Mrs. Reynolds and the presumption is that it was her separate property. There is no evidence that any money went into the purchase of the property, aside from the proceeds of a trust deed thereon, except the original payment of $100 and a subsequent payment of $450. It appears without conflict that Mrs. Reynolds borrowed the $100 for the first payment from a friend in March, 1935, and that in May, 1935, she borrowed $100 on her car and repaid her friend. Mrs. Reynolds testified that she owned this car and there is no evidence to the contrary. The $450 came from Mr. Reynolds' soldier bonus, which was exempt from execution, and the evidence that he gave these certificates to his wife prior to 1934 stands without contradiction. It also appears, without conflict, that Mr. Reynolds did not see the property until after his wife had bought it, that when the escrow was started in December, 1936, he refused to sign instructions which provided that title was to be taken in himself and wife until his own name was scratched out, and that he signed a contract and a trust deed only because this was required by the loan association before a loan would be made. Without further reviewing the tesimony of Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds in this connection and in support of the finding that a gift was made, it must be held that the evidence in its entirety, with the reasonable inferences therefrom, amply sustain the court's findings that this property and the funds going into its purchase were the separate property of Mrs. Reynolds and that Mr. Reynolds had no interest therein. Under the circumstances here appearing, it must be held that no lien attached to this property through the recording of the abstract of the appellant's judgment.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

On appeal from judgment for defendant in quiet title action wherein evidence was conflicting as to whether property involved was the separate property of defendant's divorced husband and hence did not pass to defendant under divorce decree awarding community interest in the property, appellate court would not disturb the implied finding of trial court that property was acquired with community funds and would treat such property as having been community property.

2. Husband and wife ⇐265

Where realty was deeded to husband during marriage and thereafter husband and wife executed a deed of trust to secure a loan, a reconveyance under such deed of trust to husband and wife vested no title in the wife.

3. Husband and wife ⇐265

Prior to 1927 the wife had no "vested interest" in community property, but title to such property was vested in the husband, subject to the statutory restraints upon his power to alienate or encumber the property without wife's consent, and the power given the wife to devise a portion thereof. The rights of husband and wife in realty acquired by husband during marriage in 1925 and by them conveyed in 1932 must be measured by the statute in effect in 1925 where wife had no vested interest in community property. Civ.Code, § 172a.

5. Husband and wife ⇐267(1)

Where, under statute in effect at time of husband's acquisition of community property, title to such property was in the husband alone, it was necessary only that wife join with him in executing deed to such property in order to make deed completely effective and wife was not required to be named as a party to deed since she was conveying no estate. Civ.Code, § 172a.

6. Deeds ⇐190

A mere attempt by husband to defraud the wife of her interest in community property would avail the wife nothing against husband's mother to whom husband and wife conveyed property by a grant deed signed by husband and wife.

8. Deeds ⇐190

In action to quiet title to realty which defendant and her husband, prior to divorce decree which awarded to defendant all community interest in the realty, had conveyed to plaintiff, if want of consideration for the conveyance to plaintiff was relied upon as a defense it should have been pleaded.

9. Divorce ⇐254

A divorce decree awarding to wife all community interest in the realty which husband and wife had conveyed to husband's mother by grant deed signed by husband and wife did not vest title in the wife on theory that because the husband allegedly told wife that deed to his mother was being made merely for convenience, title remained in husband regardless of the name in which it stood, since what husband told his wife out of presence of his mother and without her knowledge was not binding upon the mother, and mother was not a party to nor bound by decree in divorce proceeding. Civ. Code, § 172a.

10. Quieting title ⇐10(2)

In action to quiet title to realty which defendant and her husband, prior to divorce decree which awarded to defendant all community interest in the realty, had deeded to plaintiff, wherein no issue was tendered as to any equitable title in defendant, plaintiff was entitled to decree quieting title on ground that legal title vested in plaintiff since all that divorce decree would have operated upon would be an equitable interest allegedly remaining in the husband or in husband and the wife after the conveyance to his mother.

11. Quieting title ⇐43

Where a defense in quiet title action consists merely of a denial of plaintiff's ownership and assertion of title in defendant, such defense is not established by proof that plaintiff is the owner of the legal title subject to an equity in favor of defendant or of a third person under whom he claims.

12. Husband and wife ⇐267(1)

Where community real property was acquired by husband prior to 1927 when wife had no interest in community property, and in 1932 a grant deed to such property was delivered to husband's mother which deed was signed and acknowledged by husband and wife and only the husband was named in the body thereof, such deed complied with the statute as it applied in 1932 to community property acquired prior to 1927 standing of record in the name of the husband alone. Civ.Code, § 172a.

13. Quieting title ⇐10(2)

A husband's mother to whom husband and wife conveyed community property acquired by husband prior to 1927 when wife had no vested interest in community property was entitled to a judgment quieting title in such property as against the wife who in 1932 obtained a divorce decree awarding to her all community interest in the property even if wife's joinder in deed to husband's mother had been procured by husband's fraud, since deed to mother would then be treated as his sole deed subject to being avoided within one year from filing for record of deed in recorder's office of county in which property was situated, and no such action was ever taken. Civ.Code, § 172a.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Frank M. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Blanche Hadley Strong against Muriel F. Strong to quiet title to real property wherein the defendant prayed that the title should be quieted in her. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Kenneth J. Carey, of Oakland, and Henderson & Henderson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Snook, Snook & Chase, of Oakland, for respondent.

COMSTOCK, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to quiet title to real property situated in the city of Oakland. The complaint alleges that plaintiff is and for a long time prior to the commencement of the action had been the owner of the real property in question and that the defendant claims and asserts an interest therein adverse to the plaintiff which is without right. The defendant's answer denies plaintiff's allegations of ownership and alleges that defendant is the owner and in possession of the property, and entitled to the possession thereof, and prays that title be quieted in her.

The defendant had judgment in the court below decreeing that she is the owner of the real estate and quieting her title against the plaintiff. Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

The respondent Muriel F. Strong was married to Lester H. Strong, the son of appellant Blanche Hadley Strong, on June 11, 1922. On January 14, 1938, in a divorce action brought by Muriel F. Strong against Lester H. Strong, an interlocutory decree of divorce was entered in favor of Muriel F. Strong awarding to her any and all community interests of the parties in the real property involved here.

Said property was deeded to Lester H. Strong on December 16, 1925, by one June L. Wadey. The deed was recorded January 6, 1926. On March 24, 1932, a grant deed to said property was executed and delivered to Blanche Hadley Strong. It was signed and acknowledged by Lester H. Strong and Muriel F. Strong, but only Lester H. Strong was named in the body thereof as party of the first part. This deed was recorded April 14, 1932.

During the time that the property stood of record in the name of Lester H. Strong the following transactions relating to encumbrances thereon were had: Lester H. Strong and Muriel F. Strong executed a deed of trust of the property to Stockholder's Auxiliary Corporation, dated January 22, 1926, recorded January 29, 1926, to secure a loan of $3,500; on December 19, 1929, there was a reconveyance under said deed of trust to Lester H. Strong and Muriel F. Strong, which was recorded the same day; and on that day a new deed of trust to secure $3,500 was placed on record, bearing date the 13th day of December, 1929, executed by Lester H. Strong and Muriel F. Strong to National Bank of Italy Company.

Appellant bases her claim of title upon the deed dated March 24, 1932; respondent claims under the decree in the divorce action. It is clear that if the whole title passed under the conveyance of March 24, 1932, appellant must prevail, as in that case there was no existing community interest of Lester H. and Muriel F. Strong in the property for the decree to operate upon.

[1] Appellant's contention that the property was the separate property of Lester H. Strong must fail. The evidence on that point was in conflict and this court will not disturb the implied finding of the trial court that the property was acquired with community funds. We must treat it as having been community property.

[2] No point is made that the reconveyance of December 19, 1929, vested any title in the respondent. It did not have that effect. Tyler v. Currier, 147 Cal. 31, 81 P. 319.

Did the said deed of March 24, 1932, pass title to appellant? We think it did.

[3] Prior to 1927, the wife had no vested interest in the community property. Title to the community property was vested in the husband, subject to the statutory restraints upon his power to alienate or encumber the same without her consent, and the power given her to devise a portion thereof. Riley v. Gordon, 137 Cal. App. 311, 30 P.2d 617; McKay v. Lauriston, 204 Cal. 557, 269 P. 519; Maxwell v. Carlon, 30 Cal.App.2d 356, 86 P.2d 666.

[4, 5] The property here was acquired in 1925 and the rights of the husband and wife must be measured by the statutes then in effect. McKay v. Lauriston, supra, and cases cited. Title having been in Lester H. Strong alone it was necessary only that Muriel F. Strong join with him in executing the deed in order to make it completely effective, which she did. She was not required to be named as a party to it, for she was conveying no estate. Riley v. Gordon, supra; 3 Cal.Jur. 10 Yr.Supp. 593, 626; Civil Code, sec. 172a; Cordano v. Wright, 159 Cal. 610, 115 P. 227, Ann.Cas. 1912C, 1044; Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564; Dentzel v. Waldie, 30 Cal. 138; Douglas v. Fulda, 50 Cal. 77.

[6] Respondent claims that she had no intention when she signed the deed of passing the title or giving away her home or passing any interest to Blanche Hadley Strong and, while she admits signing the deed with knowledge of its contents, she says that she was told by her husband that the transaction was merely for convenience. In their essence these contentions suggest fraud. No fraud was pleaded, which was necessary if it was relied upon as a defense. 12 Cal.Jur. 800; Duncan v. Duncan, 6 Cal.App. 404, 92 P. 310. No effort was made to connect appellant with the alleged deceitful statements. It is not contended that she was present or in any way knew what her son had told his wife or that she knew or suspected what her daughter-in-law intended or had in her mind when she joined in the execution of the deed.

[7] Counsel for respondent do not go so far as to argue that the record shows any fraud upon the part of or imputable to appellant and certainly none appears. We quote from the argument as follows: "We have a case of the husband having attempted to commit a fraud upon his wife, and to have attempted to deed the property to his mother, which deed was, as above pointed out, without consideration other than that the mother should hold the title for convenience, and in the meantime the character of the property, i. e., the community property, had never changed. Thereupon in the interlocutory decree of divorce the court awarded all of the community interest in the property, i. e., the Keith Avenue property, to respondent, which, of course, it had a right to do in a suit for divorce on the ground of cruelty, whereupon the entire property became the property of the respondent." Of course, a mere attempt by respondent's husband to defraud her will avail her nothing against appellant.

[8] As to the suggestion that the deed was without consideration other than that the mother should hold the title for convenience, the record shows no agreement on her part to so hold it, but only that Lester H. Strong had told his wife he was making the deed to his mother for convenience. Nothing was said about the nature of the convenience or whose convenience was being served. On the other hand, the evidence is undisputed that the property was encumbered when deeded to appellant and that as a part of the consideration for the transfer she conveyed to her son by deeds dated, respectively, May 16, 1932, and May 20, 1932, and recorded May 25, 1932, two other parcels of real property, which were unencumbered and which exceeded in value the property in dispute. It may also be mentioned that there was no pleading of a want of consideration. This was required if the point was to be made available to defendant. Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 431, 67 P. 681.

[9-11] The argument advanced by respondent assumes that because Lester H. Strong told his wife the deed to his mother was being made merely for convenience, it follows that title remained in him regardless of the name in which it stood and for that reason the interlocutory decree in the divorce action vested the title in respondent. This position is not sound. In the first place, what Lester H. Strong told his wife out of the presence of appellant and without her knowledge is not binding upon her. Secondly, appellant was not a party to nor bound by the decree in the divorce proceeding. Since the nature of the convenience was not proven, nor that appellant ever accepted the transfer except absolutely and in consideration of her conveyance of valuable unencumbered real property in exchange, it does not even appear that any beneficial interest or equity remained in Lester H. Strong as community property or at all. Finally, if some equitable interest had remained in him, or in him and the respondent, that is all that the interlocutory decree would have operated upon; the legal title would still have been vested in appellant, and there would have been no justification for the decree quieting title against her. No issue was tendered as to any equitable title in respondent and if it had been, her title could not have been quieted against the holder of the legal title. It is settled that where a defense in an action to quiet title consists merely of a denial of plaintiff's ownership and the assertion of title in defendant, such defense is not established by proof that the plaintiff is the owner of the legal title subject to an equity in favor of the defendant or of a third person under whom he claims. Milliken v. Valencia, 47 Cal. App. 16, 189 P. 1049; Robinson v. Muir, 151 Cal. 118, 90 P. 521.

[12, 13] It is our opinion that the deed complied with the provisions of section 172a, Civil Code, as it applied in 1932 to community real property acquired in 1925 standing of record in the name of the husband alone. Even though the wife's joinder in his deed had been procured by his fraud, which we have seen has not been and could not in the state of the pleadings be herein established to defeat appellant's record title, the deed would not be treated as a nullity but as his sole deed subject only to being avoided by action commenced within one year from the filing for record of the instrument in the recorder's office of the county in which the land is situate. No action of this sort was ever taken. Maxwell v. Carlon, supra.

Appellant has raised several other points which we deem it unnecessary to notice in detail as the matters already discussed are determinative of the appeal.

We have carefully considered the argument and authorities relied upon by respondent in respect to subjects which we have not specifically touched upon and find no merit in them.

For the reasons stated it is ordered that the judgment be reversed. The cause is remanded with directions to the court below to enter a decree quieting plaintiff's title.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by Erwin B. Hebert and others against Joe H. Judgment for plaintiffs, and named defendant appeals.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

Plaintiffs obtained judgment against the appellant for $830.83 together with interest and costs. The sole question presented upon this appeal is the jurisdiction of the superior court over the subject matter of the action and is presented upon the judgment roll alone. The action was originally filed in the Superior Court of Kern County against the defendants Joe H. Gray and the General Petroleum Company of California, a corporation. Upon motion of defendant Gray, the action was transferred to the Superior Court of San Bernardino County. Thereafter the defendant General Petroleum Company of California answered. A first amended complaint was then filed. A demurrer was filed to the first amended complaint by appellant Gray on all the statutory grounds including no jurisdiction of the subject matter, and after being duly argued and presented was overruled. Thereafter an answer and pleading denominated a counterclaim was filed by the defendant Gray. In due time the case came on for trial on the first amended complaint and the answers and so-called counterclaim. At the conclusion of plaintiffs' case a nonsuit was granted as to the defendant General Petroleum Company of California, a corporation. At the conclusion of the trial the court permitted the plaintiffs to file an amended and supplemental complaint to conform to the evidence, and thereafter entered its findings and judgment as above mentioned.

The allegations of the first amended complaint, in effect, are that the plaintiffs were the owners of certain premises in the town of Barstow, San Bernardino County, upon which was located an automobile service station; that on August 15, 1938, the plaintiff leased the service station to the defendants and that the defendants promised and agreed to pay plaintiffs the sum of 1½ cents per gallon for all gasoline sold through the service station, said sum being payable monthly on the 15th day of each month from and after August 15, 1938, for a period of five years; that the defendants took possession of the premises and thereafter were in possession and operating the service station; that they failed and refused to pay plaintiffs the said sum due for gasoline sold in the service station by the defendants and that as a result thereof there had become due from the defendants to the plaintiffs the sum of $500 by virtue of the terms of the lease. Thereafter follows the usual allegation of demand and the failure to pay the sum. The concluding paragraph prays for judgment against the defendants for the sum of $500, together with interest and costs. The answer of Gray admits the ownership of the property by the plaintiffs, but denies generally and specifically that the premises were ever leased to him or that he ever agreed to pay the sum of 1½ cents per gallon for gasoline sold at the service station for a period of five years or any other period; denies that he, Gray, ever entered into or took possession of the premises or operated the service station; denies that he is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $500 or in any sum at all. The answer also affirmatively alleges that plaintiffs were in possession of the premises and operating the service station; that the defendant Gray was selling gasoline and oil to the plaintiffs and delivering the same to the plaintiffs at the service station and that the plaintiffs had been paying the defendant for the gasoline and oil as the same was delivered to the service station. Included in the answer is what is designated a "third and separate defense and by way of counterclaim." This portion of the answer affirmatively alleges ownership of the premises by the plaintiffs and affirmatively alleges that on August 15, 1938, the plaintiff leased the premises to Gray for a period of five years; that Gray is ready, able and willing to enter upon and take possession of the premises but that the plaintiffs have refused and still refuse to deliver the premises to the defendant; that ever since the date of the lease the plaintiffs have been occupying the premises and have been renting a portion thereof to various and sundry persons unknown to the defendant Gray for amounts of money unknown; and that the plaintiffs have been operating the service station. This is followed by an allegation that the plaintiffs have refused to account for any amounts received by them from the rental of the premises and for moneys received in the operation of the service station, and that the amounts so received by plaintiffs are unknown to defendant; that the amounts so received by plaintiffs, less an amount for rental, are due, owing and unpaid to the defendant Gray. Thereafter follows a prayer that the plaintiffs recover no judgment under their complaint; that an accounting of all moneys received by the plaintiffs through operating the service station and auto court or camp ground since the date of the lease be had in order to determine the amount due the defendant Gray; that he have judgment for such amount; that possession of the premises be delivered to him; and for court costs. The court found in all respects in favor of plaintiffs and respondents and further found that the allegations of defendant and appellant's counterclaim were untrue.

It is conceded that San Bernardino township is one having a Class A justice's court, as defined in section 81 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and its original jurisdiction is defined by section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Subdivision (a) of section 1 thereof provides that such justice's courts shall have original jurisdiction of civil actions in all cases at law in which the demand or the value of the property in controversy amounts to $1,000 or less, except cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate. Subdivision (d) thereof provides that such courts shall have original jurisdiction in cases of equity, when pleaded as defensive matter in any case at law of which they have jurisdiction.

[1] It is immaterial in the present action whether appellant was the party who moved to transfer this action to the Superior Court of San Bernardino County. If that court to which the action was transferred did not have original jurisdiction, jurisdiction could not be conferred on that court by consent or by motion. Van Horn v. Justice's Court, 216 Cal. 235, 242, 13 P.2d 704; Schwartz, Inc., v. Burnett Pharmacy, 112 Cal.App., Supp., 781, 295 P. 508.

The question to be determined is whether or not under the pleadings the Superior Court of San Bernardino County had original jurisdiction, and it is admitted by respondents that if the case appealed from comes within the jurisdiction of the justice's court as set forth in the above-mentioned subdivisions of section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the appellant should prevail in this appeal and it should be adjudged that the superior court was without jurisdiction to try this case.

Respondents contend (1) that the complaint sets forth an action at law which involves the possession of real estate; (2) that the cross-action filed by the defendant sets forth an action which involves the title or possession of real estate; (3) that the cross-action of defendant sets forth an action which seeks affirmative equitable relief; and (4) that if any error was committed by the trial court such error is not prejudicial to the appellant within the meaning of section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution.

[2, 3] There have been numerous decisions of the supreme and appellate courts in this state interpreting the language of subdivision (a) of section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the phrase "cases at law which involve * * * possession of real estate." In O'Meara v. Hables, 163 Cal. 240, 124 P. 1003, it was said: "The possession here contemplated is, as we have said, either a possession akin to title, as in ejectment, trespass, or title by adverse possession, where possession is of the essence of the right sought to be established, or it is a possession which, for some other good reason, becomes a direct and material fact and issue in the case, 'upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery, or the defendant for a defense.' Holman v. Taylor [31 Cal. 338]." See, also, Copertini v. Oppermann, 76 Cal. 181, 18 P. 256; Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., 101 Cal. 160, 35 P. 633; Dungan v. Clark, 159 Cal. 30, 112 P. 718. The next step is whether the present complaint fits within the general concepts of that interpretation. Respondents alleged, in their first amended complaint, not only title to the real property in them, but directly averred possession in appellant. Respondents' right or cause of action depended on possession being established in appellant. The consideration for the lease is 1½ cents per gallon for all gasoline sold by appellants while in possession of the service station. It becomes apparent that it would be necessary for appellant to be in possession for any consideration to accrue under the lease. It would appear, therefore, that possession would be a fact necessary to be determined in order to decide the case.

In Morrissey v. Morrissey, 191 Cal. 782, at page 784, 218 P. 396, at page 396, it was said in discussing the jurisdiction of the justice's court: "The issue of ownership is tendered by the plaintiff, who conceives that his right of action is based wholly or partly upon it. The jurisdiction of the superior court is thus determined, and cannot await upon the contingency that the answer of the defendant may admit the allegation." (Citing cases.) "This is true, even if the issue is incidental. On the other hand, if such a complaint be filed in the justice's court, and an answer be filed which makes no traverse of the allegation of title or possession of the real property, so that no question of such title or possession is involved, the justice's court will have jurisdiction of the action. Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co., 103 Cal. 132, 37 P. 196. If the issue of title or possession is so involved that it must be decided in order to determine the case, the superior court has original jurisdiction of the action, whether the involution may be said to be merely incidental or not."

On the basis of the complaint alone, it fairly appears that possession of the real estate is a direct and material fact and issue in the case, upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery or the defendant for a defense and would come within the exception as stated in subdivision (a) of section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Irrespective of the correctness of this reasoning, the appellant put the question of possession directly in issue by his answer and based his defenses mainly on that question. In addition thereto, he injected a prayer to be put in possession of the real property under the lease. This prayer was in the nature of an action of ejectment.

[4] In Camarillo v. Fenlon, 49 Cal. 202, 206, it was said: "If a landlord, having the possession, refuses to give it to a lessee, according to the agreement, he renders himself liable to an action of ejectment."

An action for ejectment, i. e., to recover the possession of real property, is within the original jurisdiction of the superior court. Article VI, sec. 5, Constitution of the State of California.

[5] Appellant also sought an accounting based upon the theory that he was ejected and deprived of his right of possession. In Brix v. People's Mutual Life Insurance Co., 2 Cal.2d 446, 41 P.2d 537, it was determined that the superior court had no jurisdiction of plaintiff's cause of action but it was held that where the matters pleaded in the cross-complaint were such as could be litigated only in the Superior Court, the filing of the cross-complaint gave that court jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the controversy. In Cloverdale Union High School District v. Peters, 88 Cal.App. 731, 264 P. 273, 276, the court quotes with approval the following statement of law upon this subject by the Supreme Court of the United States, Merchants' Heat & L. Co. v. James B. Clow & Sons, 204 U.S. 286, 27 S.Ct. 285, 51 L.Ed. 488: "By setting up its counterclaim the defendant became a plaintiff in its turn, invoked the jurisdiction of the court in the same action and by invoking submitted to it. * * *"

Regardless of the ruling of the trial court on the demurrer to the first amended complaint on the question of lack of jurisdiction in the superior court, the relief sought by appellant gave the superior court jurisdiction over the subject matter of the controversy between the appellant and the respondents and, having acquired jurisdiction for any purpose, the trial court correctly exercised it for the purpose of settling the rights of the parties to the action. Tennesen v. Prudential Insurance Co., 8 Cal. App.2d 160, 163, 47 P.2d 1066.

Sales of live chinchillas for breeding purposes only are not "sales for resale", but "retail sales" or "sales at retail" within Retail Sales Tax Act, defining "retail sale" or "sale at retail" as sale for any purpose other than for resale, though pelts of animals sold and of their offspring are sold by purchasers in form of fur coats. Gen.Laws 1937, Act 8493.

Action by the Chapman Chinchilla Sales Company against Charles G. Johnson, as State Treasurer, to recover a sum paid by plaintiff as a retail sales tax. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

TUTTLE, Justice.

This action was brought to recover the sum of $768 paid by plaintiff as a retail sales tax. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff now appeals therefrom.

The facts are undisputed, and the salient parts thereof appear in the following portion of the findings: "Plaintiff was and is a seller of small fur-bearing animals known as Chinchillas, and is engaged in the business of selling at retail, in California, said Chinchillas; that plaintiff sells, in California, said Chinchillas to purchasers who purchase them for the sole purpose of breeding them and multiplying their progeny."

It was also stipulated that the only use to which said animals could be put was for bearing fur and reproducing their kind, and that during the month of June, 1939, for which period the tax was levied, the sales made by plaintiff were of live Chinchillas to breeders for breeding purposes only.

The question presented arises out of a construction of the Retail Sales Tax Act, section 2c, Stats. 1933, page 2599; Deering's General Laws, Act 8493, which provides in part as follows: "A 'retail sale' or 'sale at retail' means a sale to a consumer or to any person for any purpose other than for resale in the form of tangible personal property * * *."

It is the contention of appellant that the sale here does not come within the provisions of said act, for the reason that a sale of such animals was for breeding purposes only; hence, there was a sale for the purpose of resale, and such transactions were not subject to the tax. In support of its position, appellant insists that the retail sale occurs when the pelts of the animals and the pelts of the offspring are sold in the form of a fur coat. They urge that "with reference to the sale of animals for breeding purposes only, it is clear that the true value of such animals is contained in the sperm and ova in the animal at the time of sale, and that the purchase of the animal with the sperm and ova in them is therefore a purchase for the purpose of resale." Respondent has the following answer to the foregoing contention: "Appellant's argument that a sale of Chinchillas for breeding purposes is a sale for resale is on the theory that the Chinchillas are not the thing sold by appellant but that the sperm and ova of the animal are sold and this eventually results in the birth of a Chinchilla which is sold. The weakness of appellant's theory is apparent when we consider that without the live animals there cannot be any reproduction. The reproduction organs cannot be separated from the animals and in fact these organs are not resold but their product is resold, not once, but many times. The value of the animals is in part due to their ability to beget offspring frequently. If we follow appellant's theory we would have to find that the reproductive organs entirely left the parents and became part of the offspring."

We think the latter view is the correct one. The animals are purchased for a use, to-wit, the production of Chinchillas, and not for resale. The fact that they have within them the power to create other Chinchillas does not make the sale of the original Chinchillas a sale for resale. The question involved is the purpose of such a sale. It is not contended that the purchaser ever intends to sell the identical animal to others. The rather ingenious argument of appellant that a sale of the offspring is a resale of a part of the parents, conceding that it is based upon a scientific truth, cannot prevail over the admitted fact that a resale of the identical animals was not contemplated by the purchaser.

The case of Kirk v. Johnson, 37 Cal.App. 2d 224, 99 P.2d 279, 281, while not directly in point, tends to bear out the contention of respondent upon the controlling factor of the "purpose" of the sale, as that word is used in the act. We there said:

"We are of the opinion dairy cows which are bought for the primary purpose of first using them in a dairy business to produce milk for the market during the period of their usefulness for that purpose, which continues for an average of over two years' time, may not be said to have been purchased for 'resale in the form of tangible personal property', merely because the owner intends to market them as beef, when their usefulness for the original purpose for which they were acquired has ceased. Under the circumstances of this case the dairy cattle were not bought 'for resale'. It is apparent that the chief purpose for which they were purchased was not for resale, but they were to be used for the benefit of the owners in conducting their dairy businesses as long as they were profitable for that purpose. The purchases of cattle in this case do not come within the exception of the Retail Sales Tax Act found in section 2(c) thereof, and the sales are therefore not exempt from taxes on that account.

"Nor are the sales of cattle exempt from taxation under the provisions of section 5(e) of the act, merely because they produce milk or for the reason that they may finally be converted into beef, which by-products are excepted from taxable sales. It is the sale of milk and not the source from which it is produced that is exempt; just at it is the sale of 'eggs and egg products' and not the hens that lay the eggs which are exempt from taxes. The exemption clause does not mention cattle or chickens. We must assume, from the failure to do so, that the legislature intended to exempt from taxation only the by-products of cattle and poultry, and not the live animals or birds."

The sales come within the definition of the act, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 13, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 12, 1942.

1. Mortgages ⇐25(6)

In action by son and his wife to cancel note and trust deed executed to deceased father and his wife, which son and wife claimed they had executed merely to protect the son's parents in case son and wife predeceased the father after father had bought land for son and wife to induce them to live near the son's parents, evidence supported judgment canceling note and trust deed on ground that there was no consideration therefor.

2. Mortgages ⇐25(1)

Where parents, to induce son and wife to live near them, furnished son $7,000 to buy land adjoining parents' land and son and wife moved from another part of the state and son assisted parents in care of their property up to time of demise of father, there was "consideration" for vesting of title in such land in son and wife and for payment of purchase price by parents so that note and trust deed executed by son and wife to the father in order to secure parents in event death of son and wife should predecease the father was without consideration.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Consideration".

3. Mortgages ⇐25(1)

Where wife participated in transaction whereby husband paid for land taken in name of son and daughter-in-law adjoining parents' land and permitted son and daughter-in-law to believe they were being vested with title to property without having to repay the purchase price, fact that purchase price was community property and that wife did not consent in writing to transaction did not preclude cancellation of note and trust deed executed by son and daughter-in-law to father for lack of consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; Raymond McIntosh, Judge.

Action by C. E. Hunter and another against Lydia Hunter and another to cancel a note and trust deed. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

C. E. Luckhardt, of San Jose, for appellants.

Grattan, Kirby & Pasquinelli and Owen D. Richardson, all of San Jose, for respondents.

MONCUR, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondents and against appellants quieting title of respondents in and to certain real property in the County of Santa Clara, State of California, cancelling a note executed by respondents to F. A. Hunter, father of respondent C. E. Hunter, and cancelling a trust deed executed and delivered by respondents to F. A. Hunter and appellant Lydia Hunter to secure the payment of said note.

Respondents C. E. Hunter and Maud M. Hunter are husband and wife. F. A. Hunter was the father and appellant Lydia Hunter is the mother of respondent C. E. Hunter, and appellant Grandin H. Miller was named as trustee in the trust deed ordered cancelled by the judgment. During all of the times of the events out of which this action arises F. A. Hunter was living. He died in August, 1935. At the beginning of the events out of which this action developed respondents were living at Browns Valley, Yuba County, California, and F. A. Hunter and appellant Lydia Hunter lived on a ranch in Santa Clara County. The senior Hunters were well along in years and desired to have their son near them for the purpose of helping to farm and manage the ranch upon which they resided, and to do away with the long trips and traffic dangers in going north to visit the son and daughter-in-law, it being their practice to go to the northern part of the state where respondents resided to visit them about twice each year.

For the purpose of inducing respondents to dispose of the property upon which they were living and to come and reside near where the senior Hunters resided, the latter offered to purchase for respondents a piece of land upon which they could reside and make their home. Respondents did not desire to make the move south, although they were desirous at the time of disposing of the property which they had so that they could move to San Francisco where respondent C. E. Hunter had the opportunity of securing a good position. Respondent wife particularly objected to making the move requested by the parents of her husband.

The negotiations continued over a period of time. Finally F. A. Hunter succeeded in finding a place, consisting of thirty-five acres, adjoining the property upon which he and his wife resided, which could be purchased for the sum of seven thousand dollars. This property had no suitable home upon it and was planted only with young trees which would not bear for several years. The condition of this place was one of the grounds upon which respondent Maud Hunter based her objections, as she was averse to leaving her comfortable home where they were then living and to moving upon a place where there were no adequate buildings and where the property for a considerable period would not be income-producing. Eventually respondents were persuaded to accept the proposition and consented to move to Santa Clara County. They succeeded in trading their property in Yuba County for property in Glendale.

F. A. Hunter and respondent C. E. Hunter then proceeded to arrange for the purchase of the thirty-five acre tract involved in this action, which was sold at a trustee's sale. F. A. Hunter gave to respondent son a check for seven thousand dollars for the purpose of purchasing the property. Appellant Lydia Hunter assisted in the drawing of this check. The property was purchased and a deed was executed to respondents. Throughout all of these proceedings appellant Lydia Hunter was present at, and participated in, many of the conversations between the parties in connection with the transaction. The deed to the property was executed and delivered to respondents on or about the 11th day of November, 1932. On or about the 11th day of February, 1933, respondents, without previous discussion with F. A. Hunter and appellant Lydia Hunter, or with either of them, visited appellant Grandin H. Miller, an attorney, and requested him to prepare an instrument which would enable the senior Hunters to secure title to the property in the event that anything should happen to respondents, the reason given by respondents for this action being that they desired to protect the F. A. Hunters in the event that they should predecease F. A. Hunter. A note for seven thousand dollars, bearing four per cent interest, and a deed of trust upon the property to secure its payment was prepared by Mr. Miller, in which he was named trustee, and executed by respondents and delivered to F. A. Hunter and appellant Lydia Hunter.

After moving from Browns Valley to Santa Clara County respondents resided a part of the time with the senior Hunters and a part of the time upon the property involved herein, and respondent C. E. Hunter assisted his parents in the management and care of their property, and during a portion of the time had a lease upon the ranch of his parents.

Shortly after F. A. Hunter's death respondents requested Lydia Hunter to execute to them a release of the trust deed so that it would not appear as an incumbrance against the property. At first appellant Lydia Hunter was willing to execute such release but later refused to do so. This action was then commenced.

In view of the conclusion we have reached, the foregoing is deemed a sufficient statement of the facts. The amended complaint sets forth several counts, the first of which is in the usual form in actions to quiet title to real property, and alleges that plaintiffs are the owners, in the possession, and entitled to the possession of the real property involved. Another count alleges that the said note and trust deed were executed without consideration. In its findings the trial court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint and judgment was entered in conformity with the findings.

[1] There are many sharp conflicts in the evidence. It is the position of the appellants that there was not a gift of the thirty-five acre tract of land involved herein to respondents but that the seven thousand dollar check delivered to respondents for the purchase of the property was a loan or advancement; that the note was given to evidence the loan; and the deed of trust was executed and delivered for the purpose of securing its payment. Appellants contend that there was not sufficient evidence in the record to support the findings and conclusions of the trial court and the judgment made and entered thereon. In connection with this contention, in the brief of appellant it is stated: "The appellant realizes that if there is any evidence in the record that may sustain the respondents' position upon such a question of fact as is squarely placed before the reviewing court on the position as outlined above, that the appellants cannot hope to prevail in their appeal."

It is urged by appellants that in this particular case a much greater burden of proof is required of plaintiffs than is the case in the ordinary civil action. For the making and execution of the note and trust deed a consideration is presumed, and where a gift is first claimed subsequently by the donee, the burden of proof to be sustained by the donee is far and away greater than the proof ordinarily required. The case of Sullivan v. Shea, 32 Cal.App. 369, 162 P. 925, 926, in support of this contention is cited. Therein it is said: "It is also said to be the rule that where a claim of gift is asserted after the death of the donor, every element necessary to constitute a gift must be sustained by explicit and convincing evidence. In support of this rule, in the case of Whalen v. Milholland, 89 Md. [199], 211, 43 A. [45], 50, 44 L.R.A. 208, the court said: 'Mindful of the facility with which, after the alleged donor is dead, fraudulent claims of ownership may be founded on pretended gifts of his property asserted to have been made whilst he was living, it is but a salutary precaution which demands explicit and convincing evidence of every element needed to constitute a valid donation whether it be a donation inter vivos or mortis causa. Even then, fraudulent claims may prevail, but the rigid requirement of the clearest proof will at least diminish the number.' To the same effect see Davis v. Davis, Sup., 104 N.Y. S. 824; De Puy v. Stevens, 37 App.Div. [289], 293, 55 N.Y.S. 810; Denigan v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 127 Cal. [137], 141, 59 P. 389; Lehr v. Jones, supra [74 App.Div. 54, 77 N.Y.S. 213]."

The statement of facts hereinbefore set forth is, in the main, based upon the testimony of respondents. Their testimony was amply corroborated by testimony of other witnesses who were present at some of the conversations of the parties and one of whom actually participated in the consummation of the transaction. The duty devolved upon the trial court, in view of the conflicts and the burden of proof cast upon the respondents in this case, to determine the facts. In its decision the court found that respondents had sustained the burden cast upon them by the explicit and convincing proof required of them. The questions involved were those of fact to be passed upon by the trial court after consideration of all of the evidence and the inferences to be drawn therefrom. Sullivan v. Shea, supra, 32 Cal.App. at page 372, 162 P. 925. We have carefully reviewed all of the evidence adduced at the trial as shown by the transcript on appeal and we cannot say that the facts found are not based upon explicit and convincing evidence sufficient to support the decision of the court and judgment entered thereon.

[2] Further, it appears that, under the facts necessarily found by the trial court, there was consideration for the vesting of title in the thirty-five acre tract in respondents and for the payment by the senior Hunters of the seven thousand dollars as the purchase price. This consideration consisted of the change in the circumstances of respondents at the request and importunities of the senior Hunters and the duties, requirements, and acts resulting therefrom and their conformance therewith up to the time of the demise of F. A. Hunter.

[3] There is also the contention that the seven thousand dollars paid was the community property of F. A. Hunter and appellant Lydia Hunter, and that the latter did not consent, in writing, to the transaction. It is not questioned that the husband may not give away or transfer, without adequate consideration, the community property of the spouses without the written consent of the wife. However, if we assume, for the purpose of this contention only, that the transaction was a gift, nevertheless, appellant Lydia Hunter participated therein. She was at all times familiar with, and participated in what was being done and permitted respondents to believe that they were to be vested with title to the property involved without having to repay the seven thousand dollars or interest thereon. Therefore, we are satisfied that, there being consideration moving between the parties, some of which benefit at least she received, and that she permitted the transaction to be consummated without objection, this contention is untenable. It follows that, as to the note and deed of trust, there was no consideration therefor, the execution and delivery thereof being intended only for the purpose of securing the senior Hunters in the event the death of respondents should precede that of F. A. Hunter. It is not claimed that there were any rulings of the trial court which were prejudicially erroneous.

The facts as found by the trial court being sufficient to support the judgment, it is ordered that the judgment be, and it is hereby affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Georgia P. Bullock, Judge.

Action by Q. A. Knouse against Edwin Marion Shubert and another, to establish a trust in real property and for a reconveyance thereof, and for an accounting of rents collected therefrom. From a judgment for defendants, and from orders denying motions for a new trial and to vacate the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed and appeal from orders dismissed.

Wm. J. Hanlon, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dempster & Dempster and J. H. Creighton, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

This is an action to establish a trust in real property and for a reconveyance thereof, as well as for an accounting of rents collected therefrom. At the conclusion of trial before the court sitting without a jury, judgment was rendered in favor of defendants. This appeal is taken from such judgment on the ground that there is an utter lack of evidence to support it.

An examination of the record herein discloses that respondent Bernice Muriel Shubert is a niece of appellant's wife and after the death of the latter on January 4, 1934, Mrs. Shubert went to reside with appellant and his aged mother where she remained until October, 1937, doing the housework, including the laundry, collecting rents from properties owned by appellant and driving him around in his automobile while he transacted his business.

During this period said respondent obtained a divorce from her husband, whose name was Palmer, and took her maiden name of Edwards, later marrying the respondent Edwin Marion Shubert.

Three pieces of real estate, referred to herein as Alta Vista property, the 77th Street and the 107th Street properties, are involved in this appeal, two other parcels having been eliminated by stipulation during the trial, and the defendants Leask dismissed from the action.

The 77th Street and 107th Street properties were conveyed by appellant to respondent under the name of B. Edwards on January 4, 1936. The Alta Vista property was conveyed to her under the name of B. Palmer on May 14, 1935, by one Minnie Jacobs, the record owner of said parcel which theretofore had been given as security for a loan in favor of appellant. This conveyance was made by Mrs. Jacobs at the request of appellant and recited a consideration of $300.

Appellant claims that he frequently deeded real estate to respondent Bernice Shubert with the oral understanding that she should deed it back to him when requested, and it is conceded that such agreement was carried out with respect to properties other than the parcels which form the basis of the instant litigation. It is contended by appellant that these three parcels were conveyed to said respondent without consideration, that she has deeded them to herself and her husband as joint tenants, and that she holds them in trust for the use and benefit of appellant. There is no claim made of a fraudulent intent on the part of said respondent.

Respondents set up in their answer, among other things, the separate defenses: (1) That appellant made the "deeds to said Bernice Muriel Shubert for the purpose and with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of said plaintiff"; and (2) that said property "was deeded to her as a gift, plaintiff stating to her on many occasions that he intended that she should have a good part of his property."

In support of the latter defense, respondent Bernice Muriel Shubert testified as follows:

"Oh, he told me he was remembering me in his will, he was going to give me a portion of what he had. About the property, the Alta Vista property, he told me he wanted me to have that for my home, and the other two properties, there was one on 77th Street and one on 107th Street, he told me he wanted me to have those in case anything happened that I would not be able to make my living, that the income from those would take care of me." Also, that she was out of the city when the Alta Vista property transaction took place and when she returned appellant gave her the deed and told her what it was; that he gave her the 77th Street and 107th Street properties a few days before her marriage to respondent Edwin Marion Shubert; that she had not refused to deed back to appellant any property which he told her he expected to take back.

The document which conveyed to respondent the 77th and 107th Street parcels reads as follows:

"In consideration of Ten Dollars Q. A. Knouse does Hereby Grant to B. Edwards all that Real Property situate in the City of and County of Los Angeles, State of California, described as follows:

"Lot 10 in Block 21 of Tract 5107 as per map recorded in Book 54 pages 67–68–69 and 70 of Maps, Records of said County;

"Lot 25 Block 14 of Tract 6110 as per map recorded in Book 78 Pages 59 and 60 of Maps, Records of said County.

"Witness my hand this 4" day of Jan. 1936.

"(Signed) Q. A. Knouse"

Although appellant alleges a lack of consideration therefor and an oral promise to reconvey the real estate conveyed thereby, there is nothing on the face of the document itself indicating it was anything other than an unconditional grant of the fee simple title to the lots therein described.

In Smith v. Butler, 84 Cal.App. 90, at page 94, 257 P. 581, at page 582, the court stated, quoting from Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 663, 668, 47 P. 691: "A deed by the owner of land duly signed and acknowledged by him and delivered to the grantee, conveying the land to the latter in fee simple, is one of the most solemn of civil acts. It is not a thing to be played with, or reclaimed at pleasure, as a hawk in falconry. It is not void on account of either want or failure of consideration; nor does want or failure of consideration raise a resulting trust. Leading authorities declaring this principle are cited in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Michigan in Jackson v. Cleveland, 15 Mich. 94, 90 Am.Dec. 266. The court, among other things, say: 'A voluntary deed, which purports to be for the beneficial use of the grantee, and which was made deliberately and without mistake or contrivance, does not differ from any other deed in binding the grantor, and can only be attacked by those having superior equities which the grantor had no right to cut off—as creditors and the like. * * * This doctrine of resulting trusts has never been applied to mere voluntary conveyances. Mere want of consideration has never raised resulting trusts out of these.' * * * 'A court of chancery has never ventured, against the express will of the donor appearing on the face of the deed, "to take the use from the donee, and give it back to the donor" ' ". It is also said in the cited case, quoting from Devlin on Deeds, section 834: "But parol declarations cannot be received with this object, for in these cases there exists no resulting or presumptive trust, and the admission of such evidence would be for the purpose of contradicting the written instrument, and establishing a trust in the very teeth of the statute of frauds."

[1] In the absence of a showing of fraud or undue influence, it would appear from the foregoing that a resulting trust cannot be predicated upon a voluntary and unconditional grant of real estate.

[2, 3] Turning to the Alta Vista property which was transferred to respondent Bernice Muriel Shubert by Minnie Jacobs at the request of appellant, who paid the purchase price thereof, this transaction raises the presumption of a resulting trust in favor of appellant under the provisions of section 853 of the Civil Code. However, such presumption is rebuttable and "oral declarations of the payor's intention to make a gift to the transferee are admissible to show that the payor intended that the transferee should have the beneficial interest in the property, even though the property transferred was an interest in land and the Statute of Frauds is in force. Such declarations are admissible, whether made before or at the time of or subsequent to the transfer. As the resulting trust arises from parol evidence so it may be rebutted by parol evidence." Restatement of the Law—Trusts, section 441, Comment b, p. 1348.

[4, 5] A careful examination of the record and a thorough review of the testimony produced on behalf of the parties herein reveal that, while there is evidence in favor of appellant's theory of the case, there is also ample evidence to support the findings of the trial court upholding respondents' contentions. Such testimony, in line with the contradictory statements and inconsistent claims of the parties, is irreconcilably conflicting. That being so, "the findings of the trial court are conclusive. 'The rule adverted to above, that the jury [or the court sitting without a jury] is ordinarily the sole judge of the weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses, applies with great force in a case of conflict. * * *' (10 Cal.Jur. pp. 1171, 1172, sec. 382, 383, citing (authorities) * * *)." McKean v. Alliance Land Co., 200 Cal. 396, 398, 253 P. 134.

The judgment is affirmed. The appeals from the orders denying motions for new trial and to vacate the judgment are dismissed.

Hearing Denied Feb. 19, 1942.

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⇐64(1)

Under provision of Civil Code invalidating as to existing creditors any voluntary transfer or encumbrance of property without valuable consideration by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, the grantor's intent is immaterial. Civ.Code, § 3442.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⇐57(1)

In determining whether person alleged to have made fraudulent conveyance was then "insolvent", only such assets as were subject to court process at the time of making the alleged fraudulent conveyance may be considered. Civ.Code, §§ 3442, 3450.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Insolvent".

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⇐272, 300(1)

In action to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance under statute invalidating as against creditors voluntary transfers without valuable consideration while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, a showing by complaining creditor that there was no consideration makes out a prima facie case, and burden is then shifted to the defendant to show that the grantor had sufficient assets to pay his debts. Civ.Code, § 3442.

4. Executors and administrators ⇐129(3)

In action to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance by decedent, where establishment of contention that decedent was solvent at time of conveyance depended upon a showing that there was money owing to him from his brother's estate, testimony of decedent's son that decedent had a third interest in the income of the estate was insufficient to establish that, on date of making of conveyance, there was anything which was subject to court's process due decedent from brother's estate. Civ.Code, §§ 3442, 3450.

5. Appeal and error ⇐891

In action involving question of whether decedent at time of making alleged fraudulent conveyance was entitled to any money from his brother's estate, where defendant had failed to meet burden of showing that anything was due, the plaintiff's application, made after filing of briefs on appeal and prior to oral argument, for leave to take additional evidence on that point was dismissed.

6. Appeal and error ⇐843(1)

Although insufficiency of evidence on one of issues required reversal of judgment for defendant, another of plaintiff's points was considered by reviewing court where it appeared that point would likely arise on retrial and plaintiff would be entitled to a directed judgment on appeal if his contention was correct.

7. Fraudulent conveyances ⇐241(1)

Where resident debtor after contracting debts within state makes voluntary conveyance without valuable consideration of property within state, rendering himself insolvent, his creditors are not compelled to go into distant states to collect their debts from debtor's property there, but are entitled to have the gift conveyance set aside. Civ.Code, § 3442.

8. Executors and administrators ⇐57

In determining whether decedent, who had allegedly made a fraudulent conveyance, was then "insolvent" within statute invalidating as to existing creditors any voluntary transfer without valuable consideration by an insolvent, decedent's alleged interest in his brother's estate in Massachusetts was immune from process of the local jurisdiction and could not be considered as an asset of decedent. Civ.Code, §§ 3442, 3450.

9. Executors and administrators ⇐57

The fact that, according to an account filed in decedent's estate in 1932, assets were then sufficient to pay amount owing to plaintiff as of date on which decedent allegedly made a fraudulent conveyance was immaterial in determining whether decedent was solvent on that date, where order settling the account was subsequently set aside and assets in decedent's estate were insufficient to liquidate plaintiff's claim after establishment thereof in 1937. Civ.Code, §§ 3442, 3450.

10. Appeal and error ⇐1122(2)

Since action to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance was one wherein a trial by jury was not a matter of right, the reviewing court was authorized by statute to make findings based upon evidence adduced at the trial contrary to the ultimate finding made by the trial court. Code Civ.Proc. § 956a.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Frank M. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Wilder Wight against Alma Rebecca Rohlffs, as executrix of the estate of Emma Cahill, to set aside a gift deed made by Patrick Cahill. From a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff appealed, and on the appeal filed an application for leave to take additional evidence.

Application dismissed and judgment reversed with directions.

KNIGHT, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to set aside a gift deed made by Patrick Cahill about ten months prior to his death and recorded five weeks after he died.

[1] The action was brought under the authority of Civil Code sections 3439 and 3442, which are now merged in the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act. Stats.1939, Chap. 329, p. 1667. Section 3439 declared void as against creditors transfers of property made with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands; and section 3442 provided: "* * that any transfer or encumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors." Plaintiff was admittedly a creditor of Cahill's at the time the latter transferred his property; and defendant concedes that the conveyance under attack was made and given voluntarily and without any valuable consideration of any kind. But at the trial defendant denied that said conveyance was made with intent to defraud, and claimed that by the making thereof Cahill did not render himself insolvent. The trial court held in defendant's favor on both issues. It is well settled that if the conditions set forth in said section 3442 are present, the intent of the grantor is immaterial and the transfer, regardless of the actual intent, is void as to creditors. Lefrooth v. Prentice, 202 Cal. 215, 259 P. 947, and cases cited therein. On this appeal plaintiff challenges the soundness of the conclusions reached by the trial court on both of the issues above mentioned, but his main attack is directed against the conclusion that by making said transfer Cahill did not render himself insolvent.

The action was instituted following the termination of previous litigation between plaintiff and defendant involving the financial transactions between Cahill and plaintiff, wherein two appeals were taken; and as shown by the decisions rendered on those appeals and by the record herein, the events which led up to the bringing of the present action were these: Prior to 1918 Cahill and plaintiff purchased 82 acres of encumbered land in San Joaquin County, Cahill supplying the larger portion of the purchase price. The land was cultivated to the growing of olives, and was purchased by Cahill and plaintiff for the purpose of subdividing it and selling the parcels at a profit. On account of plaintiff being incapacitated, Cahill was left in charge of the management and sale of the property, and on December 9, 1918, he executed an instrument declaring he held in trust for plaintiff a one-third interest in said property. Thereafter from time to time Cahill sold the various parcels and discharged the encumbrances. The last parcel was sold in 1929, and on May 3, 1930, Cahill made the gift deed in question to his wife, Emma Cahill, whereby he conveyed to her all real property of which he was the owner. The property was situate in Alameda County, and was of the value of over $30,000. The deed was acknowledged before Cahill's son, a notary, and left with his son to be recorded after Cahill's death. He died on February 25, 1931, and the deed was filed for record on April 3, 1931. Cahill's wife died on November 14, 1931; and the defendant, Alma Rebecca Rohlffs, a daughter, was appointed administratrix and executrix, respectively, of the Patrick and Emma Cahill estates.

Plaintiff was unaware that Cahill had sold all of the San Joaquin acreage until after Cahill's death, and thereupon he presented a claim against Cahill's estate. The claim was rejected, and plaintiff sued on the rejected claim and for an accounting. Judgment was given for the defendant, but the trial judge granted a new trial. The defendant appealed, and on plaintiff's motion, after a hearing, the appeal was dismissed. Wight v. Rohlffs, 137 Cal.App. 730, 31 P. 2d 419. A retrial of the action resulted in the rendition of a money judgment in plaintiff's favor, for the sum of $9,682.90, plus costs. The judgment was entered on June 5, 1936; the defendant appealed, and on September 30, 1937, the judgment was affirmed. Wight v. Rohlffs, 9 Cal.2d 620, 72 P.2d 142. The Patrick Cahill estate being without assets to satisfy any part of plaintiff's judgment, plaintiff on December 7, 1937, brought the present action against the defendant as executrix of the Emma Cahill estate to set aside said deed of gift. The trial court found that on May 3, 1930, the date of the making of the gift deed, Cahill owed plaintiff $6926.97, but as already stated held that by making said deed Cahill did not render himself insolvent. Accordingly judgment was entered for the defendant.

[2, 3] Section 3450 of the Civil Code declares: "A debtor is insolvent, within the meaning of this title, when he is unable to pay his debts from his own means, as they become due." (Italics ours.) In determining the issue of a debtor's solvency under said section, in cases of this kind, it is held that only such assets as are subject to court process at the time of the making of the alleged fraudulent conveyance may be considered; and that even though "A man controlling property out of which he may voluntarily pay his debts, if he will, but which for any reason cannot be reached by process of law, and thus without his consent subjected to such payment, is nevertheless insolvent." Adams v. Prather, 176 Cal. 33, 167 P. 534, 538; 12 Cal.Jur., p. 1019. And as to the burden of proof, the defendant in her brief (pp. 11 and 12) concedes the rule to be that "* * * if, in a fraudulent conveyance case under section 3442 of the Civil Code, the complaining creditor shows that the deed was executed without consideration, a prima facie case is made and the burden is then shifted to the grantor or grantee or whoever may be defending the case, to show that the grantor had sufficient assets to pay his debts. This has been the rule for a long time," says the defendant, "and when a grantor, or his grantee, or whoever is defending the case, meets this burden by showing that the grantor was solvent, the burden ceases."

The evidence introduced and relied upon by defendant to establish that by the making of said gift deed Cahill did not render himself insolvent, involves three items: (1) $1,972.85 deposited in a joint commercial bank account standing in the names of Cahill and his wife; (2) a promissory note signed by John Chinn for the principal sum of $4,500 secured by a trust deed to land near Lodi; (3) an asserted interest in his brother's estate in Massachusetts. With reference to the joint bank account, plaintiff contends that at best only half of the property owned in joint tenancy by two persons may be reached on execution issued against one of the joint owners, citing Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 541, 79 Am.Dec. 147, (cited approvingly in Veach v. Adams, 51 Cal. 609) and Stanton v. French, 83 Cal. 194, 23 P. 355; whereas defendant claims that the entire deposit should be included. As to the promissory note, plaintiff takes the position that its value is not determined by the face of the note, but by its execution sale value; and that no evidence was offered or received as to such value. Defendant argues that it is the market value of the note which controls, rather than the execution sale value; and in this connection the record shows that evidence was introduced to the effect that the original note secured by the trust deed was given for $5,500; that in 1929 a payment of $1,000 was made thereon, and on February 28, 1930, a renewal note was given for $4,500; that the land covered by the deed of trust was appraised as of May 3, 1930 (the date of the gift deed), at $6,000, and as of February 25, 1931 (the date of Cahill's death), at $4,500; and that subsequent to Cahill's death the administratrix of his estate paid the maker of the note $50 and obtained a grant deed to the property. With regard to the third item, Cahill's asserted interest in his brother's estate in Massachusetts, plaintiff contends that under well established legal principles the same cannot be listed at all as an asset in determining the question of Cahill's solvency as of the date of the making of the gift deed.

[4] In the final analysis, therefore, the decision on appeal turns upon the question of whether Cahill's asserted interest in his brother's estate in Massachusetts may be reckoned as an asset subject to court process as of the date of the making of the gift deed, for if it may not, then the trial court's conclusion as to Cahill's solvency as of that date cannot be sustained, because as will be noted, even though the entire amount of the joint bank account be added to the full face value of the promissory note, the total falls short by several hundred dollars of reaching the amount of Cahill's indebtedness to plaintiff as of the date of the making of the gift deed. One of the reasons assigned by plaintiff for the exclusion of said asserted interest is that defendant utterly failed to prove that at the time Cahill made the gift deed he was the owner of any interest in or that there was any sum of money whatever due him from his brother's estate, which was subject to court process or which Cahill was entitled to use to pay his creditors, even if he had been so disposed. The point is well taken. No documentary proof whatever was introduced by defendant concerning said asserted interest. The evidence relied upon consisted of the testimony given by Cahill's daughter (the defendant) and his son. However, all of the daughter's testimony relating to said asserted interest was stricken out upon the ground it was hearsay; and the only testimony given by the son upon this subject which the trial court permitted to stand after granting certain motions to strike was that his father "had a third interest in the income of the estate of Michael Cahill"; that prior to the making of the gift deed his father received three checks from the estate of his brother which "had the insignia of Michael Cahill"; that "after May 3, 1930" (the date of making the gift deed) his father received three checks for the total sum of $4,803, which he stated were received "over a period of five months," but the dates were not given. As already pointed out, in order to establish Cahill's solvency it was essential for defendant to prove that on May 3, 1930, the date of the making of the gift deed, there was due Cahill from his brother's estate, and subject to court process, either money or property sufficient in amount to overcome the several hundred dollars deficiency above mentioned; and it will be noted that the son's testimony utterly fails to establish that fact. It does not appear therefrom that on that date any money whatever was due Cahill; and if the testimony be construed as showing that on that date Cahill was the owner of a life estate in one-third of the income from his brother's estate, there is still an entire absence of any evidence proving that on said date there was any money due him therefrom; and in that situation, the bare life estate in income may not be considered in determining the question of solvency. Adams v. Prather, supra.

In the case just cited, Mrs. Prather by her will as it was construed by the Supreme Court bequeathed her husband a life estate in all her property with unrestricted power in his lifetime to use, consume and expend all or any part of the property, but giving certain nieces an estate in remainder in the unexpended portion; but the husband could not as of right give the property away in his lifetime nor make it the subject of testamentary disposition after his death. Mrs. Prather died in 1906, and her estate was valued at some $600,000. Prather was stricken with fatal illness on April 2, 1913, and died seventeen days later. On the date he was stricken ill he owned exclusive of any interest in his wife's estate property of the value of about $106,000, and owed debts thereafter proved and allowed against his estate in the sum of approximately $234,000, all of which had been contracted by him after the death of his wife and all of which were due and payable on April 2d. During the latter days of his illness by way of gift conveyances and assignments made without consideration he transferred to his brother real and personal property then owned by him and constituting no part of his wife's estate, the value of which was approximately $96,000, leaving at the time of his death exclusive of his wife's estate then in process of administration property of the value of about $9,737. Being unable to pay Prather's creditors out of his estate, his executor sued to set aside the gift conveyances and assignments, and in defense of the action it was claimed that by reason of Prather's life estate created by his wife's will he was not insolvent. The court held to the contrary, and in so holding went on to say: "Assuming that, under the will of his wife, Thomas Prather obtained a life estate only, coupled with the powers hereinbefore mentioned, appellant [the grantee] insists that at the time of making the gifts he [Thomas Prather] could, in the exercise of such powers, have used the property of the estate and proceeds of the sale thereof for the purpose of paying his debts. Conceding this to be true, it is answered by the fact that he did not exercise such power which he alone could exercise, but during the latter days of his illness, lasting less than three weeks, conscious as he must have been of his early demise, charged with knowledge that the interest in his wife's estate, from which during his lifetime he was empowered voluntarily to pay his debts, would terminate upon his death, and knowing that, in the absence of such voluntary payment, his creditors who, under the circumstance, were powerless to enforce their demands by process of law, must look to his estate for payment, he gave away the sole and only property possessed by him which at his death could be subjected to the payment of his large indebtedness, and which but for such acts would have been appropriated to such purpose. A man controlling property out of which he may voluntarily pay his debts, if he will, but which for any reason cannot be reached by process of law and thus without his consent subjected to such payment, is nevertheless insolvent. Eddy v. Baldwin, 32 Mo. 369; Schwabacher v. Kane, 13 Mo.App. 126. The property of Prather's deceased wife was so situated that, conceding he might voluntarily have used it to pay his debts, the circumstances were such that it could not by legal process be reached after his death by his creditors who, as we have seen, were dependent for payment upon an act, the performance of which he withheld. The effect of his acts, under the circumstances shown, was, as found by the court, to create a condition of insolvency as to his creditors, and ample evidence exists for the finding that the gifts were made in contemplation of the insolvency of his estate and with the intent and purpose of defrauding his creditors."

[5] It follows, therefore, in the present case, that whatever may have been the nature of Cahill's interest in his brother's estate, defendant failed to prove that there was anything due therefrom on the date of the making of the gift deed, which was subject to process, and that being so, said asserted interest cannot be listed as an asset in determining the question of his solvency as of that date. Before leaving this point it should be stated that at the trial plaintiff objected to the oral testimony given by Cahill's son to the effect that his father "had a third interest in the income of the estate of Michael Cahill" upon the ground that it was not the best evidence; and his objections were overruled. And after the filing of the briefs on appeal and prior to oral argument plaintiff made written application to this court for leave to take additional evidence, consisting of the records in the Michael Cahill estate, the purpose of the application being to show that Cahill's interest in his brother's estate amounted to nothing more than "the right to receive during his lifetime, one-third of the net income, if any, of said estate after the payment of the sum of $20.00 per week to decedent's sister." However, since defendant failed to meet the burden of establishing that said asserted interest may be reckoned as an asset, it becomes unnecessary to consider the merits of plaintiff's application, and the same is hereby dismissed.

[6-8] Plaintiff's other major contention is that regardless of the question of the failure of proof, Cahill's interest in his brother's estate, whatever it may have been, being admittedly situate outside of this state, and hence immune from process of the local jurisdiction, cannot in any event, under well settled legal principles, in an action of this kind, be considered in determining the question of his solvency as of the date of the making of the gift deed. At first thought it would seem that since the conclusion reached on the issue of insufficiency of evidence calls for a reversal, a determination of plaintiff's alternative point is unnecessary to a disposal of the appeal. But the record shows that the point was urged before the trial court, and received an adverse ruling; and it is apparent that if on retrial the defendant seeks to supply additional evidence to overcome the factual defect above pointed out, the question of the admissibility of all such evidence will again arise, and that the propriety of the ruling thereon, whether favorable or unfavorable to plaintiff, will serve as ground for another appeal. Obviously, if plaintiff's point is good he is entitled on this appeal not only to a reversal, but to a directed judgment, and thus be relieved of the expense of a retrial and bring to a final termination litigation which has already extended over a period of ten years. To repeat what has often been said, there should be an end to litigation; and after having examined the authorities submitted by the respective parties we are convinced that plaintiff's alternative point should be sustained. Corpus Juris, vol. 27, at page 552, gives the rule as follows: "If the property retained is such that it cannot be sold under execution or attachment, or is located in another state * * * it will not avail." In Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, 4th Ed., p. 298, the rule is stated thus: "Whether the property reserved is what will be deemed ample does not depend entirely on the amount and value, as the real end to be accomplished is that the conveyance shall not deprive creditors of the means of collecting their debts. Hence the nature and situation of the property are to be regarded as well as the amount and value. * * * The property must also be in the state where the donor resides. If it is in some other country, where the creditors cannot reach it, the gift may be set aside." In Bigelow on Fraudulent Conveyances, Rev.Ed., p. 225, the author says: "* * * it follows that a creditor would make a case against a voluntary alienation by his debtor by showing that even if he had means left with which to pay his debts, they were effectually concealed or placed where they could not be taken, or were in some distant state and not easily obtainable." Such doctrine was invoked and applied in this state in Schwartz v. Brandon, 97 Cal.App. 30, 275 P. 448, 450, wherein the question of a grantor's solvency arose in an action to set aside a gift deed which was made one day prior to the rendition against the grantor of an award by the Industrial Accident Commission; and in holding that assets situate outside the state could not be considered in determining the question of the grantor's solvency, the court said: "There is some evidence that he owns some property in the Azores Islands. This may be dismissed from consideration, as no court would be heard to say that a workmen's compensation for industrial injury shall go to a foreign country for liquidation while the debtor gives away his California property for the reasons of love and affection, thus putting it presumptively beyond his power to respond in damages." Numerous cases from other jurisdictions may be cited, which adhere to the same doctrine. Among them is James v. Stokes, 203 Ky. 127, 261 S.W. 868, 877, wherein the court said: "Lastly, it is contended that since the proof shows the defendant Stokes to be solvent because of the property he owns in New York, the remedy resorted to by plaintiff cannot be maintained although the conveyed property was all that Stokes owned in this jurisdiction. * * * we are convinced that, because a defendant may possess property in some other jurisdiction or country upon the globe, he is not thereby entitled to fraudulently convey all of his locally situated property and which a local creditor is liable to subject, so as to compel that creditor to go to a foreign jurisdiction to collect his debt." Again in Rohrer v. Snyder, 29 Wash. 199, 69 P. 748, 749, the following language was used: "A creditor, before he is permitted to attack a conveyance which he conceives to be fraudulent, is not obliged to search the entire world for unincumbered property out of which to make his debt. It is sufficient if he finds none within the jurisdiction of the court in which he seeks to set aside the fraudulent conveyance." Other cases holding to the same effect are Baker v. Lyman, 53 Ga. 339; Drake v. Ward-Truitt Co., 149 Ga. 54, 99 S.E. 125; and Price v. Mazange & Co., 31 Ala. 701. In Baker v. Lyman the court said: "The attack upon that deed is, that it was made with the intention to delay or defraud creditors, and the jury so found. It is not a sufficient reply to say that the debtor had sufficient property in another and distant state to discharge his indebtedness." The basic theory of the doctrine seems to be that if a resident debtor contracts debts in the state wherein he resides, and then makes voluntary conveyance without valuable consideration of his property situate within that state, whereby he renders himself insolvent, he thus deprives his creditors of that which is rightfully theirs; and in those circumstances they are not compelled to go into distant states to collect their debts, but are entitled to have the gift conveyance set aside.

Defendant does not question the fairness or soundness of the doctrine, but contends that it is not the law of this state. A careful analysis of the cases relied on by defendant demonstrates, however, that factually each of them is essentially different from this one and that the precise point here involved was not there decided. In Sacry v. Lobree, 84 Cal. 41, 23 P. 1088; Everts v. Sunset Farms, Inc., 9 Cal.2d 691, 72 P.2d 543, and McKee v. Title Ins. & Tr. Co., 159 Cal. 206, 113 P. 140, the question of outside property was not involved at all. In Cook v. Cockins, 117 Cal. 140, 48 P. 1025, 1030, the question was raised but not decided, the court having there expressly stated: "The question is too important a one to decide in a case where it is not necessarily involved." It is evident, therefore, that any discussion appearing in the decision of that case on that question must be regarded as dictum. Furthermore, that case and those cited therein were all decided prior to the 1895 amendment to section 3442, which amendment completely changed the rule, so that a voluntary conveyance without valuable consideration made by an insolvent or by one in contemplation of insolvency is now conclusively presumed to be fraudulent as to existing creditors. 12 Cal.Jur. p. 1019. Then again in that case the grantor was a resident of the outside state in which the property was situate. Consequently both the grantor and his property were subject to the process of the courts of that jurisdiction; whereas here the grantor was a resident of this state, and the assets in question were situate in another state. Therefore the process of neither jurisdiction could have been invoked against both the grantor and his assets. In the case of First Nat. Bank v. Ranger, 49 Cal.App. 447, 193 P. 788, the plaintiff was an Oklahoma bank to which the grantor became indebted as an endorser on a promissory note. The bank brought the action in California to set aside voluntary transfers made by the grantor to his wife conveying real property in this state. Judgment was given for the grantee, and on appeal the judgment was affirmed. While in that case the trial court in dealing with the question of the grantor's solvency took into account certain leases of oil lands in Oklahoma, the question of whether it committed error in so doing was not discussed, nor, so far as the decision shows, ever raised as an issue in the case. In Turner v. Tjensvold, 214 Cal. 105, 3 P.2d 1018, 1019, the trustee in bankruptcy brought suit for the purpose, among others, of setting aside a quitclaim deed made by the bankrupt to his son. The major portion of the indebtedness owed by the bankrupt was to creditors in Canada, wherein he resided before coming to California; and the undisputed testimony showed that at the time of the making of the deed in question his property in Canada exceeded in value the amount of these debts, and at that time his business was prospering and he had adequate means to meet all of his indebtedness. In affirming the trial court's judgment in favor of the grantee the court said: "In this state of the evidence we cannot say that it is insufficient to support the finding as to the solvency of said Gabriel Tjensvold [the bankrupt]." Therefore, all that was held in that case, so far as we are here concerned, was that since the major portion of the grantor's indebtedness was incurred in Canada with creditors there residing, and at the time of the making of the deed in question the grantor was the owner of property in Canada of the value of more than sufficient to pay them, it could not be said that the finding of the trial court as to his solvency was without evidentiary support. Hasenjeager v. Voth, 91 Cal.App. 394, 267 P. 146, 147, is not in point for the reason that it was brought, not under section 3442, but section 3439. As said in the opinion: "At the outstart it may be noted that the complaint, since it failed to charge that the conveyance was without consideration, does not attempt by its allegations to charge fraud in law as designated in section 3442 of the Civil Code. Franck v. Moran, 36 Cal. App. 32, 171 P. 841. The complaint attempts simply to charge fraud in fact, without any further specifications of fact than to allege that the conveyance was made with intent to defraud and that the grantor was insolvent." It will be seen, therefore, that the solvency of the grantor was not the controlling issue. Moreover, the testimony relating to outside property was received without objection. The decision in Thompson v. Paige, 16 Cal. 77, is too indefinite to be considered as an authority on any question here involved. The action was for damages against the sheriff for an alleged illegal levy on certain fruit trees, and the appeal was decided in 1860. It appears from the head-notes that the court refused to give an instruction reading: "That a man who is insolvent for the want of means to pay his debts in this State, is in law insolvent, without reference to any property in another State"; and in commenting on the refusal to give the instruction it was merely said: "We see no evidence in respect to the insolvency of Webster, and the proposition is too broadly asserted, if there was any proof upon which it could rest." Just how the question of insolvency could have arisen in that case does not appear from the decision. As above indicated, we find nothing in any of the foregoing cases which may be construed as holding that the doctrine here contended for by plaintiff is not the law of this state.

[9] The final point made by defendant is that according to an account filed in Cahill's estate in 1932 there were sufficient assets out of which to pay the amount due plaintiff as of May 3, 1930. With respect thereto it will suffice to say that the order settling said account was subsequently set aside. No part of plaintiff's claim against Cahill's estate was definitely established until the affirmance of the judgment thereon in his favor on September 30, 1937; and admittedly neither at that time nor thereafter have there been sufficient assets in Cahill's estate to liquidate plaintiff's claim.

[10] The judgment is therefore reversed; and since the action is one wherein a trial by a jury is not a matter of right, and in our opinion calls for the exercise of the powers conferred by section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, this court finds from the evidence adduced at the trial, and contrary to the ultimate finding made by the trial court, that by the making of said gift deed Cahill, the grantor, was rendered insolvent, and that the gift deed, as to creditors, was and is therefore null and void. The trial court is directed to enter judgment accordingly, and to grant such other and further relief necessary and appropriate to protect the rights of plaintiff as a creditor, and to carry out the views herein expressed.

MOUL v. McVEY.

Civ. 11739.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 13, 1942.

1. Witnesses ⇐125

The object of statute disqualifying witnesses to transactions with decedents is to so balance rights as between survivor and decedent that no advantage may be taken of a decedent because of his inability to testify and that personal representative may not take advantage of the survivor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

2. Witnesses ⇐178(1)

The limitations of statute disqualifying witnesses to transactions with decedents may be waived by personal representative by calling the survivor as a witness and going into the transaction had by him with decedent, and in so doing he "waives" benefit of the statute and opens the door to witness to testify in his own behalf fully as to transaction gone into. Code Civ.Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waive".

3. Witnesses ⇐178(4)

The limitations of statute disqualifying witnesses to transactions with decedents are "waived" and survivor may testify when his deposition is taken in the action by executor or admininistrator whether it is read in evidence upon trial or not.

4. Witnesses ⇐178(4)

In physician's action against executor to recover for professional services rendered decedent, executor, who offered portions of physician's previous testimony in judicial proceedings in support of executor's contentions, indirectly made the physician executor's own witness and could not invoke the statute disqualifying witnesses to transactions with decedents, and physician could testify fully in explanation of admissions charged against him. Code Civ.Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

5. Witnesses ⇐178(4)

It is not the dignity with which a judicial admission is clothed nor its competency nor the weight to be accorded it as evidence that lifts the bar of statute disqualifying witnesses to transactions with decedents, but it is the advantage accruing to executor or administrator by its use that unseals the lips of survivor. Code Civ.Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1056(1)

In physician's action against executor to recover for professional services rendered decedent, wherein executor had introduced in evidence portions of testimony which physician had given in previous judicial proceedings, the ruling of trial court in not permitting physician to testify in his own behalf in explanation of such prior testimony was a denial of a substantial right and warranted reversal of the judgment. Code Civ.Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Charles T. Moul against John L. McVey, as executor, etc., to recover on a claim rejected by the executor for services rendered to decedent. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

William A. Lahanier, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry C. Morrison and John L. McVey in pro. per., both of Oakland, for respondent.

B. C. JONES, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is from a judgment entered in the trial court against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff, a physician and surgeon, filed a creditor's claim against the estate of the decedent claiming as due him for professional services rendered the decedent during her lifetime the sum of nine thousand dollars. This claim was rejected by the executor. The plaintiff thereupon instituted this action to recover on the claim and judgment went against him.

The appellant's specifications of error are directed to various adverse rulings of the trial court upon the admission of evidence. The most important of his contentions goes to his right to take the stand and testify in his own behalf after his adversary had introduced in evidence portions of testimony which he had given in previous judicial proceedings. During the progress of the trial the defendant executor produced a transcript which, as stipulated, contained the testimony of the plaintiff given in a proceeding to have a guardian appointed for the decedent in her lifetime. According to the transcript of this case, the following proceedings then ensued:

"Mr. McVey: Yes. Now, if the Court please, I am reading from the testimony of Doctor Moul.

"Mr. Lahanier: Q. What page?

"Mr. McVey: 138 given on the 27th day of August, 1935, reading first from page 137, line 16: 'A. I mean that I have given Mrs. Wells a great portion of my time. Q. As her physician? A. As a physician mainly. Q. Do you think that the major part of your time is necessary to be given to Mrs. Wells, to take care of her? A. Mrs. Wells has—yes, I do. Mr. Gillis: Then he can explain. A. It is my opinion that Mrs. Wells should have every possible attention and should have a physician constantly by her or within close reach. Mrs. Wells suffers from periodic attacks of angina pectoris, some of which may be fatal to her. She has prodromes of these attacks. I can conscientiously say that when she complains of any of the prodromes—by that I mean warnings—that they are dangerous. Mr. McVey: Q. And you think it is necessary that she have a physician with her at night? A. Not all the time but a great deal of the time. Q. A great part of your time is devoted to taking care of her, isn't it? A. It is. Q. What do you think is the reasonable value of your services that you have given to her already? A. I have not thought about it. I don't know what her income was. I gave it voluntarily and considered my services in relation to people's means. Q. What about figuring that her income is $1500.00 a month, what do you figure you would charge her estate for work you have done already, per month? A. I have recently heard that figure mentioned. I think that $4500 is a reasonable fee. Q. Well, you have been paid that, haven't you? A. No, I have not been paid. Q. You heard her testimony in the Hotel Oakland, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. You heard her say she paid you $400 a month, didn't you? A. No, she has not paid me. She may have given me $400.00 on some months but the total was not paid me like that. Q. Is there any month she has not paid you money? A. Yes, lots of them, lots of months she has not. Q. Do you keep a book with her account in it? A. I have a record of it. Q. In the event that Mrs. Wells should die to-morrow, you have not—your bill has not paid been paid, has it? A. No, my bill has not been paid. Q. You figure right now she owes you about $4500.00? A. I have not figured it up, Mr. McVey, but I think that for the past two years I have spent the greatest part of my time with her and I should say for those two years, the greater part of my time; I have been giving up my social activities and I have spent a great deal of time outside of my office, some of it spent at her request and some taking care of her in sickness. I have lost money from it. I have had to borrow money from the Morris Plan this year. My finances have dropped considerably this year. Q. You don't know anything about putting in a bill for $250.00 a month in this matter, do you? A. Not until it had been spoken of. Q. If that was in there it would not be satisfactory to you at all? A. Not for what I have been doing for her. Q. If it is in there you don't figure that is pay for your services, do you? A. I should consider that in relation to her income and other obligations. Q. Have you ever given Mrs. Wells a bill for the work that you have done for her? A. No. Q. Have you given her a receipt for moneys paid to you? A. No. Q. So if you would put in a claim tomorrow against her estate there would not be a single paper to show what she paid you? A. I am very positive there would not.'"

Another transcript was produced by the executor containing other testimony given by the plaintiff in still another proceeding, and from the transcript on file herein the following occurrences appear:

"Mr. McVey: Now, I will offer in evidence, if the Court please, testimony taken on April 8, 1940 in the Probate Department in this court in the matter of the Estate of Mary F. Wells, deceased, No. 73213, the proceeding to ascertain, concerning the property of Mary F. Wells.

"Mr. Lahanier: May I see it?

"Mr. McVey: Yes. (Handing transcript to counsel.)

"Mr. McVey: Doctor Charles Moul is a witness sworn and testified as follows:— (Handing papers to counsel to examine them.)

"Mr. McVey: It better be stipulated, Mr. Lahanier, it will be stipulated those were the purported change of beneficiaries.

"Mr. Lahanier: Yes.

"Mr. McVey: (Reading) 'Have you ever seen these papers before? They are requests to change the beneficiaries named in Mrs. Wells' insurance policies. (Handing to the witness who examines.) A. I never saw these papers before, Mr. McVey. Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Mrs. Wells about these papers? A. The only conversation I had regarding any of her annuities, Mr. McVey, was that Mrs. Wells promised to allot me an annuity in return or when my services were brought up to the amount that the annuity called for, that she would provide for me by the annuity. But that was never done, I never saw any annuity.'"

[1-3] The appellant did not object to the introduction of these statements in evidence, but he took the position in the trial court, and he takes the same position here, that the introduction of his testimony, although given in another proceeding, lifted the bar of the statute prohibiting him from testifying in support of his claim against the estate. The incompetency of one suing to establish a claim against the estate of a deceased person to testify against an executor or administrator as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of the decedent is declared by sub. 3 of sec. 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The soundness of the rule is not open to question. Pearson v. Parsons, 173 Cal. 331, 159 P. 1171; Estate of Emerson, 175 Cal. 724, 167 P. 149. The object of the statute is to so balance rights as between the survivor and the deceased that no advantage may be taken of a deceased person because of the fact that his lips are sealed by death, and that the personal representative may not take advantage of the survivor. Cole v. Sweet, 187 N.Y. 488, 80 N.E. 355. The limitations of the statute may be waived by the personal representative by calling the survivor as a witness and going into the transaction had by him with the decedent. In so doing he waives the benefit of the statute and opens the door to the witness to testify in his own behalf fully as to the transaction gone into. Kinley v. Largent, 187 Cal. 71, 200 P. 937. Likewise the door is opened to the survivor when his deposition is taken in the action by the executor or administrator whether it is read in evidence upon the trial or not. McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 206 P. 454; Borgess Inv. Co. v. Vette, 142 Mo. 560, 44 S.W. 754, 64 Am.St.Rep. 567.

If the testimony given in evidence had been taken from a deposition given by the plaintiff in the case, or had been given by him from the witness stand herein, there would be no room for discussion as to his right to testify in explanation of the subject matter of his examination. No substantially different situation exists when the testimony of the survivor given in a previous proceeding is put in evidence. In either case the answers given are under compulsion of the law in response to questions propounded by counsel, and with no alternative but to answer.

[4] The plaintiff here finds himself in that situation where a portion only of his answers were introduced in evidence. The respondent presumably selected only those portions of the previous testimony most favorable to his side of the case and presented them into evidence claiming at the same time a right to seal the lips of the survivor against any explanation of the selected statements with the bar of the statute. By offering those portions of plaintiff's previous testimony tending to support his contentions, the executor indirectly made the plaintiff his own witness and he could not at the same time invoke the cloak of the statute to shield him in his advantage. Section 1880 was not enacted for such a purpose. By thus indirectly making the plaintiff his witness, the executor opened the door for the plaintiff to testify fully in explanation of the admissions which are charged against him.

[5] It is not the dignity with which a judicial admission is clothed, nor its competency, nor the weight to be accorded it as evidence, that lifts the bar of sec. 1880, but it is the advantage accruing to the executor or administrator by its use that unseals the lips of the survivor. By virtue of the circumstances under which it is given, an answer to a question propounded in a judicial proceeding is limited to the scope of the question. It is not voluntary in the sense that all upon the subject may be said. On the other hand, if a survivor makes a voluntary statement upon the street concerning a transaction had by him with a decedent he has an untrammeled opportunity to add all else that he may see fit by way of explanation. He is under no compulsion to make such a statement in the first place, and, in the second place, there is nothing in the world to hinder him from explaining it to all who may hear. Of his own volition, as is held in Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 P. 142, he assumes the risk of having such a statement proved against him, and, if it is proved, his time for explanation has passed. It would be as manifestly unfair to permit a survivor to open the door against the limitation of his right to testify as it would be to keep it closed in the face of an advantage grasped at by an executor.

[6] No case from this state involving the precise point raised here has been cited by counsel for either party. In other states the courts have uniformly held that the introduction in evidence of testimony previously given lifts the bar of the statute. Cole v. Sweet, supra; Cline v. Dexter, 72 Neb. 619, 101 N.W. 246;

Fox v. Barrett's Estate, 117 Mich. 162, 75 N.W. 440; Lilley v. Mutual Benefit L. Ins. Co., 92 Mich. 153, 52 N.W. 631; Levy v. Simon, 119 Wash. 179, 205 P. 426. The ruling of the trial court in not permitting the plaintiff to testify in his own behalf is a denial of a substantial right and warrants a reversal of the judgment.

The appellant specifies other rulings of the court as grounds of reversible error. These rulings in each instance involved a determination of fact by the trial judge upon the state of the record as it then stood. As the case is to go back for a new trial, and as a different state of facts may be presented upon the next trial, it is not necessary to pass upon these questioned rulings at this time.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; Roy B. Maxey, Judge.

Suit by Jessica M. Siem, as executrix of the estate of E. W. Siem, deceased, against G. B. Hjelm and others, to establish an alleged trust in a certain fund. From a judgment in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Wm. N. Graybiel, of Turlock, for appellant.

Hawkins & Hawkins & Cardozo and E. H. Zion, all of Modesto, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Acting Presiding Justice.

The plaintiff has appealed from a judgment which was rendered against her in a suit to establish an alleged trust in a fund which had been deposited in a bank pursuant to an order of court in a former action, and to require payment thereof to the estate of a deceased partner. The surviving partner, to whom the money was paid by order of court, is not a party to this suit,

The court held that the present action is barred by laches and by the statute of limitations.

The appellant, Jessica M. Siem, is the widow of E. W. Siem, deceased, who died January 11, 1930. She was duly appointed as executrix of his estate. Prior to his death, Mr. Siem was engaged as a partner with Elmer Swanson in the business of buying and selling livestock. Swanson asserted his right, as a surviving partner, pursuant to section 571 of the Probate Code, to possession of the assets and property of the partnership pending the final settlement of the business. The executrix denied the existence of the partnership and refused to deliver the assets of that business to Mr. Swanson. He then brought suit against her to establish the partnership and to recover possession of the assets of the business pending its final settlement. During the trial of that case hogs and cattle belonging to the partnership business were sold for amounts aggregating the sum of $4,000. By order of court and by stipulation of the parties, the proceeds of said sales were first deposited with the clerk of court, subject to control of the court. Subsequently, the court made an order for the clerk to pay Swanson from that fund the sum of $1,500, which was done. The court further ordered that the balance of that fund, which was determined by the court to be the sum of $2,055.78, should be withdrawn from custody of the clerk and deposited in a suitable bank to be selected "by agreement of the parties" upon plaintiff's furnishing a surety bond therefor. It was provided this fund was to be held in the bank "pending determination of the appeal in this action." The minute order of the court provided in that regard:

"It is ordered that plaintiff be permitted to withdraw $1500.00 from the money deposited with the clerk of the court in trust in this action, said $1500.00 to become the property of plaintiff, and it is further ordered that the balance of the trust fund in this action may be withdrawn upon plaintiff's giving a surety bond in the amount of said balance, with the understanding that the said balance is to be held in some suitable bank, agreeable to the parties pending determination of the appeal in this action."

Pursuant to that order the sum of $1,500 was paid to Swanson, and the balance of the fund was deposited in the Security State Bank of Turlock, in the name of G. B. Hjelm, as agent. He was one of the attorneys for the plaintiff.

In that suit, the court adopted findings favorable to the plaintiff, Elmer Swanson, holding that the partnership existed and that he, as the surviving partner, was entitled to the assets of the business pending the settlement of the affairs of the enterprise. On appeal from the judgment which was accordingly rendered in that suit, the decree was affirmed by this court June 27, 1932. Swanson v. Siem, 124 Cal. App. 519, 12 P.2d 1053. Assuming that the affirmance of that judgment constituted a release of the impounded funds and Swanson's right, as surviving partner, to possession thereof, pursuant to the order of court and the judgment which was pronounced, the balance of that fund was subsequently paid by G. B. Hjelm to Swanson or to others upon his request. The fund was entirely exhausted.

It appears that Swanson did not promptly settle the affairs of the partnership business or account to the executrix for the proceeds of sales received by him. Upon application of the executrix to the probate court in the matter of the estate of E. W. Siem, deceased, under section 571 of the Probate Code, a citation was directed to Elmer Swanson to show cause why he should not account to the estate for the assets and property of the partnership business in his possession. From time to time that citation proceeding was continued without hearing. It appears that the proceeds of some sales of hogs and cattle were paid by the purchasers thereof to the executrix. July 8, 1933, Swanson brought another action against her, demanding an accounting and payment to him of all partnership assets in her possession. The executrix answered that complaint, joining in a demand for an accounting of the partnership property. The citation proceeding was consolidated for hearing with the last-mentioned suit for accounting. The consolidated cases were not finally determined until February, 1938. The accounting was held. It considered all receipts and disbursements of both parties to the controversy, including the funds which were impounded in the bank by order of court pending the determination of the first action on appeal. In that accounting suit the court found that partnership funds, aggregating the sum of $3,555.78, were deposited in the Security State Bank of Turlock, pursuant to order of court, and that:

"No accounting whatever has been made by said Elmer Swanson as to the disposition of said moneys deposited in said bank except as hereinbefore shown."

In the account this sum was charged to Swanson. After stating the specific debits and credits of the respective parties, the court finally held "that said Elmer Swanson is indebted to the estate of said E. W. Siem in the sum of $6960.91."

On April 25, 1938, two months after judgment was rendered in the accounting suit, this action was commenced by the executrix against G. B. Hjelm, Harold Hjelm, Hjelm & Hjelm, as attorneys at law, and Security State Bank of Turlock, to establish an alleged trust in the balance of the funds which were deposited in the bank as aforesaid and subsequently converted, and to require the defendants to pay that sum to the estate of E. W. Siem, deceased. To that complaint the defendants separately demurred on the grounds that it failed to state a cause of action and that the suit was barred by laches and by the statute of limitations. The demurrers were overruled and the defendants separately answered the complaint denying the material allegations thereof and pleading laches and the bar of the statute of limitations. In this suit the court adopted findings against the plaintiff, determining that she had actual or constructive knowledge of the withdrawal of the funds from the bank, and that this action is barred by laches and by the statute of limitations. From the judgment which was accordingly rendered against the plaintiff to the effect that she take nothing by this suit, she has appealed.

[1] We are of the opinion this suit is barred by the provisions of the statute of limitations. The surviving partner, Elmer Swanson, is not a party to this action. Neither is G. B. Hjelm, in whose name the money was deposited in the bank, a party in his capacity as agent or representative of Mr. Swanson. He and the other named defendants are made parties to this suit in their individual capacities only.

The partnership was dissolved by the death of E. W. Siem. § 2425, subd. 4, Civil Code. The livestock business, however, was not terminated, since the affairs of the enterprise were not settled. § 2424, Civil Code. The surviving partner, Elmer Swanson, having been placed in possession of the partnership business and assets by decree of the court in the first-mentioned action, pursuant to section 571 of the Probate Code, it became his duty to settle the affairs of the partnership "without delay" and to account to the executrix and pay to her the share of the proceeds to which the estate was entitled. For failure on the part of Swanson to comply with the last-mentioned section of the Probate Code, the executrix was authorized to and she did procure an order of the probate court in the estate of E. W. Siem, deceased, for him to show cause why he had not done so. The executrix was authorized to maintain an action against the surviving partner for an accounting of the partnership business which was continued by him after the death of E. W. Siem. § 2437, Civil Code. That is precisely what she did by means of her cross-complaint filed in the accounting suit which was brought by Swanson against her July 8, 1933. This last-mentioned action and the citation to show cause, which was previously issued in the matter of the estate were consolidated and tried together. In that consolidated action the court held an accounting which included all transactions of the partnership business which occurred since the death of E. W. Siem, including the funds which were impounded with the clerk and the balance thereof which was deposited in the bank, and determined that Swanson was possessed of partnership assets in the sum of $6,960.91, which he was required to account for to the estate. That judgment was rendered February 1, 1938. Section 571 of the Probate Code authorizes the issuance of an attachment to compel a surviving partner to account for and pay to the estate of his deceased partner the balance found to be due. The executrix is afforded a complete remedy to enforce payment and delivery from the surviving partner of all money and assets belonging to the estate.

The present action against strangers to the partnership, to establish an alleged trust and to enforce payment of the funds affected thereby to the executrix, is entirely distinct from the proceedings for an accounting between the representative of a deceased partner and a surviving one. The rule relied upon by the appellant that the statute of limitations does not commence to run until the accounts between partners are completely settled, has no application to the present case for the reason that this is not an action between partners and the status of their partnership accounts is in no way involved. In the case of Freeman v. Donohoe, 65 Cal.App. 65, 223 P. 431, which is cited by the appellant in support of her contention that the statute of limitations was tolled because the accounts of the partners had not been settled, quoting with approval from Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 566, 17 P. 702, the court says at page 85 of 65 Cal. App., at page 439 of 223 P. in the Freeman case, "The statute of limitations does not run between partners until the accounts are settled and the balance agreed on." (Italics added.) This is not an action "between partners." That rule does not apply to strangers to the partnership.

[2] In this case the alleged trust created by depositing the money in a bank pursuant to the court order was fulfilled and terminated by the express declaration of the court that it was to last only "pending the determination of the appeal" in that action. That appeal was affirmed six years before this action was commenced. The entire fund was thereafter promptly paid to or upon order of the surviving partner according to the provisions of that judgment which awarded him custody of the assets of the partnership business. It has been held that when a trust relation is terminated by settlement between the parties thereto, a suit founded thereon must be commenced within four years therefrom. Marston v. Kuhland, 151 Cal. 102, 90 P. 188; Knapp v. Knapp, 15 Cal.2d 237, 241, 100 P. 2d 759; 25 Cal.Jur. 270, § 131. On principle, the same rule prevails when the trust relation, with knowledge of the plaintiff, is terminated by any other means. The statute then begins to run from that date.

[3-6] More than four years elapsed after the fund was exhausted before this suit was commenced. There is adequate evidence of the knowledge of plaintiff regarding the nature of that transaction of impounding the fund in the bank and of its subsequent withdrawal by or under directions of Elmer Swanson. Her attorney in the present action represented her in a similar capacity in all of the suits and proceedings with respect to the partnership business and the probating of the estate of E. W. Siem, deceased. In authorizing the withdrawal of that fund from the custody of the county clerk, and directing it to be deposited in the bank pending the determination of the appeal, the court specifically provided that it should be deposited in a suitable bank "agreeable to the parties," and then, only, upon Swanson furnishing a surety bond to secure its payment to the party entitled thereto. It was to remain in that bank until the appeal in that case was disposed of. We must assume appellant's attorney was fully informed of the details of that entire transaction, and that the fund was deposited and expended only in compliance with that order. He knew that the court determined, in that first action, that the impounded funds belonged to the partnership and that, as surviving partner, Swanson was entitled to possession of the assets of that partnership, including that fund, upon the affirmance of that judgment. That very fund was first deposited with the clerk by consent of the respective parties. Appellant's attorney represented her on the appeal of that case. He knew when that judgment was affirmed. No facts are alleged in the pleadings of this case which will toll the running of the statute of limitations. Ordinarily, in a suit to establish a constructive trust, the statute of limitations begins to run from the date when the trust is created. Wrightson v. Dougherty, 5 Cal.2d 257, 54 P.2d 13; Benoist v. Benoist, 178 Cal. 234, 172 P. 1109; Earhart v. Churchill Co., 169 Cal. 728, 147 P. 942. If the action be deemed to be one for wrongful conversion of a trust fund, the statute will begin to run from the actual conversion of the money, or when the claimant thereof had actual or constructive knowledge of that conversion. In the present case, practically six years elapsed after the affirmance of the judgment which gave Swanson possession of the funds in question before this action was commenced. No sufficient excuse for that delay is shown. It follows that if, under any circumstances, the appellant might have had a valid cause of action to establish a trust against these defendants, that suit is barred by the statute of limitations. If this suit be deemed to be an action to recover specific personal property it is barred in three years by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If it is an action to establish a trust in personal property and to secure an accounting therefor it is barred in four years under the provisions of section 343 of the same code. Easton v. Geller, 116 Cal.App. 577, 3 P.2d 74; 25 Cal.Jur. 269, § 131. In either event the statute of limitations expired long before this action was commenced.

The judgment is affirmed

EUCLID CANDY CO. OF CALIFORNIA, Inc., v. INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN & WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION, LOCAL 1-6 et al.

Civ. 11869.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 14, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 13, 1942.

1. Trial ⇐393(1)

Recitals of fact divided into numbered paragraphs, contained in order for temporary injunction, are not "findings" within statute relating to findings of fact and conclusions of law, and appellate court is not bound thereby, but may consider them. Code Civ.Proc. § 632.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Finding".

2. Appeal and error ⇐533(1), 717

The opinion of the lower court is not a part of the "record on appeal", though appellate court may consider it as an aid in discovering processes by which judgment below was reached.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Record on Appeal".

3. Appeal and error ⇐842(1)

In employer's action for injunction against labor union growing out of dispute between two rival unions, whether acts of violence on picket line were isolated acts of violence was "question of fact".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Question of Fact".

4. Appeal and error ⇐920(3)

In support of temporary injunction order, appellate court must assume that trial court found facts to be in favor of the order, where evidence introduced justified such a finding.

5. Appeal and error ⇐901

The District Court of Appeal, on appeal from a temporary injunction order, is not bound to search terms of order and find, if possible, some passages to criticize, but that function rests on one claiming that error has occurred.

6. Injunction ⇐128

In employer's action for injunction against labor union and its members, evidence that sole controversy was between defendant union and rival union, that defendant sought to raid membership of rival union with which employer had closed shop agreement, and that defendant threatened to blacklist and fine employees who did not join defendant, and engaged in violence against employees and was boycotting employer, authorized finding that defendants were engaged in unlawful conspiracy by violent, illegal, and malicious acts.

7. Injunction ⇐136(1)

Where trial court, in employer's action for injunction against labor union and its members, was justified in finding that defendants were carrying into effect an unlawful conspiracy against employer, its employees, customers and associates, by violent, unlawful and malicious acts, a temporary injunction order restraining picketing, peaceful or violent, secondary boycott, distribution of false and misleading literature, and carrying false and misleading standards, was justified.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank T. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the Euclid Candy Company of California, Inc., against the International Longshoremen and Warehousmen's Union, Local 1-6, an unincorporated association, and others, for injunction and other relief in a labor controversy. From an order granting a temporary injunction, defendants appeal.

STURTEVANT, Justice.

The defendants have appealed from "a so-called preliminary injunction pendente lite, and the order granting said injunction." As the order only was appealable (Code Civ.Proc., § 963), it alone will be considered.

On May 8, 1940, the plaintiff filed a verified complaint asking for a restraining order, an order to show cause, a temporary injunction, and for other relief. On that date an order to show cause was made, returnable on May 17, 1940. At the same time and as part of the same instrument a restraining order was made. Later the defendants filed a demurrer to the complaint. An order was entered on May 23, 1940, overruling the demurrer. On May 23, 1940, the order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue came on for hearing. Each party produced oral and written evidence. The transcript covers nearly 1,600 typewritten pages. In deciding the case the trial court presented a memorandum of decision. It thereafter signed a temporary injunction which covers forty-two typewritten pages. It commenced with a recital of facts divided into paragraphs I-LI inclusive, and some of those paragraphs are subdivided into two or more divisions. Then follows an order divided into twelve paragraphs restraining certain acts.

The record presents a labor controversy. But no controversy between master and servant was involved. The dispute was between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and the alleged injury inflicted on the employer who was no party to the dispute. The matter, among others, involved the following facts:

The plaintiff is a California corporation normally employing two hundred persons, and doing a business in this and other states in excess of $1,000,000 annually. Its employees include two groups, the manufacturers and wrappers of candy, and second, the warehousemen. At the time of the controversy the plaintiff was a party to a collective bargaining agreement with the AFL, the bargaining agency of its employees in its production and wrapping department. That was a closed shop agreement. The plaintiff also had a collective bargaining agreement with the defendant, the CIO, as the bargaining agency of its seven warehousemen. The plaintiff's relations with the CIO had always been friendly and on March 4, 1940, that union forwarded a new contract to plaintiff concerning its warehousemen. Notwithstanding the existing agreement between the AFL and plaintiff, the CIO, early in 1940, began a raid on the AFL membership, and on March 15, 1940, it requested that the CIO be recognized as the sole bargaining agency for all of the employees of the plaintiff. On April 1, 1940, the CIO commenced an effort to bring about a breach of the collective bargaining agreement between plaintiff and the AFL; that effort at first was by persuasion and later was followed by force. The first step in said effort was to present a new set of demands for plaintiff's warehousemen to create the appearance of a dispute between plaintiff and the CIO. The trial court found those demands were not made by plaintiff's warehousemen and were not made in good faith. The second step of the CIO was to address meetings advocating a slow down of work and threatening to "black list" and "fine" any of the AFL members who did not join the CIO. The slow down reduced the output thirty to forty per cent. The plaintiff hired additional employees who were threatened with physical violence if they did not quit their employment and thereupon they did quit. During all these times the AFL was insisting that the plaintiff abide by its contract with that union and threatened if plaintiff did not do so the AFL would impose economic pressure. On May 2, 1940, plaintiff advised all its employees that it would abide by its valid contract with the AFL. An oral agreement was reached between the CIO and plaintiff concerning the warehousemen of the latter, but plaintiff's attempt to bring about peace between the AFL and the CIO resulted in failure. Thereafter the representative of the CIO threatened to make plaintiff's plant a "battle field." On May 6, 1940, the defendant CIO stationed two hundred or three hundred of its members in front of the plaintiff's plant. The CIO called a strike of plaintiff's warehousemen after said union had refused to sign the aforementioned oral agreement. Thereafter, through the use of "goon squads," physical assaults, and other terroristic devices, the CIO tried to force plaintiff's employees to quit work. Such acts were done and such threats were made that commencing May 6, 1940, and continuing many days thereafter, the AFL in the morning transported its members from the San Francisco Labor Temple to plaintiff's factory and returned them in the evening. On many occasions those busses were followed by other vehicles operated by the CIO and carrying its "goon squads." Such conduct caused to be brought in a protective force of from five to seventy-five police officers during the week May 6 to May 13, 1940. On May 7, Dominic Gallo, a member of the CIO, assaulted William Price, one of plaintiff's factory employees. The assault was so violent that Price's nose was broken and he suffered concussion of the brain which required hospitalization for three weeks. On May 8, members of the CIO rioted, injuring police officers and causing a state of hysteria among plaintiff's women employees. Late in the afternoon on May 8, plaintiff commenced this action, took out a restraining order, and caused the defendants to be served. When the process server attempted to serve the defendants other disturbances arose and he in turn was assaulted. Those disturbances continued until the attorney acting for defendants advised the latter to desist. Thereafter the defendants commenced to distribute leaflets in front of plaintiff's factory and so continued until the 19th day of May, 1940. There was evidence that such leaflets were false and libelous. For the purpose of said distribution from six to eight members of the CIO continued to march in front of plaintiff's place of business until the trial court made the order from which the defendants have taken this appeal. During the period above mentioned Donald F. Maguire acted as the representative of the CIO. The plaintiff quotes him as saying the CIO would raid every AFL in San Francisco in entire disregard of the Constitution of the United States and other laws. Continuing, the plaintiff also calls to our attention that on May 10, 1940, Myrtle Price, one of the plaintiff's employees and a member of the AFL, at midnight was aroused by the continuous ringing of her doorbell. On making a discreet examination she saw two members of the CIO outside the door. One rang the bell and tried to open the door. The other stood as guard on the sidewalk. On May 13, Myron Fitch, another employee, was waited upon in his own room by five members of the CIO and assaulted and beaten into insensibility. On May 17, 1940, the defendant Maguire called at the office of B. T. Rocca. The latter, a contractor, was acting as deliveryman delivering syrup to the plaintiff. Maguire asked him to stop. Rocca replied that his contract with plaintiff must be complied with. Thereupon Maguire replied, "Oh, to hell with the contract * * * we are just about to the point where we are going to tear up every other contract in San Francisco and throw them into the bay. * * * If your men deliver we can't be responsible for what happens by ten thousand union men * * * we can't be responsible for goon squads." The plaintiff further quotes statements made May 31, 1940, by the distributors above mentioned which vilified the plaintiff's employees and threatened them.

The plaintiff also calls attention to facts showing that the CIO instituted, and at the time of the trial was carrying out a boycott, local, statewide, and interstate, against this plaintiff. There was evidence that the literature used for such purpose was false, untrue, and misleading. Moreover the CIO threatened openly to blacklist all of plaintiff's employees wherever it could possibly do so.

As stated above, the foregoing facts are recited in plaintiff's brief. The record discloses that many other facts could have been recited. However, they would be but cumulative and it is not necessary to add them.

At this time the defendants contend because of isolated acts of violence on a picket line the trial court had no power to enjoin (1) peaceful picketing; (2) a secondary boycott; (3) the distribution of literature; and (4) the carrying of banners. However no passages of the order appealed from are specified as being erroneously stated.

[1, 2] Apparently treating as findings the recitals of facts I-LI, the defendants attack numbers VIII, XX, and XXXIII, as not being supported by the evidence. However, under well settled rules those passages are not findings within the meaning of section 632 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Hunt v. Steese, 75 Cal. 620, 17 P. 920; Waller v. Weston, 125 Cal. 201, 57 P. 892; Waymire v. California Trona Co., 176 Cal. 395, 168 P. 563; 2 Hayne New Trial and Appeal, § 242; 64 C.J. 1228; 24 Cal.Jur. 932. As recited above the opinion of the trial court is included in the transcript. It is also "well established in California that the opinion of the lower court is not a part of the record on appeal, although the appellate court is always glad to find it in the transcript, because it is as a rule an aid in discovering the processes by which the judgment below was reached." 2 Cal.Jur. 488 "Appeal and Error," § 235. It follows that this court is not bound by what is found in the opinion of the trial court nor by the purported findings, but that it may consider the same.

[3-5] We return to a consideration of the contention of the defendants that because of isolated acts of violence on a picket line the trial court had no authority to make the order appealed from. That contention assumes the acts of violence were isolated. As to whether they were isolated or otherwise was a question of fact. The defendants earnestly contend they were isolated. The plaintiff earnestly contends they were planned, continuous acts which defendants threatened to continue. It alleged facts showing that such acts were continuous and it introduced proof of such allegations. In support of the order appealed from it must be assumed the trial court so found the facts to be. The record shows nothing to the contrary. After hearing the parties the trial court made the order appealed from. Omitting the purported findings hereinabove mentioned, the order contains nearly seven pages, that is, over fifteen folios. The defendants do not, except as herein mentioned, specifically object to any portion of the order. This court is not bound to search the terms of the order and find, if possible, some passages to criticize. That function, under our practice, rests on him who claims that error has occurred.

[6, 7] From the facts hereinabove set forth it is patent the trial court was authorized in concluding that the defendants had formed and were carrying into effect an unlawful conspiracy against the plaintiff, its employees, customers, and associates; and that the defendants were carrying said conspiracy into effect by violent, illegal, unlawful, and malicious acts. In support of the order appealed from we assume the learned chancellor so concluded. If he did, he was authorized in making an order for a temporary injunction restraining picketing, peaceful or violent, secondary boycotts, distribution of false and misleading literature, and carrying false and misleading banners. Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies, Inc., 312 U.S. 287, 61 S.Ct. 552, 85 L.Ed. 836, 132 A.L.R. 1200; Meadowmoor Dairies v. Milk Wagon Drivers' Union, 371 Ill. 377, 21 N.E.2d 308; Southern California I. & S. Co. v. Amalgamated Ass'n, 186 Cal. 604, 620-622, 200 P. 1; Lisse v. Local Union No. 31, 2 Cal.2d 312, 322, 323, 41 P.2d 314.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

JONES v. BANK OF AMERICA NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N.

Civ. 12744.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 13, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 12, 1942.

1. Banks and banking ⇐174

In determining whether assignee of payees of checks cashed by collecting bank on presentation by drawer's office manager who forged payees' signatures could recover amount of checks from collecting bank on theory that payees could ratify collection of checks from drawee bank by collecting bank and hold it as for money had and received, if there was no delivery of the checks to payees then checks remained the property of drawer making inapplicable the theory of ratification. Civ.Code, § 3097.

2. Principal and agent ⇐164(1)

A "ratification" can only be effectual between the parties, when the act is done by the agent avowedly for or on account of the principal, and not when it is done for or on account of the agent himself, or of some third person and ratification is effectually implied only in respect of an act done by a person professedly acting as the agent of party sought to be charged as principal.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Ratification".

3. Principal and agent ⇐164(1)

Brokers' office manager who stole, forged, and cashed checks payable to brokers' customers to whom checks were to be delivered by such manager was not an "agent" of the payees, and hence payees' assignee could not recover from collecting bank which cashed the checks, on theory that payees could ratify collection of checks from drawee bank by collecting bank and hold it as for "money had and received", since there was nothing that payees could ratify so as to effectually make delivery of the checks to the manager by brokers a delivery to the payees. Civ.Code, § 3097.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Agent" and "Money Had And Received".

4. Principal and agent ⇐163(1)

An assignee of payees of checks cashed by collecting bank on presentation by drawer's office manager who forged payees' signatures could not recover amount of checks from collecting bank on theory that payees ratified collection of checks from drawee bank by collecting bank and could hold such bank as for "money had and received", where assignment was not made until after payees who were drawer's customers had been paid in full by drawer's surety, at which time it was too late for them to effect a ratification of delivery of the checks. Civ. Code, § 3097.

5. Subrogation ⇐7(1)

The doctrine of "subrogation" does not apply in favor of a surety company on a fidelity bond against persons who did not participate in the wrongful act of the wrongdoer.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Subrogation".

6. Subrogation ⇐7(1)

A brokers' surety which paid brokers' customers for loss sustained when brokers' office manager cashed checks payable to customers by forging their signatures, could not under doctrine of "subrogation" recover from collecting bank which cashed the checks the loss sustained, since neither such bank nor the surety were wrongdoers, and equity would not compel the bank, admittedly an innocent party, to bear the loss.

7. Assignments ⇐90

A brokers' surety which paid brokers' customers for loss sustained when brokers' office manager cashed checks payable to customers by forging their signatures could not under an assignment from payees of their claims to surety's agent collect loss sustained from collecting bank which cashed the checks, since payees never had a cause of action against collecting bank, and hence had nothing to assign. Civ.Code, § 3097.

8. Banks and banking ⇐140(2)

A drawee bank is not liable to payee of a check whose indorsement thereon has been forged where payment thereon has been made by drawee bank upon such unauthorized indorsement, since there is no "privity" between drawee bank and payee, bank's contract being only with drawer. Civ.Code, § 3097.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement L. Shinn, Judge.

Action by T. Lloyd Jones against Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association, a national banking association, to recover the amount of checks paid by defendant on forged indorsements of signatures of payees who assigned their claims to plaintiff. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Hearing denied; HOUSER, J., dissenting.

George H. Moore and Hugh B. Rotchford, both of Los Angeles, F. B. Griffith, of San Francisco, and Robert E. Ford, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WHITE, Justice.

This is an appeal by defendant bank from an adverse judgment arising out of the cashing of a number of checks by such bank upon which the signatures of the persons named therein as payees had been forged by one Davies, who was an office manager of the brokerage firm which drew the checks. At the time of the misconduct of Davies there was in effect an agreement between the brokerage firm and Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Ltd. (hereinafter referred to for convenience as the surety company), under the terms of which the latter agreed to reimburse and indenmnify the brokerage firm, employer of Davies, for any loss occasioned the employer through embezzlement, etc., on the part of its employee, Davies.

The facts germane to a determination of this controversy are that the brokerage firm, Bennett, Richards & Hill, had its main office in Los Angeles and maintained a branch office in the city of Long Beach.

We shall hereafter refer to the brokerage firm as the brokers. Davies was manager of the brokers' Long Beach office. Customers in that office placed securities there for sale, and Davies forwarded them to the Los Angeles office. The securities were sold by the last-named office and the proper officers at Los Angeles drew checks payable to the order of the respective customers for the net proceeds of the sales and sent the checks to Davies at the Long Beach office for delivery to such customers. Instead of delivering the checks to the customers, Davies stole them, forged the indorsement of the payees in blank, added his indorsement, and deposited the checks in his bank account in a branch of defendant bank in Long Beach, which bank received the checks in good faith and without notice of any infirmity in Davies' title. Thereupon defendant bank forwarded such checks to the drawee bank, Citizens National Trust and Savings Bank of Los Angeles, and collected the proceeds thereof, which it paid to Davies in due course.

There was one check, which forms the basis of the fourth cause of action, which differed from all the others in this: The customer had deposited the stock certificate of a corporation called Buffums' with Davies to be sold by the issuing corporation, which, as a service to its stockholders, handled such transactions. Buffums' sold the stock and sent to Davies a check for $1,950, payable to the customer, one Minnie Butler. That check was drawn on the account of Buffums' in the same branch of defendant bank where Davies maintained his account. The last-named bank cashed that check in good faith on Davies' forgery of the payee's name and paid the amount thereof to Davies.

When Davies' thefts were discovered, the brokers immediately notified the surety company. Thereupon the brokers and the surety company entered into a written agreement which provided that "instead of following the usual procedure covering the payment of claims arising under such bonds," the officers of the brokers and the surety company would confer together with a view to arriving at a settlement direct with the customers, and that "such settlement shall be considered the payment of a direct loss sustained by Bennett, Richards & Hill under said bonds and in diminution of said bonds." The customers were thereafter interviewed by an adjuster of the surety company and an agent of the brokers, and claims were prepared for filing by the customers against the brokers. In each case the claim was for money alleged to be due from the brokers to the customer. The surety company thereupon paid to each customer the amount of his or her claim against the brokers and took from each of such customers an assignment of his or her claim against defendant bank. Simultaneously therewith the customer executed a release to the brokers.

The plaintiff herein is the claims manager of the surety company which executed the agreement under which the losses were indemnified. It was stipulated at the trial that the surety company paid the consideration for the assignments which it took from the customers and will receive any net recovery that is had.

The complaint proceeds upon the theory that the checks were issued to the several payees and when their respective checks were collected by the bank as the same were deposited by the faithless office manager of the brokers, who had no authority to receive or indorse the same, such payees could ratify the collection of the checks from the drawee bank by the collecting bank and hold the latter as for money had and received. All causes of action except the fourth are identical, and are based upon checks drawn by the brokers. The fourth cause of action is based upon the check drawn by Buffums' upon defendant bank and delivered to the brokers for the payee thereof.

The answer denied that the checks were ever issued, such denial being based upon the theory that with the exception of the Buffums' check, by reason of claimed nondelivery to the payees, such payees never had any interest in the checks, were not therefore damaged by what defendant bank did, and consequently never had a cause of action to assign. The answer also pleaded that the settlement made by the surety company was in fact payment of a loss sustained by the brokers covered by the bond. The answer also pleaded a release, on the theory that if the bank was a wrongdoer in converting the checks, assuming such checks did become the property of plaintiff's assignors (the payees thereof), the brokers, by and through the wrongful act of their agent, Davies, became joint converters and were also released.

As to all causes of action of the complaint other than the fourth the trial court found that on the dates alleged the defendant bank received to and for the use of each payee named the amounts of the respective checks. As to the fourth cause of action it was found that without any authority from the payee of the check therein mentioned defendant bank cashed the same and paid the proceeds thereof to Davies, who had forged the payee's name thereto; that defendant bank had therefore received the amount named in said check from the drawee bank to and for the use and benefit of the payee named in the check. Judgment went for plaintiff against the defendant for the total amount of the checks in question.

Appellant's first ground of appeal is that all of the checks except the one issued by Buffums' were never in fact issued, but were stolen by the drawer's manager while still undelivered in the hands of the drawer, by reason of which, it is asserted, the intended payees of such checks never actually became the payees or owners thereof and never had any interest in them; that as there was no agency between Davies and the payees, the latter could not ratify the receipt of the checks by Davies as a delivery to them.

Because the two classes of checks here involved are governed by different legal considerations, we shall first discuss the group of checks involved in all causes of action except the fourth. The brokers had sold securities belonging to their customers. Whether such sales were authorized by the customers does not appear, but the record does disclose that in some of the cases the thefts by Davies of the proceeds of such sales were concealed for years, which fact would seem to warrant the inference that in some instances at least the customers were without knowledge that the securities had been sold or that any checks were drawn by the brokers to their order. Section 3097 of the Civil Code provides: "Every contract on a negotiable instrument is incomplete and revocable until delivery of the instrument for the purpose of giving effect thereto. As between immediate parties, and as regards a remote party other than a holder in due course, the delivery, in order to be effectual, must be made either by or under the authority of the party making, drawing, accepting or indorsing, as the case may be; and in such case the delivery may be shown to have been conditional, or for a special purpose only, and not for the purpose of transferring the property in the instrument. But where the instrument is in the hands of a holder in due course, a valid delivery thereof by all parties prior to him so as to make them liable to him is conclusively presumed. And where the instrument is no longer in the possession of a party whose signature appears thereon, a valid and intentional delivery by him is presumed until the contrary is proved."

[1] In the case at bar, if there was no delivery of the checks to the customers, then they remained the property of the brokers. Garthwaite v. Bank of Tulare, 134 Cal. 237, 66 P. 326. In People v. Cassou, 27 Cal.App. 23, 148 P. 810, the defendant was charged with the felonious taking of personal property in violation of section 532 of the Penal Code. The information filed charged him with having induced the indorser on a note, by means of false pretenses, to make and deliver a certain promissory note to him. From the allegations of the information it appeared that the defendant charged therein was himself the maker of the note and there was no averment that the instrument had ever been delivered to the payee. A demurrer to the information on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense was sustained by the trial court, and such ruling was upheld on appeal, where the court said: "Neither the note nor the indorsement thereon had any legal existence until delivered to and accepted by the payee." It was accordingly held that because of non-delivery to the payee, the indorser had no interest in the note and the pleading charged the defendant with nothing more than procuring the indorser's signature to the note by false pretenses.

In support of his claim that his assignors as payees on the check had a right of action against the collecting bank, respondent strongly relies upon the case of George v. Security Trust & Savings Bank, 91 Cal. App. 708, 267 P. 560, wherein the facts were substantially that one Lynch drew his check to the order of one Vanderbilt and gave it to Allen, who had no authority to receive or indorse the same. The drawee bank accepted and certified the check. Allen thereupon forged the payee's name and passed the check to one Cohen; the latter collected the amount thereof from the defendant bank, which in turn collected such amount from the drawee bank. It is true, as contended by respondent, that the court there held that a cause of action was stated against the bank upon the theory of ratification by the payee of the collection of the check from the drawee and that the collecting bank could be held as for moneys had and received; that the payment by the drawee bank to the collecting bank with the forged indorsement thereon is evidence that the check was accepted and paid by the drawee bank, which acts the payee ratified. It is noteworthy, however, that in all the cases relied upon by the court in the cited case the facts were that delivery of the negotiable instrument had been made to the payee thereon. Such also was the fact in the cases of Palo Alto, etc., Ass'n v. First National Bank, 33 Cal.App. 214, 164 P. 1124; Buena Vista Oil Co. v. Park Bank, 39 Cal.App. 710, 711, 180 P. 12, and Walsh v. American Trust Co., 7 Cal.App. 2d 654, 47 P.2d 323. True, the court in the George case stated that the maker of the check did not deliver it to the payee thereof, but to Allen, "who had no authority to receive or indorse the same." However, in that case there had been a delivery of the check by the drawer, presumptively made, as is stated in section 3097 of the Civil Code, "for the purpose of giving effect thereto." Where there has been such a release or delivery of the check by the maker, we can readily understand how equitably and legally the defrauded payee might elect to sue the bank, thereby ratifying the receipt of the check by the bank from the forger. This for the reason that after delivery of the check has been made with the intent and purpose of giving effect thereto and it falls into the hands of an unauthorized person, the rightful payee may charge the bank with having received it as an agent for the use and benefit of the payee and as having dealt with the check as the property of the true payee and therefore bound to pay the proceeds only to him or his order. In other words, under such circumstances the collecting bank holds the funds obtained upon the check for and on behalf of the true owner thereof, and the bank's payment of such funds to the party who committed the forgery or to any person other than the true owner does not discharge its obligation. But in the case with which we are here concerned the checks never left the custody, possession or control of the makers. The brokers' manager, Davies, was their agent and employee. He stole the checks while they were yet within the custody and control of the employers. He was neither ostensibly nor in fact the agent of the payees. Had the checks been transmitted by the brokers to the payees and delivery miscarried, thereby resulting in the checks falling into the hands of one unauthorized to receive them, but who fraudulently indorsed and collected them from the bank, the situation might be different.

[2, 3] So far as ratification is concerned, it is the rule in California that a "ratification can only be effectual between the parties, when the act is done by the agent avowedly for or on account of the principal, and not when it is done for or on account of the agent himself, or of some third person." Watkins v. Clemmer, 129 Cal.App. 567, 19 P.2d 303, 305. Furthermore, in Schomaker v. Petersen, 103 Cal. App. 558, 570, 285 P. 342, 347, it is said: "And ratification is effectually implied only in respect of an act done by a person professedly acting as the agent of the party sought to be charged as principal." By no stretch of the imagination can it be made to appear that Davies, the branch manager of the brokers, who stole, forged and cashed the checks, was even pretending to act as agent of the payees of the checks. Consequently there was nothing that the payees could ratify so as to effectually make the delivery to Davies a delivery to them.

[4] In the instant case the assignment was not made until the payees on the checks as customers of the brokers had been paid in full for their claims against such brokers. In other words, the customers stood upon their claims against the brokers until they were paid. Therefore, whatever cause of action the customers might conceivably have against the bank reverted to the brokers, who caused the claims against them to be satisfied. When the customers had been paid their respective claims it was too late for them to effect a ratification of the delivery of the checks; and after payment of their claims the customers were left without a claim against any one.

[5, 6] We shall not discuss the question of subrogation, for the reason that respondent disclaims the existence of the doctrine in the instant litigation; and, as we have heretofore indicated, the customers under the facts of this case had no cause of action against the bank because of non-delivery of the checks to them or anyone in their behalf. Their sole claim was against the brokers. As heretofore stated, they stood upon that claim and obtained payment of the same against the brokers in full. The equitable doctrine of subrogation would not aid the surety company under the facts of this case. Meyers v. Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n, 11 Cal.2d 92, 77 P.2d 1084. Almost universally it has been held that the doctrine of subrogation does not apply in favor of a surety company on a fidelity bond against persons who did not participate in the wrongful act of the wrongdoer. Here neither the bank nor the surety company were wrongdoers, but the surety company was required to make good the losses suffered by the brokers under a contractual liability for the assumption of which the surety company was paid a premium. Under such conditions equity will not permit the application of the doctrine of subrogation to compel the bank, admittedly an innocent party, to bear the loss.

[7] So far as the causes of action other than the fourth are concerned, we therefore hold that while the payees on the checks, as customers of the brokers, had a cause of action against the latter which they settled, there never existed under the facts here presented a cause of action against the defendant collecting bank. Consequently such payees had nothing to assign to the surety company or its agent.

[8] We come now to a consideration of the check involved in the fourth cause of action of the amended complaint. As heretofore in this opinion narrated, this check was drawn by Buffums' upon the defendant bank and was paid to Davies by a branch of such bank on the forged indorsement of the name of Minnie Butler, the payee. The question of delivery of the check is not involved. As found by the trial court, Minnie Butler had left her Buffums' stock with Davies, the manager of the brokers' Long Beach office. Buffums', as a service to its stockholders, handled the sale and purchase of its securities. After the receipt by him of Minnie Butler's stock, Davies sent the same to Buffums', who sold it as directed and forwarded the brokers their check for $1,950 payable to Minnie Butler. Forging her name to the check, Davies presented it to defendant bank's branch, upon which it was drawn, received payment thereon, and the bank charged the amount thereof to the account of Buffums'. In this case the check was delivered to the brokers as agent for Minnie Butler, and she therefore became the payee thereof. In connection with the checks heretofore considered, defendant bank was the collecting bank and admittedly received the money upon the checks it cashed, but in the case of the Minnie Butler check the drawee bank did not receive any money. It paid the check, and upon its books erroneously charged the amount thereof against the account of its depositor, Buffums'. That such depositor had a cause of action against the bank for erroneously paying out its funds on deposit cannot be denied; but the question presented to us is whether a drawee bank is liable to the payee of a check whose indorsement thereon has been forged and when payment thereon has been made by the drawee bank upon such unauthorized indorsement. We are convinced that it is firmly established as the law that the payee of a check unaccepted, as was the case here, cannot maintain an action upon it against the bank on which it is drawn. Such holding is based on the principle that there is no privity between the drawee bank and the payee of the check. In the instant case the bank's contract was only with the drawer of the check, Buffums'. The bank never received any money from Minnie Butler; it had no money belonging to her, and never promised to pay her anything. It received money on deposit from Buffums', and its agreement with the latter was that it would return the same to Buffums' when called for or would pay it out upon Buffums' checks. For its failure of duty in this regard by not paying the money to Minnie Butler, the payee, the bank was responsible to its depositor, by reason of its contract with such depositor, but was not responsible to Minnie Butler or anyone else. When the check was not paid to Minnie Butler, the obligation of Buffums' to her was not impaired by the issuance of the check, and she was still entitled to demand her money from her debtor. Therefore Minnie Butler, as the payee of a check unaccepted by her, cannot maintain an action for it against the bank on which it was drawn. This was the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court of the United States in First National Bank of Washington v. Whitman, 94 U.S. 343, 24 L.Ed. 229. The case of George v. Security, etc., Bank, supra, relied upon by respondent, is not controlling here, for the reason that the action there was against a collecting bank, and not, as here, a drawee bank.

From the foregoing it follows that defendant bank being without fault, and plaintiff's assignors having nothing to assign, plaintiff cannot prevail in his action against the appellant bank.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant.

Cr. 1781.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 14, 1942.

1. Habeas corpus ⇐117(1)

A decision in prior habeas corpus proceeding before Superior Court cannot be "res judicata" in subsequent habeas corpus proceeding in appellate court if the decision of the Superior Court is based on questions of law alone.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Judicata".

2. Habeas corpus ⇐120

In habeas corpus proceeding in appellate court by divorced mother, who had been awarded custody of minor child, against paternal grandparents who were alleged to be illegally detaining the minor, decision of the Superior Court denying prior petition for writ of habeas corpus was not "res judicata" where at hearing before Superior Court no evidence was introduced relating to the fitness of any of the parties to have the custody of the minor or of environment and the Superior Court made no finding since the question decided by the Superior Court was one of law alone.

Habeas corpus proceeding by Grace White to obtain custody of Robert LaVoy White. On motion to dismiss the proceeding.

Motion denied.

Pugh & Pugh, of Red Bluff, for petitioner.

Ware & Ware, of Chico, for respondents Wm. D. White and Letha Beryl White.

TUTTLE, Justice.

Petitioner asks, by her application for a writ of habeas corpus, to have the custody of Robert LaVoy White restored to her. A similar application was made to the Superior Court, in and for the County of Tehama, and denied. It is alleged in the petition that William D. White and Letha Beryl White, paternal grandparents of the minor, are illegally detaining his person and restraining him of his liberty. The grandparents now move this court to dismiss the proceedings upon the ground that the matter has been once adjudicated.

Petitioner was the wife of LaVoy White, from whom she was divorced by final decree on May 15, 1940. The minor is the son of said parties, his age being six years. By the terms of the final decree, the custody of said minor was awarded to the parents equally, each to have his custody for one-half of every year. The father was ordered to pay $15 per month for the support of the child during the time that he was with the mother.

Subsequent to the filing of the petition, this court made an order appointing a referee to hear all the issues involved, and report his findings thereon.

It further appears from the allegations of the petition that the father of the minor is on Midway Island, and has failed to provide any money whatever for his support, and does not intend to return to the United States for several years; that the mother is able and competent to provide a proper home for the child. Facts are set forth with the intent to show that the grandparents are not furnishing the child with a proper or suitable home, and that the latter will not permit petitioner to approach the child. It is also alleged that respondents have had the custody of said minor since March, 1940, and refused to permit petitioner to have his custody.

Respondents rely upon In re Holt, 34 Cal. App. 290, 167 P. 184, where it was held that a prior hearing upon habeas corpus, under identical facts, in the superior court, is res adjudicata, where the custody of children is involved.

[1, 2] Petitioner relies upon In re Livingston, 108 Cal.App. 716, 292 P. 285, where it is held that a prior hearing, in such a case, cannot be res adjudicata in an appellate court, if the decision of the superior court is based upon questions of law alone. We believe that the latter view must prevail here. Under no circumstances could it be said that respondents have any legal right to the custody of the minor. In the eyes of the law, they are mere interlopers who have no standing before this court. On the other hand, petitioner is the mother, and, under the terms of the decree, has a right to the custody at certain times. Her rights cannot be ignored, or lightly brushed aside. Furthermore, the petition recites that at the former hearing no evidence was introduced relating to the fitness of any of the parties to have the custody of the minor, or of environment. The court made no findings, but merely denied the writ. The question decided by the superior court was therefore one of law alone. Petitioner is therefore entitled to a full hearing in this court upon the issues, set forth in her petition.

The motion is denied, and the referee directed to proceed with the hearing.

MURPHY v. RETIREMENT BOARD OF SAN FRANCISCO CITY EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT SYSTEM et al.

Civ. 11522.

District Court of Appeal, First District. Division 2, California.

Jan. 9, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 9, 1942.

1. Mandamus ⇐187(9)

On appeal from judgment for respondents in mandamus proceeding to compel retirement board to grant widow of policeman a pension, District Court of Appeal must assume in support of judgment that respondent board found that petitioner failed to prove that death of officer resulted from injury received while in performance of duty.

2. Appeal and error ⇐901

District Court of Appeal will assume fairness and integrity of trial court and will indulge in all presumptions and inferences in support of its findings and judgment until error is affirmatively shown, since burden is always on appellant to show that error complained of is result of miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Mandamus ⇐172

In mandamus proceeding to "review" the trial and judgment of an administrative or quasi judicial board, function of trial court is not that of a court sitting in trial de novo, since when law gives to fact-finding body power to hear and determine questions of fact, judgment of such body will not be controlled by mandamus in absence of showing that it acted arbitrarily, capriciously or fraudulently or without due regard for applicant's rights.

4. Mandamus ⇐187(9)

Where trial court found in mandamus proceeding that in denying application to widow of policeman for pension, and in denying application for rehearing, retirement board did not act arbitrarily or in abuse of discretion, burden was upon petitioner to affirmatively show on appeal that such finding was error.

5. Municipal corporations ⇐187

In mandamus proceeding to compel retirement board to grant widow of former police officer a pension, trial court correctly found under evidence that evidence before board was in conflict as to whether deceased suffered a heart condition while climbing stairs of police station in February, 1936, which caused or excited death in 1938, and that board did not act arbitrarily or in abuse of discretion in denying pension.

6. Municipal corporations ⇐187

Where it was a fair inference to be drawn from evidence in proceeding by widow for pension that a pre-existing injury or chronic alcoholism caused deceased policeman to fall while ascending stairs in police station, triers of fact were not concluded by opinions of physicians, who had made no physical examination of deceased and who formed their opinions without regard to evidence from those who had personally examined and treated deceased in his lifetime, as to cause of death.

NOURSE, Presiding Judge.

The petitioner sued for a writ of mandate requiring respondents to grant her a pension as the widow of a former member of the municipal police department. Trial was had upon the record of the proceedings of the respondent board which resulted in a denial of petitioner's application for a pension.

The case is based upon the claim that the deceased suffered a heart occlusion, or thrombosis, while he was ascending the stairs of the central police station on February 10, 1936, and that this injury caused, or aggravated, his death two years later. The evidence was that the deceased fell upon the stairs at that time, was unconscious for about five minutes, and later suffered headaches and pains in his ribs. In April, 1936, he was relieved from active service because of a pre-existing knee injury. The petitioner and the deceased were separated in 1934. She had obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce, and had not seen deceased since February, 1936.

[1] On the trial before the respondent board, and before the trial court, the petitioner endeavored to show that the deceased suffered a heart occlusion, or thrombosis, while ascending the stairs, and that this was "an acute stage of his coronary disease and the exciting cause of his death therefrom." The trial court found that the evidence adduced before the board failed to show that "the exertion of walking up said stairs was a cause of said heart thrombosis and/or heart occlusion which resulted in an infarct and caused the death * * *." The trial court thereupon sustained the action of the respondent board, and the appeal is taken from that judgment. On this appeal we must assume in support of the judgment that the respondent board found that petitioner had failed to prove that the death of the officer resulted from an injury received while in the performance of his duties.

[2] It is difficult to understand the theory upon which this appeal is based. It seems to be that if an appellant merely states that there is no conflict in the evidence, or no evidence to support the material findings of the trial court, the burden is forthwith cast upon the respondent, or upon the appellate court, to sustain the judgment. The accepted rules of appellate procedure are that this court will assume the fairness and integrity of the trial court and will indulge in all presumptions and inferences in support of its findings and judgment until error is affirmatively shown. The burden is always upon the appellant to show "that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Constitution art. VI, section 4½.

[3] When the case is one in mandamus to "review" the trial and judgment of an administrative or quasi judicial board, the function of the trial court is not that of a court sitting in a trial de novo. We endeavored to make this clear in Hogan v. Retirement Board, 13 Cal.App.2d 676, 677, 57 P.2d 520, 521, where we said: "When the law gives to a fact-finding body the power to hear and determine a question of fact, the judgment of that body will not be controlled by mandamus in the absence of a showing that it acted arbitrarily, capriciously, or fraudulently, or without due regard for the rights of the applicant. Mogan v. Board of Police Com'rs, 100 Cal.App. 270, 279 P. 1080; Sevina v. Hickock, 113 Cal.App. 301, 298 P. 116; McColgan v. Board of Police Com'rs, 130 Cal.App. 66, 19 P.2d 815."

[4] Now the trial court herein found that "in denying the application for pension and in denying the application for rehearing of said application for pension, said defendants sitting as said Retirement Board did not act arbitrarily or in abuse of the discretion in them residing and did not act capriciously therein." The burden was thus cast upon the appellant to affirmatively show that this finding was error. But the appellant assumes that it is sufficient to show that a heart occlusion might have occurred at the time of the fall and that the respondent board was therefore bound to find that death resulted from that particular event. But the weakness of the theory is that the petitioner's evidence discloses nothing more than that the occlusion might have occurred at that time, but that other evidence was just as persuasive that the fall was the result of other causes, that it did not produce the occlusion, and that the heart infarct might have resulted from any one of many causes, either before or after the fall. Thus the conjectures which the appellant makes as to the cause of death are no more convincing than those to the contrary. But, in any event, the entire evidence was such that reasonable minds might have fairly drawn the inferences and conclusions which are the subject of this attack—and that should settle the controversy.

[5] But here the appellant contends that because of her statement that there was no conflict in the evidence as to when the heart occlusion occurred and that this was the exciting cause of death, the judgment must be reversed unless we prove the contrary. In matters of this kind we never assume that counsel will intentionally make a statement that is in direct conflict with the facts. Rather we assume that they have inadvertently overlooked essential facts and given a partisan examination of the record. Though we have never conceived it to be the function of an appellate court to burden an opinion with a full recital of the evidence to disprove counsel's declaration that there is no evidence to support a finding, there are cases where that is made necessary because of indifference to the accepted rules of legal procedure. Here the cause was heard by an able and experienced trial judge who was fully aware of the difficulties confronting the respondent board upon the original trial. He entered the findings after an examination of all the evidence taken at the hearing. The appellant contends that there was no evidence to support the finding that the evidence before the respondent board was conflicting. We recite some of it.

On May 16, 1934, the deceased was examined by Dr. Twitchell because of his complaint of a serious mental condition which the deceased ascribed to a knee injury which he suffered in 1923. The deceased admitted that he had been disarmed while about to commit suicide and that his wife and daughter had left his home. The physician reported from his examination that the knee injury had nothing to do with "bringing about a disturbed mental state" and recommended harmony in the household.

On February 21, 1936, the deceased was examined by Dr. Shumate to whom he stated that, on February 10th he "fell down the stairs at the police station and struck his head and right leg." The deceased also stated that "about one month ago" he fell or was knocked down and "struck his head on the pavement" and also suffered a broken rib. The physician then gave this diagnosis: "Chronic alcoholism; possible mild head injury. X-ray of skull negative."

On March 6, 1936, the deceased was examined by Dr. Oliver. The chief complaints were "headache, dizziness." The examination disclosed that on January 4, 1936, the deceased was knocked down "probably hitting his head on the sidewalk," and was kicked in the ribs. "At this time he began having a steady constant frontal and occipital headache" and occasional dizzy feelings. On February 10, 1936, "he slipped and fell down the stairs," and for the rest of the day suffered with headache and pains in the lower ribs. As a result of this examination the physician concluded that: "The mental changes consisting of garrulousness, unstable emotions, and defective memory could be due either to alcohol, or to an early cerebral arteriosclerosis. In favor of the latter is the appearance of the retinal arteries." He submitted his diagnosis as "1. Chronic Alcoholism, based upon the history as received from the patient and from Dr. Shumate, and also upon nerve tenderness.

"2. Early Cerebral Degenerative Changes, based upon (1) or upon cerebral arteriosclerosis."

On October 26, 1936, Dr. Oliver reported that he had examined the deceased again and found that he was still suffering from defective memory and head pains and that his diagnosis "is as before cerebral arteriosclerosis."

At the time of the death of deceased on March 23, 1938, an autopsy was performed which disclosed the following: "Lungs: Bilateral dependent broncho pneumonia. Heart: Shows an aneurysmal dilatation of left ventricle, the result of an old infarct which has been repaired by calcification." Cause of death: "Coronary sclerosis, myocardial infarction. Broncho pneumonia (Terminal)." No examination of the head was made.

All this evidence which was before the respondent board was offered at the hearing before the trial court by the petitioner without objection to its competency or relevancy. It is significant that throughout the many years of illness of the deceased, and in the numerous physical examinations and medical treatments which the deceased was subjected to, no mention was made of any heart condition, or of any symptoms of heart disease or weakness; that though several physicians separately examined him, took his history for a period of over ten years, and listened to all his complaints, no one records any evidence of a heart condition, or of any complaint of that nature. One piece of evidence which was before the respondent board, but which does not appear in the exhibits on file herein, is the report of Dr. Horbaugh made March 23, 1936, within six weeks of the fall. It appears from the transcript of the testimony that, in answer to the question relating to the condition of "heart and blood vessels" the doctor answered "normal."

The foregoing is a part of the evidence upon which the trial court based its findings "That the whole of said evidence adduced before said defendants sitting as said Retirement Board failed to show that the heart occlusion and/or heart thrombosis from which said John J. Murphy died or any other thrombosis and/or heart occlusion occurred while said John J. Murphy was climbing said Central Police Station stairs on said February 10, 1936, or that the exertion of walking up said stairs was a cause of said heart thrombosis and/or heart occlusion which resulted in an infarct and caused the death of said John J. Murphy or of any heart occlusion or of any heart thrombosis." Also "that the evidence adduced before said defendants sitting as said Retirement Board showed that said John J. Murphy died on the 23rd day of March, 1938, from a disease which had no connection with any injury suffered by the said John J. Murphy while performing his duties as a member of the said Police Department of said City and County of San Francisco."

It is true that after the death of deceased the petitioner produced medical witnesses who gave favorable opinions of the cause of death based upon questions favorable to petitioner's theory, but the respondent board, with many years of experience as to the ease with which such witnesses may be produced, was not compelled to accept those opinions in the face of the positive evidence of those physicians who had examined and treated the deceased in his lifetime. With this state of the record the trial court correctly found that the evidence before the board was in conflict as to whether the deceased suffered a heart occlusion or heart thrombosis while climbing the stairs in February, 1936, which caused or excited the death in 1938. In support of the finding it should be added that the petitioner's witnesses concurred in the opinion that the heart occlusion might have occurred from many other causes either before or after the fall.

[6] It was a fair inference to be drawn from this evidence that either the pre-existing knee injury, or the pre-existing head injury, or the chronic alcoholism, caused the deceased to slip and fall while ascending the stairs and the triers of the fact were not concluded by the opinions of those physicians who had made no physical examination of the deceased and who formed their opinions without regard to the evidence of those who had personally examined and treated the deceased in his lifetime.

From our examination of the entire record we are forced to the same conclusion made by the trial court—that the respondent board did not act arbitrarily or capriciously, but that the petitioner was given a full and fair hearing, and that the judgment of the board was based upon conflicting evidence and upon fair and reasonable inferences which might properly have been drawn therefrom.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DILL et al.

Civ. 11857.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 12, 1942.

1. Taxation ⇐879(2)

Where corporate stock, which four years prior to death was transferred by husband to his wife in fulfillment of prenuptial agreement, having been indorsed by both husband and wife and enclosed in envelope bearing wife's initials, was placed in joint safe deposit box to which both spouses had access, and husband turned over to wife money equal to or in excess of her share of dividend checks and advised others that stock belonged to her, even though stock was not transferred on books of corporation, there was a sufficient "delivery" thereof to establish an immediate transfer of ownership, possession and enjoyment and negative any intention to postpone possession or enjoyment until husband's death, and hence such transfer was not subject to inheritance tax. Gen.Laws 1931, Act 8443, § 2(3).

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Delivery".

2. Taxation ⇐879(2)

The fact that corporate stock, which decedent four years prior to death transferred to wife in fulfillment of prenuptial agreement, was not transferred on books of corporation during lifetime of the decedent, was a circumstance which jury could consider in determining whether parties intended transfer not to take effect in possession or enjoyment until death of decedent, thereby rendering transfer subject to inheritance tax, but such circumstance was not of controlling significance. Gen.Laws 1931, Act 8443, § 2(3); Civ. Code, § 324.

3. Taxation ⇐879(2)

Where evidence warranted finding that inter vivos transfer of corporate stock to transferor's wife was made without any reservation or intention that it was to take effect in possession or enjoyment only at or after the death of transferor, such transfer was not subject to inheritance tax regardless of whether it was made without a valuable and adequate consideration. Gen.Laws 1931, Act 8443, § 2(3).

4. Taxation ⇐900(2)

The Inheritance Tax Act of 1929, providing for the filing of inheritance tax appraiser's report and permitting the filing of objections thereto by any person interested in the proceeding, including the state controller, did not give to the people, acting through the state controller, or to any interested person the right to amend the report of the inheritance tax appraiser. Gen.Laws 1931, Act 8443, § 16(2).

5. Appeal and error ⇐1067

Where trial of issues raised by objections to inheritance tax appraiser's report, involving taxability of a transfer of corporate stock, had proceeded on the assumption that a valid inter vivos transfer had been made, but it appeared that a decree of partial distribution had been entered in order that stock which had not been transferred on books of corporation might be immediately placed in transferee's name, court's refusal to instruct that if stock was transferred by any decree of distribution by probate court, the transfer was subject to inheritance tax did not warrant reversal of judgment holding the transfer not subject to such tax, since requested instruction, if not erroneous, was at least misleading. Gen.Laws 1931, Act 8443, §§ 2(1), (3), 13.

6. Costs ⇐58

In proceeding under the Inheritance Tax Act of 1929 to hear objections to a report of the inheritance tax appraiser, objectors were not entitled to recover costs as against the state controller. Gen.Laws 1931, Act 8443, § 17(5).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Herbert A. Schmidt, deceased, to hear objections filed by Marian S. Dill, individually and as executrix, and others to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, including the value of certain corporate stock, transferred by decedent to the named objector prior to death, in the sum upon which inheritance tax was computed. From judgment and order entered pursuant thereto modifying the report and fixing the inheritance tax at a sum less than that fixed by inheritance tax appraiser, and from an order denying the motion to disallow costs claimed by the objectors, the People appeal.

Judgment affirmed in part and reversed in part, order modifying report of inheritance tax appraiser affirmed, and order as to costs reversed.

Hugo D. Newhouse and Russell P. Tyler, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SPENCE, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered after a trial by jury of the issues presented by objections to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser and from the order entered pursuant to said judgment modifying said report and fixing the inheritance tax at a sum less than that fixed by the inheritance tax appraiser. There is also an appeal from the order denying the motion to disallow the costs claimed by the objectors.

The controversy involved the question of the taxability of a certain transfer made during his lifetime by Herbert A. Schmidt, deceased, to his wife, Marian S. Schmidt, now Marian S. Dill. Said transfer was made in 1927 and it involved 2,025 shares of the stock of the Pacific Lighting Corporation. The report of the inheritance tax appraiser found that said transfer "was a gift made in contemplation of death and intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment as to said Marian S. Schmidt at or after the death of said Herbert A. Schmidt, and that said gift was made without valuable and adequate consideration." Pursuant to said finding, the inheritance tax appraiser included the value of said stock in the sum upon which inheritance tax was computed. The objectors filed written objections denying the material facts found by the inheritance tax appraiser and affirmatively alleging certain facts and circumstances relating to said transfer. The objectors claimed that said transfer was made for a valuable and adequate consideration; that it was not made in contemplation of death; and that it was not intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after the death of the deceased.

Upon the trial, appellants abandoned the claim that said transfer was made in contemplation of death and relied upon the other grounds set forth in the findings made by the inheritance tax appraiser. The jury returned a special verdict answering the two questions submitted to it. By its first answer, it found that said transfer was made for a valuable and adequate consideration within the meaning of the inheritance tax act. By its second answer, it found that said transfer was made without any reservation or intention that it was to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after the death of the deceased. The above mentioned judgment and order were entered in conformity with the special verdict of the jury. The effect thereof was to eliminate any tax upon said transfer to Mrs. Schmidt of the 2,025 shares of stock of Pacific Lighting Corporation.

The main contentions of appellants on this appeal are that the evidence was insufficient to show that said transfer was made for a valuable and adequate consideration or to show that said transfer was made without any reservation or intention that it take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after the death of the deceased. In this connection, it is conceded that if the evidence was sufficient to sustain the answer of the jury to either the first or second question submitted to it, then the evidence was sufficient to sustain the judgment and order. In other words, under what is referred to by appellants as the "Inheritance Tax Act of 1929," St. 1929, p. 1834, said transfer was admittedly not taxable if it was made for a "valuable and adequate consideration (i. e., a consideration equal in money or in money's worth to the full value of the property transferred)" and further said transfer was admittedly not taxable, even if it constituted a gift without any consideration, unless it was made either "(a) In contemplation of the death of the * * * donor, or, (b) Intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death." See 1931 Deering's General Laws, Act 8443, section 2, subdivision 3. As above stated appellants' claim that the transfer was made in contemplation of death was abandoned on the trial and said claim is not argued on this appeal.

[1] Our review of the record convinces us that there was ample evidence to show that said transfer was made without any reservation and without any intention that it should take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after the death of the deceased. This conclusion renders is unnecessary to determine the question of whether the evidence was sufficient to show that said transfer was made for a valuable and adequate consideration within the meaning of the inheritance tax act. We will nevertheless briefly summarize the evidence introduced on both issues as some of the evidence relating to the issue of consideration had some bearing upon the issue of when the parties intended the transfer to take effect.

Herbert A. Schmidt, deceased, was a young architect at the time of his marriage to Marian S. Schmidt in 1915. He was the son of wealthy and elderly parents who had assured him that he would inherit their entire estate. He had been given an extensive education but was discouraged concerning his progress in his chosen profession. He was anxious to marry Mrs. Schmidt and, prior to the marriage, he freely discussed with her his inability to support the two of them on his earnings. He also discussed these matters with his parents. His parents were anxious that he should marry and therefore promised to give him a monthly allowance in the event of his marriage and again assured him that he would inherit all of their property. In proposing marriage to Mrs. Schmidt, the deceased promised that if she would marry him, he would transfer to her as her separate property, when he received his promised inheritance, an amount equivalent to one-third of said inheritance. In reliance upon said promise, Mrs. Schmidt consented to the marriage and the marriage took place in 1915.

About one year after said marriage, the parties had another conversation regarding their affairs. Mr. Schmidt was not succeeding in his profession as well as he had hoped and he suggested a plan which involved the deferring of any prospect of accumulating community property at least for some time to come. He reminded Mrs. Schmidt of his antenuptial promise concerning his inheritance and the result of the conversation was that Mrs. Schmidt consented to the plan proposed.

The mother of Mr. Schmidt died in 1921 and the father of Mr. Schmidt died in 1925. After the estate of the father went through probate, all of the property of his parents was distributed to him in the latter part of 1926. Mr. Schmidt had thereby inherited among other property certain shares of Pacific Lighting Corporation and a stock dividend was to be declared in 1927 by that corporation whereby Mr. Schmidt would receive an additional 2,025 shares of its stock. Mr. Schmidt advised Mrs. Schmidt that the time had come when he should fulfill the promises previously made and that he had decided to transfer to her said 2,025 shares of the stock of said corporation. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Schmidt phoned his wife that he had received the certificate for said 2,025 shares and he requested that she come to his office in order that he might complete the details of the transfer. She went to his office and he told her that he had been advised that in order to effect the transfer of said stock to her as her separate property, it would be necessary for him to endorse the certificate and that it would also be necessary for her to endorse it as evidence of the fact that she had actually received possession of said certificate. Mr. Schmidt therefore endorsed the certificate and handed it to Mrs. Schmidt who also endorsed the same. He then advised her that said stock was hers as her separate property and that she could have the stock transferred on the books of the corporation at any time. The stock certificate was then placed in a joint safe deposit box of the spouses to which both had access and it was enclosed in an envelope bearing the initials "M. M. S.," signifying Mrs. Schmidt, which initials were written by Mr. Schmidt.

At the time of the above mentioned transfer in 1927 and at all times until his death, Mr. Schmidt was apparently in excellent health. He nevertheless died very unexpectedly in 1930 at the age of 44 years, his death resulting from a coronary occlusion which occurred while he was attending a dinner party. When said safe deposit box was opened following his death, said certificate was found in the above mentioned envelope bearing Mrs. Schmidt's initials. There were many other stock certificates in said box but none, other than the above mentioned certificate, was so endorsed or was so contained in an envelope bearing Mrs. Schmidt's initials.

Said stock had not been transferred to Mrs. Schmidt on the books of the corporation during Mr. Schmidt's lifetime. Mr. Schmidt also owned stock in said corporation and all dividend checks on all of the stock standing in his name had been sent to him. It nevertheless appears that Mr. Schmidt turned over to Mrs. Schmidt sums of money equal to or in excess of her share of such dividend checks. It also appears that he advised others that said 2,025 shares of stock belonged to Mrs. Schmidt and that he consulted with Mrs. Schmidt in 1929 regarding the advisability of selling a portion of her said stock. An order was given by Mrs. Schmidt in 1929 for the sale of 1,000 shares thereof but said order was not executed because the stock did not regain the price set in the order.

[2] There was no material conflict in the evidence introduced on the trial. Mrs. Schmidt testified at length and her testimony regarding the affairs of the spouses appears to have been clear and convincing. It was corroborated in many important details by the testimony of others. We are satisfied that the facts and circumstances in evidence were ample to show that there was a sufficient delivery with the intent to make an immediate transfer of ownership, possession and enjoyment (Shaver v. Canfield, 21 Cal.App.2d 734, 70 P.2d 507) and that it was ample to show there was no intention that the transfer should take effect in possession or enjoyment only at or after the death of Mr. Schmidt. The mere fact that said stock was not transferred on the books of the corporation during the lifetime of Mr. Schmidt is not of controlling significance. Civil Code, § 324, as said section read in 1927 [see Stat. 1907, chap. 470, p. 854]; Crane v. Reardon, 217 Cal. 531, 20 P.2d 49; Crocker v. Crocker, 84 Cal.App. 114, 257 P. 611. Mrs. Schmidt testified to the effect that she had intended to have said stock transferred on the books of the corporation but she had overlooked having it done. She further testified that she attached no importance to having the transfer made on said books as the certificate was in the safe deposit box to which she had access and that she had implicit confidence in Mr. Schmidt. While the failure to have said stocks so transferred on the books of the corporation was a circumstance which the jury could consider in arriving at the intention of the parties, our only present inquiry is whether there was substantial evidence to show the intention as found by the jury. The positive testimony given by Mrs. Schmidt regarding the actual intention as expressed by the parties at the time of the transfer constituted substantial evidence to sustain the finding of the jury with respect to such intention. While appellants claim in their reply brief that the evidence introduced by respondents on the question of intention was inherently improbable, we find nothing in the record to justify this claim.

[3] Appellants further contend that the trial court erred in "submitting to the jury an issue of law" and that it erred in "giving and refusing instructions on the subject of valuable and adequate consideration." Both of these contentions relate to the issue of consideration. As above stated, we believe that the affirmative answer of the jury on the second issue submitted to it found ample support in the evidence and the finding on said second issue was sufficient in itself to sustain the judgment and order. It therefore follows that the question of whether the trial court committed error in dealing with the issue of consideration is immaterial under the circumstances. It also follows from what has been heretofore said with respect to the evidence relating to said second issue, that the trial court did not err, as contended by appellants, in denying the motions for nonsuit, directed verdict and judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

[4] Appellants also contend that the trial court erred in refusing to permit them to "amend the report of the inheritance tax appraiser." We find no merit in this contention. Subdivision 2 of section 16 of the Inheritance Tax Act (1931 Deering's General Laws, Act 8443) provided for the filing of the report of the inheritance tax appraiser and the filing of objections. It provided that "any person interested in said proceeding (including the state controller) may file objections in writing to said report." The procedure prescribed provided for a hearing of any objections to the report and further provided that "Upon the hearing of said objections, said court may make such order as to it may seem meet and proper in the premises." It therefore appears that appellants, acting through the state controller, could have filed objections to said report but there is nothing in the act which gave to appellants or to any interested person the right to amend said report.

A further contention made by appellants is that the trial court erred in refusing another requested instruction. The discussion of this contention requires the statement of certain additional facts which were developed upon the trial. Admittedly, the deceased owned certain shares of the stock of the Pacific Lighting Corporation at the time of his death and admittedly the 2,025 shares of said stock in question here also stood in his name on the books of the corporation. The shares owned by deceased were listed in the inventory but the 2,025 shares in question here were not so listed. After the death of the deceased, said corporation refused to transfer said 2,025 shares to Mrs. Schmidt on the books of the corporation without some form of judgment or order of court. Mrs. Schmidt was the sole beneficiary under the will of the deceased. The price of said stock was declining on the market during the depression period and it was the desire of Mrs. Schmidt to have said stock placed immediately in her name in order that she might deal with it to best advantage without unnecessary delay. Under advice of her counsel, she filed a petition for partial distribution in 1931, seeking a decree of partial distribution covering all said stock including both the stock admittedly owned by the deceased and the 2,025 shares in question. The petition was granted, a decree was entered and written consent was given for the transfer of all said shares on the books of the Pacific Lighting Corporation. § 13 of said act.

[5] On the trial, appellants requested an instruction that "* * * if the Pacific Lighting Company stock here involved was transferred to Marian S. Dill, formerly Marian S. Schmidt, by any decree of distribution made by a probate court, then such transfer is subject to the payment of inheritance tax." This instruction was refused and we find no error in such refusal. The trial had proceeded upon the assumption that a valid inter vivos transfer had been made. The only question presented for determination was whether such valid inter vivos transfer was subject to inheritance tax by reason of the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 2 of said inheritance tax act. When the above mentioned evidence was produced, appellants apparently believed that the transfer might be taxable under subdivision 1 of section 2 of said act under the theory that it was a transfer "by will." As we view the situation, the uncontradicted evidence showed an inter vivos transfer and not a transfer by will. The reason for the petition for partial distribution was fully explained by the testimony of counsel for Mrs. Schmidt and the fact the petition was filed and a decree of partial distribution was granted could not change the inter vivos transfer into a transfer by will. In any event, the instruction requested was misleading, if not erroneous, under the circumstances. It did not purport to submit to the jury in proper form and under proper advice the question of whether the transfer was an inter vivos transfer or a transfer by will. It ignored the explanation of the reason for the petition and decree and apparently made the existence of the decree the sole determining factor. Assuming, without deciding, that appellants were entitled under the evidence to appropriate instructions on the question of whether the transfer was an inter vivos transfer or a transfer by will, they are not entitled to a reversal because of the refusal of the trial court to give the above mentioned requested instruction.

[6] Lastly, appellants contend that the court erred in denying the motion to disallow the costs claimed by the objectors. This contention must be sustained. Subd. 5 of § 17 of said act; In re Steehler's Estate, 197 Cal. 67, 239 P. 718.

The order denying the motion to disallow costs and the portion of the judgment awarding costs to the objectors are reversed. In all other respects said judgment and the order modifying the report of the inheritance tax appraiser are affirmed.

Hearing Granted March 19, 1942.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐221(4)

In action by kennel keeper to recover from deceased's executor for housing, feeding and caring for deceased's dog at kennels under alleged oral contract with deceased, finding that kennel keeper and deceased entered into the alleged oral contract was sustained by testimony.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

Where there is some substantial evidence to support a finding, the finding will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

Only where there is no evidence to sustain a finding, or where, as a matter of law, a court can say that there is neither sufficient evidence nor a reasonable inference from evidence to support a finding, is an appellate court warranted in reversing a judgment on ground that it is not supported by the evidence.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

In passing on the sufficiency of the evidence, the District Court of Appeal need inquire only whether there is evidence of a substantial nature to support the judgment, and where reasonable minds might differ from the inferences to be drawn from a particular set of facts, the appellate court will not substitute its own conclusions for those of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by C. A. Roy against Raymond Salisbury, as executor under the will of one Drucks, deceased, to recover on a claim against the deceased's estate for care of deceased's dog. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Raymond Salisbury, of Oakland, in pro. per., and Joseph C. Prior, of Oakland, for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

B. C. JONES, Justice pro tem.

The respondent here obtained judgment against the appellant, the executor of the decedent's will, in the trial court upon a rejected probate claim.

The complaint in the action alleges that Dr. Drucks, the decedent, owned a Doberman Pinscher dog named Mike which he had purchased as a pup from the plaintiff and thereafter procured plaintiff to train for obedience and protection. It is also alleged that in the year 1938 the plaintiff and Dr. Drucks agreed orally, "That if said Drucks ever became unable to care for said dog, or if he should die, he had arranged that said Mike would be delivered to plaintiff to be housed, fed and cared for by plaintiff for the remainder of said dog's life at plaintiff's usual rate for housing, feeding and caring for such dogs, viz., at the rate of $20.00 per month, which said sum said Drucks promised and agreed to pay, payable at the end of each month, and that said dog was neither to be sold nor exhibited by plaintiff."

The trial court found the existence of the contract as pleaded in the complaint, gave judgment to the plaintiff in the sum of $480 for caring for the dog for twenty-four months at the rate of $20 per month, and directed the defendant executor to pay an additional $20 per month to the plaintiff each month during the life expectancy of the dog, or a total sum of $1,440, with the alternative of paying this sum into court under the provisions of section 953 of the Probate Code. It is from this judgment that the plaintiff appeals.

In December, 1938, Drucks, whose health had been none too good for some considerable time, became bedridden. On the 30th of the month he was taken to a hospital for an emergency operation, returning to his home on January 5, 1939. He died on January 9, 1939, leaving a net estate upwards of $20,000.

On December 30, 1938, the date on which Dr. Drucks was taken to the hospital, the dog was delivered to the plaintiff at his kennels at San Pablo. Ever since that date the plaintiff has kept the dog at the kennels where he has fed, housed, and cared for him.

Appellant urges as one of the grounds for a reversal of the judgment that there is not sufficient evidence to warrant a finding that any part of the alleged contract was performable in the lifetime of Dr. Drucks. He also takes the position that, although one portion of the contract may be within the statute of frauds, the other portion is without, and the agreement being entire and indivisible, it is wholly unenforceable under the statute. In this connection it is urged that the evidence conclusively shows that Dr. Drucks would not have entered into one portion of the contract without the other, thereby rendering the whole unenforceable.

[1] The contention that there is not sufficient evidence to warrant a finding that the parties entered into the agreement alleged in the complaint finds no support in the record.

The plaintiff called as a witness a Mr. Frank Perry who was employed at the kennels. This witness testified that in June or July of 1938 Dr. Drucks called at the kennels and at that time stated to Mr. Roy, the plaintiff, that his health was failing and that, "In the event anything should happen to me, or I should die, Mike will be brought to the kennel and I want him to stay here and be taken care of and be fed, not to show him and not to work or not to sell him." This witness testified further that Mr. Roy in response to this statement replied, "Yes, I will do that." This same witness testified that Dr. Drucks called at the kennels on the Sunday following Thanksgiving of the same year and, after some discussion concerning his health, said to Roy, "So the agreement about Mike still stands," and they shook hands on it.

Another witness, Melvin Bollinger, testified to a conversation with Dr. Drucks about his arrangements for the keep of the dog, the witness stating: "Doctor Drucks said, 'Now, Mel, I have a wonderful dog. I get a lot of enjoyment out of him,' and then he had the dog do different things that Mike did, then he said, 'you know, I am not a well man and I am making arrangements with Mr. Roy about Mike. I guess if I am unable to take care of Mike I know he will be in good hands and get proper care.'"

[2-4] There appears no contradiction of this testimony which in itself is sufficient to sustain the finding complained of. It has been held over and over again that where there is some substantial evidence to support a finding it will not be disturbed on appeal. It is only when there is no evidence to sustain the finding, or when, as a matter of law, the court can say that there is neither sufficient evidence nor a reasonable inference from evidence to support a finding that an appellate court is warranted in reversing a judgment on this ground. Olivero v. Rosano, 42 Cal.App.2d 740, 109 P.2d 976. This court need inquire only whether there is evidence of a substantial nature to support the judgment, and where reasonable minds might differ on the inferences to be drawn from a particular set of facts, the appellate court will not substitute its own conclusions for those of the trial court. Webster v. Board of Dental Examiners, 17 Cal.2d 534, 110 P.2d 992.

A more serious question is presented with reference to the divisibility of the contract and the enforceability of one portion thereof when the other obviously falls under the ban of the statute. Unless the agreement is separable recovery cannot be had under it. The appellant most seriously contends that the contract alleged and found is entire and indivisible. As to the unenforceability of the agreement as a whole, he relies upon subdivision 6 of section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure (see, also, sec. 1624, subd. 6 of the Civil Code) which deals with contracts not to be performed during the lifetime of the promissor. It is urged that the taint cast by the provisions of subdivision 6 of said sections upon that part of the agreement providing that the plaintiff should keep, care for, and house the dog in case Dr. Drucks should die, spreads to, and permeates the whole of the agreement and renders it unenforceable.

[5, 6] A contract, a portion of which is invalid and unenforceable because that part is not in writing, is unenforceable as a whole or in any other part if the contract is entire and indivisible. Fuller v. Reed, 38 Cal. 99; Traiman v. Rappaport, 3 Cir., 41 F.2d 336, 71 A.L.R. 475. As is said in American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 2d Ed., vol. 15, p. 988: "Where a contract which is entire contains a stipulation or agreement which is illegal, and which therefore is not severable from the balance of the contract, such illegal stipulation or agreement cannot be ignored and the other provisions of the contract enforced; the illegal stipulation or agreement in such a case penetrates and corrupts the whole contract and vitiates it as an entirety."

[7, 8] On the other hand, a contract which is divisible, and a part within and a part without the statute of frauds, may be enforced as to the part which is good without regard being paid to that which is bad. In such cases it is not of such great importance to ascertain whether the one portion would not have been entered into without the other as to ascertain whether they are in their nature separate and distinct. In a transaction which involves the making of different contracts at the same time and as a part of the transaction, and they are of such nature that they can be reasonably considered as separate, those which are not banned by the statute will be enforced, and the others avoided. Adams v. Weaver, 117 Cal. 42, 48 P. 972; Ryan v. Walker, 35 Cal.App. 116, 169 P. 417; Lowman v. Sheets, 124 Ind. 416, 24 N. E. 351, 7 L.R.A. 784. Thus, in Haynes v. Nice, 100 Mass. 327, 1 Am.Rep. 109, a parent promised to pay for the past and future board of a child at a certain weekly rate and the court there held that the promise was clearly severable, one part being within the statute of frauds and the other without. Recovery was allowed for the future board but none for the past as being a promise to pay the debt of another.

[9] If a portion of a transaction, or a promise is capable of being executed or closed, separately from the remaining portions, it is under ordinary circumstances held to be separable and enforceable independently of the balance of the transaction. This is because the independent portions of the transaction are in effect separate contracts.

[10] In the contract before us Dr. Drucks made two distinct promises. He promised that if he ever became unable to care for the dog, Mike, he would turn him over to the plaintiff who promised to give him the specified care as long as he lived, and, for which care, the doctor promised to pay a reasonable charge. The second promise was that if he should die, he would turn the dog over to the plaintiff to be by him cared for as specified for which he would pay a reasonable sum. Neither of these promises is made to depend upon the existence of the other. The first part of the agreement could well have been fully performed by both parties without the second part ever having been made. Similarly the second part, if it had been otherwise valid, could have been completely executed and closed without the existence of the first. The lack of interdependence between the two promises makes the contract severable. Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 117, 85 P. 305; Ward v. Ward, 94 Colo. 275, 30 P.2d 853; Straus v. Yeager, 48 Ind.App. 448, 93 N.E. 877. The fact that the second part is invalid does not militate against the enforcement of the independent portion which is good.

[11] The contention that Dr. Drucks would not have entered into the one portion of the contract without the other portion being included finds no support either in the contract itself or in the circumstances connected with its making. As pointed out, the two portions of the agreement are distinct and separate. There is nothing to indicate that one would not have been made but for the existence of the other. The rule invoked can only apply when there is an interdependence between the several portions of the agreement to the extent that one portion cannot be extricated from the whole without an interference with the execution and closing of the other portions. The contract presented here lacks that interdependence between its two parts which is necessary to sustain this contention.

[12, 13] The appellant makes the added point that the first portion is not clear of the statute for the reason that it was not fully performed during the lifetime of Dr. Drucks. The rule is that if performance is possible within the lifetime the prohibition of the statute does not apply. The fact that complete discharge of the obligation does not occur within the lifetime is of no consequence. The same situation prevails with reference to contracts not to be performed within a year. If the contract is performable within a year the statute does not apply. In Gaskins v. Security-First National Bank, 30 Cal.App.2d 409, 86 P.2d 681, 685, the court had before it a contract for the support of minor children of an incompetent during their minority. In disposing of a contention that the contract was not to be performed within a year, the court said: "In the case at bar the contract was to care for the minor children of the incompetent during their minority with payment to be made when the youngest attained majority. Obviously such a contract might be fully performed in one year from the date of its execution, as, for instance, would be the case should all the minor children have died within the first year. In 27 Corpus Juris 184 it is said with reference to the statute of frauds: 'A parol agreement to board, or to support * * * a person during his life or other indefinite period, is regarded as having been made by the parties thereto in contemplation of the possible contingency of the person's death within the year, and, being capable of complete performance within a year, is not within the statute. The same is so of an oral contract to support a person until he reaches his majority or attains a certain age, the contingency being implied that he may die within the year. The same contingency of death being implied, an oral agreement to pay for the maintenance or education of a child is not within the statute. It has even been held that an agreement to support another for a fixed period greater than one year is not within the statute'."

[14] In this case the care of the dog was undertaken during the lifetime of Dr. Drucks. At the time the dog was turned over to the plaintiff no one was able to foresee when the doctor would recover or when he would die. Nor was anyone able to foresee when the dog would die. As stated in the Gaskins case, a parol agreement for care, such as we have here, is regarded as having been made by the parties thereto in contemplation of the possible contingency of the death of the person or animal to be cared for within the time limited by the statute. Clearly, the first portion of the contract is not within the statute.

[15, 16] The further point is made that the provision of the contract which is clear of the statute of frauds is too uncertain to be enforceable. The appellant appropriately points out that the time when the plaintiff should take over and care for the dog depends on when the doctor might be unable to render this care. This point of time, he argues, is not fixed by the contract and is not ascertainable. If this time is reasonably ascertainable, there is of course no merit in the point. In this connection we are unable to make a perceptible distinction in principle between those cases in which a promisor promises to perform when he is able, and this case in which the promisor promises to perform when he is unable to perform certain other acts. The rule has been consistently adhered to by the courts of this country and of Canada that when the time of performance is made to depend on when one is financially able, the contract is not so indefinite or uncertain as to be unenforceable. Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 164 Cal. 472, 129 P. 587, Ann.Cas.1914B, 932, 44 L.R.A., N.S., 710; Mock v. Trustees, 252 Ky. 243, 67 S. W.2d 9, 94 A.L.R. 716 and note 721.

[17] In cases such as this, as stated by our Supreme Court in McIllmoil v. Frawley Motor Co., 190 Cal. 546, 213 P. 971, 972: "The law does not favor, but leans against, the destruction of contracts because of uncertainty; and it will, if feasible, so construe agreements as to carry into effect the reasonable intentions of the parties if that can be ascertained." In support of this policy of the law may also be cited, Sutliff v. Seidenberg, Stiefel & Co., 132 Cal. 63, 64 P. 131, 469; Pease v. Lindsey, 129 Cal.App. 408, 18 P.2d 717; Meyers v. Nolan, 18 Cal. App.2d 319, 63 P.2d 1216.

The attendant circumstances indicate very clearly that Dr. Drucks intended that his dog should be taken care of and not abused if for any reason he should not be able to care for him, and that the plaintiff was cognizant of these intentions. The two men had been associated in training the dog from the time he was a pup. Both recognized his superior qualities and breeding. The dog undoubtedly had formed attachments for his trainer in addition to the affection bestowed upon his master. Dr. Drucks was alone in the world. He paid frequent visits to the cemetery in which his mother lay buried. Apparently no relative came near to offer cheer or encouragement in his illness. He had to depend upon friends and neighbors to help him to the hospital. His dog was his close friend and companion, and his consolation in his darkening days. Nothing is more natural than that the doctor visualizing a protracted illness and days and nights within hospital walls, should intend the plaintiff to render that care which he could not give.

Our courts in many cases have paid glowing tribute to the fidelity of the dog and have praised his many virtues, but we, in ascertaining the intention of the parties, are to be controlled by the circumstances of the case alone. As is said in Mayor, etc., of City of Washington v. Meigs, reported in 8 D.C. 53, 1 McArthur 53, 29 Am.Rep. 578, "History informs us of noble acts of fidelity and affection performed by some sentinel of the class under consideration. Our attention has been called by our brother, Olin, to the event of so much interest to the world, and to the cause of freedom of opinion, and to the exercise of a conscientious faith, the rescue from the grasp of the enemies of toleration of William of Orange, on the morning of the 12th September, 1572, by the action of a little dog. The Spanish army, under the command of Alva, invading the Netherlands, and the army of patriots under the command of the prince, were encamped near the city of Mons. The plan was formed for the surprise of the camp of the patriots and the capture or assassination of William, and for this purpose a band of six hundred disguised men were placed under the command of Julian Romero. The historian of the Rise of the Dutch Republic narrates that, near the hour of two o'clock in the morning, 'the boldest, led by Julian in person, made at once for the prince's tent. His guards and himself were in profound sleep, but a small spaniel, who always passed the night upon his bed, was a more faithful sentinel. The creature sprang forward, barking furiously at the sound of hostile footsteps, and scratching his masters' face with his paws. There was but just time for the prince to mount a horse which was ready saddled and to effect his escape through the darkness before his enemies sprang into the tent. His servants were cut down, his master of the horse and two of his secretaries who gained their saddles a moment later, all lost their lives, and but for the little dog's watchfulness, William of Orange, upon whose shoulders the whole weight of his country's fortunes depended, would have been led within a week to an ignominious death. To his dying day, the prince ever afterward kept a spaniel of the same race in his bed-chamber.'" The Supreme Court of the United States has paid its tribute to this friend and protector of man. Said the learned Justice who delivered the opinion in Sentell v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 166 U.S. 698, 17 S.Ct. 693, 694, 41 L.Ed. 1169: "The higher breeds rank among the noblest representatives of the animal kingdom, and are justly esteemed for their intelligence, sagacity, fidelity, watchfulness, affection, and, above all, for their natural companionship with man."

During the course of his illness Dr. Drucks requested of Joe Repose, a friend, that if anything happened, to take Mike out to the kennels. It was pursuant to this request, on the day Dr. Drucks was taken to the hospital for an emergency operation, that he gave the dog into the keeping of the plaintiff. After he came back from the hospital the doctor did not send for the dog, but left him in the plaintiff's care where he had been placed and made no effort to remove him.

[18-21] The acts of the parties done under it where there is any doubt as to the meaning of the terms of a contract, afford one of the most reliable means of arriving at their intention. This rule is clearly stated by the Supreme Court of this state, speaking through Mr. Justice Lorigan, in Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 84 P. 145, 150, 6 L.R.A.,N.S., 275, where it is said: "Parties to a contract have a right to place such an interpretation upon its terms as they see fit, even when such an interpretation is apparently contrary to the ordinary meaning of its provisions. And in all cases where the terms of their contract, or the language they employ, raises a question of doubtful construction, and it appears that the parties themselves have practically interpreted their contract, the courts will follow that practical construction. It is to be assumed that parties to a contract best know what was meant by its terms, and are the least liable to be mistaken as to its intention; that each party is alert to his own interests, and to insistence on his rights, and that whatever is done by the parties contemporaneously with the execution of the contract is done under its terms as they understood and intended it should be. Parties are far less liable to have been mistaken as to the intention of their contract during the period while harmonious and practical construction reflects that intention, than they are when subsequent differences have impelled them to resort to law, and one of them then seeks a construction at variance with the practical construction they have placed upon it. The law, however, recognizes the practical construction of a contract as the best evidence of what was intended by its provisions. In its execution, every executory contract requires more or less of a practical construction to be given it by the parties, and when this has been given, the law, in any subsequent litigation which involves the construction of the contract, adopts the practical construction of the parties as the true construction, and as the safest rule to be applied in the solution of the difficulty. Mayberry v. Alhambra, etc., Co., 125 Cal. [444] 446, 54 P. 530, 58 P. 68; Keith v. Electrical Engineering Co., 136 Cal. [178] 181, 68 P. 598." The cases of Herrlein v. Tocchini, 128 Cal.App. 612, 18 P.2d 73, Kales v. Houghton, 190 Cal. 294, 212 P. 21, are to the same effect. While the practical construction placed upon the terms of the contract is not conclusive, such construction is entitled to great or controlling weight where the questioned provision is of some uncertainty. Laiblin v. San Joaquin Agr. Corp., 60 Cal.App. 516, 213 P. 529. Where the contract is oral, any acts, conduct, or declarations of the parties indicating mutual intent and understanding are of added significance. If there was any uncertainty as to when the agreement between the parties was to become effective it was dispelled and certainty established by the delivery of the dog to the plaintiff and his rendering the care and keep which the contract called for. By their own acts the parties determined the time of performance. 12 Am.Jur. 558, secs. 67, 68.

[22] Argument is made by counsel for the appellant that because of the claimed uncertainty equity would not compel the specific performance of the contract. After the dog was delivered to the plaintiff there remained nothing to compel. The dog was delivered into his keeping and up to the date of the death of the doctor he had done everything that by the terms of the contract he was required to do. There only remained for him to collect for the care already given, and to continue to give the care as he had agreed. In any event, there was such a partial performance of the terms of the contract as to cure any uncertainty and to warrant specific performance in case it would lie. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 95 P. 154, 159.

Subsequent to the presentation of the claim against the estate, and prior to the filing of this action, the wife of the plaintiff executed the following document:

"July 8, 1932.

"In consideration of the sum of $1.00 to me in hand paid by my husband C. A. Roy, I hereby agree that the claim against the estate of Edward S. Drucks (No. 71031 Alameda County) on account of the Doberman dog "Mike" and all proceeds thereof is the separate property of my husband C. A. Roy.

"Elizabeth Roy
"Wife of C. A. Roy."

[23-27] Mrs. Roy was sworn as a witness and testified in the case over the objection of counsel for the defendant. At the close of the proceedings a motion to strike from the the record all of her testimony was made and denied. The basis for the objection and motion is that the instrument evidences an assignment by her of her community interest in the contract to her husband, and as such an assignor she is incompetent to testify under the provisions of subd. 3, sec. 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The disqualification claimed by the appellant is purely statutory. All persons who are not under the statutory ban are deemed competent witnesses. Sec. 1879, Code Civ.Proc. Since section 1880 is a limitation upon a fundamental right it is to be strictly construed. Unless the document set forth constitutes an assignment of her community interest making her an assignor of the claimant the objection to the testimony of the witness was properly overruled and the motion to strike properly denied. To assign means to transfer or set over. To relinquish is to surrender or abandon. Community property in this state is now held by both husband and wife in a community estate in which both have a present community interest. This interest is of such a character that either may step out of the community entirely, with reference to property only, and relinquish all right in the community estate to the other. Likewise, a portion only of the community estate may be relinquished or abandoned by one spouse to the other. Agreement only is necessary to effect such relinquishment. Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 103 P. 190; Wren v. Wren, 100 Cal. 276, 34 P. 775, 38 Am.St.Rep. 287; Young v. Young, 126 Cal.App. 306, 14 P.2d 580; Gray v. Perlis, 76 Cal.App. 511, 245 P. 221; Smith v. Smith, 47 Cal.App. 650, 191 P. 60; Schipper v. Penkalski, 46 Cal.App.2d 28, 115 P.2d 231. As between persons who do not occupy the marital status and who do not enjoy the privilege of holding property in a community estate there can be no transmutation of rights in property in this manner. Transfer is the only method by which a change in property status between them may be effected, they not being endowed with any of the plenary powers granted to husband and wife by sections 158 and 159 of the Civil Code. At the time the wife gave her testimony she held no interest in the contract, and was not an assignor of her husband. The rulings complained of were properly made.

There are no other points which appear necessary to be considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEUPE v. LEUPE

Civ. 6621.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 13, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 12, 1942.

1. Divorce ⇐249(3)

In action for divorce the trial court was not authorized to award to husband personalty which was the wife's separate property, on husband's payment to wife of fixed amount to be secured by lien on the personalty.

2. Divorce ⇐249(3)

In divorce action only community property and the homestead may be awarded, and the court is not authorized to assign the separate property of one of the spouses to the other nor to require one to pay to the other any amount in lieu of an assignment or division of it.

3. Divorce ⇐255

Where interlocutory divorce decree awarded wife's separate personalty to husband in consideration of husband's payment of $1,500 secured by lien in favor of wife who was authorized to obtain order of sale in event of husband's nonpayment, the husband in accepting the personalty became bound by the conditions imposed by the decree, and would not be permitted to accept the benefits received from the transfer without sharing the burdens attached thereto.

4. Divorce ⇐286

Where evidence presented to trial court at divorce hearing was not before the reviewing court, such court was required to presume that the trial court acted on sufficient evidence as to husband's ability to pay and as to the wife's necessities, in providing for her care, maintenance and support in interlocutory decree.

5. Divorce ⇐254, 255

Although the court is not authorized to dispose finally of property rights of parties to divorce action until entry of final divorce decree, if the court does by its order make such a disposal, its act in doing so constitutes an "error of law" which can be remedied only on motion for new trial or other appropriate motion or on direct appeal.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Error of Law".

6. Divorce ⇐254

Where interlocutory divorce decree purported to settle property rights of the parties, husband's motion to modify the decree which was made more than six months after the entry thereof was not timely made under circumstances of case, and trial court was without authority to order modification.

7. Attorney and client ⇐77

Generally, an attorney is not vested with authority to bind his client in matters affecting property rights.

8. Divorce ⇐245(1)

The trial court has discretion in determining whether to modify terms of interlocutory divorce decree relating to alimony, but there is a limit to the exercise of the discretion and it cannot be arbitrary or capricious.

9. Divorce ⇐245(2)

Where trial court exercised its discretion at time of making of interlocutory decree of divorce providing for payments of maintenance and support, and financial circumstances of the husband were substantially the same at time of hearing on husband's motion to modify as they were at date of granting of interlocutory decree, the action of the trial court in modifying the decree was an abuse of discretion.

10. Divorce ⇐245(2)

Trial court's authority to modify provisions of divorce decree relating to maintenance and support can only be exercised on showing of material, permanent and substantial change in circumstances and conditions of the parties.

11. Divorce ⇐182

Where order modifying interlocutory divorce decree was erroneous, and as to amounts allowed for maintenance and support of wife was not a proper exercise of trial court's discretion, and wife's motion seeking allowance for alimony, costs and counsel fees on appeal was submitted to trial court on evidence previously introduced, denial of the wife's motion was an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Maxwell McNutt and A. R. Cotton, Judges.

Action by Louis Leupe against Marie Leupe for divorce. From an order and judgment modifying terms of an interlocutory decree of divorce and from that portion of final decree of divorce incorporating terms of the order, and from order denying alimony, costs and counsel fees on appeal, the defendant appeals.

Order modified, interlocutory decree reversed, and portion of final decree incorporating modification in the interlocutory decree stricken, and an amended final decree ordered to be entered, and order denying motion for alimony, costs and counsel fees reversed, with directions.

Carl W. Anderson, of Burlingame, for appellant.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, and J. W. Coleberd, of So. San Francisco, for respondent.

MONCUR, Justice pro tem.

The above action is before the court upon an appeal from an order and judgment modifying the terms of an interlocutory decree of divorce granted in an action between the parties hereto and from that portion of the final decree of divorce incorporating the terms of the order modifying the terms of the interlocutory decree and an appeal from the order denying alimony, costs, and counsel fees on appeal.

The matter of the alleged abuse of discretion upon the part of the trial court is involved and, therefore, a more complete statement of the facts is deemed necessary than would otherwise be required.

It appears that prior to the 23rd day of March, 1937, an action was commenced by Louis Leupe, as plaintiff, against his wife, Marie Leupe, as defendant, for a divorce. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint. The case came on for trial on the 23rd day of March, 1937, and was regularly continued from time to time to April 21, 1937, at which time it was tried. The plaintiff, respondent herein, did not appear in person but appeared by his attorney, Francis W. Murphy. Defendant, appellant herein, appeared personally and by her attorney, Carl W. Anderson. Upon the trial no evidence was offered on behalf of plaintiff. Evidence was offered on behalf of defendant in support of the allegations contained in her cross-complaint. On written stipulation, findings of fact and conclusions of law were waived and an interlocutory decree of divorce in favor of defendant and cross-complainant was granted upon the ground of extreme cruelty.

The interlocutory decree provided that plaintiff should pay to defendant the sum of $100 for additional counsel fees, payable in installments; that plaintiff pay to defendant the sum of $1,500 as and for her interest in the personal property and business conducted by the plaintiff in Burlingame, San Mateo County, California, said personal property being particularly described; that said sum of $1,500 should be paid in sums of $25 per month commencing May 1, 1937, until paid in full, and that said payment of $1,500 should be secured by a lien upon the personal property mentioned, said personal property being awarded to said plaintiff subject to a lien in favor of defendant in the sum of $1,500, said personal property to be charged with said lien for said sum, and that in the event plaintiff should fail to pay said installments, then and in that event, upon five days' notice in writing to plaintiff, defendant might apply for an order of sale to be issued to sell said personal property to satisfy said lien.

It was further ordered that plaintiff be required to pay to defendant the sum of $50 per month, commencing May 1, 1937, for the maintenance and support of said defendant, and, further, that upon the completion of the payment of said $1,500 by plaintiff to defendant, that said plaintiff should pay to defendant the sum of $75 per month for her maintenance and support.

This interlocutory decree was approved by Francis W. Murphy, plaintiff's attorney, before signing and filing. Thereafter J. E. McCurdy was substituted in place of Francis W. Murphy as attorney for plaintiff. Following this substitution, notice was served upon defendant and her attorney stating that on Monday, May 23, 1938, plaintiff would move the court for an order modifying the interlocutory decree of divorce entered on May 17, 1937, by striking therefrom the provision requiring the payment to defendant of any further moneys under or pursuant to said interlocutory decree. Accompanying the motion was an affidavit by plaintiff stating that theretofore and on May 17, 1937, an interlocutory decree of divorce was entered in said action in favor of defendant and against plaintiff, said interlocutory decree being referred to; that affiant did not know that a hearing in said matter was to be had on April 21, 1937, and was not present in court and did not consent to the terms of the interlocutory decree and the payments therein ordered to be made by said court, and had no knowledge of the terms and conditions thereof until after the entry of said decree; that in compliance with the terms of said interlocutory decree, plaintiff has paid to defendant and deposited with the Bank of America, Burlingame Branch, the sum of $75 per month each and every month since the entry of said decree; that the total sum of $900 has been paid by said plaintiff and cross-defendant since the entry of said decree, and that the total sum of $900, so affiant is informed and believes and therefore alleges, is on deposit with said Bank of America, Burlingame Branch. That none of said money has been necessary for the care, maintenance, and support of said defendant, and said defendant is amply provided for and does not need any care, maintenance, or support from the said plaintiff; that because of business depression and labor troubles, the business of said affiant has practically disappeared and since the 1st day of January, 1938, said affiant has been unable to do sufficient business and collect the money therefor to make any profit; that affiant has a machine shop in Burlingame, California, and some of the machinery and equipment therein contained is being purchased under contract of sale and there is still due and to be paid on said machinery and equipment approximately the sum of $800 in twelve installments of $68.30 a month; that affiant is not able to earn sufficient money to pay said monthly installments as they become due and that affiant will lose said machinery and equipment and will be obliged to discontinue business; that the net value of the personal property owned by plaintiff was never the sum of $1,500 and the machinery and equipment of affiant as set forth in said interlocutory decree should be discharged of any lien for the payment of said sum from said plaintiff to said defendant.

This motion was partially heard on May 23, 1938. When the action was called on the calendar defendant's attorney moved the court for an order for counsel fees and costs in defense of the motion about to be heard upon the ground that defendant had no funds with which to compensate her counsel or pay costs of a defense of said motion.

At said hearing plaintiff was called as a witness and testified that he was the plaintiff and operated a machine shop on Highland Avenue known as Louie's Machine Shop; that he had had considerable difficulty with the unions; that his business was very bad; that he was unable to make the payments as required under the terms of the interlocutory decree; that he had made all of the payments to date as required under the terms of said decree; that he paid out the sum of $61.03 on account of contracts of sale on equipment he was purchasing; that he owed approximately $700; that if he had not won $1,000 in a lottery he could not have made the payments as required in the decree. He also won a Chevrolet car in a theatre drawing; he made $1,852.42 in 1937 from his machine shop; he paid Mrs. Leupe $900 since the entry of the decree and she still has said money on deposit in the bank; his wife is a business woman and managed an apartment house in Seattle; that he had a bookkeeper and his books showed he actually lost $40 from January 1, 1938, to May 1, 1938.

On cross-examination he testified that Mrs. Leupe borrowed $800 from Margee Pansky and A. H. Barlin, and her brother, K. F. Pauliet, signed the note with her; he had no money at that time; he was out of work at that time; his wife gave him the $800 and he bought the shop. The note referred to was exhibited to plaintiff and he said that was the note. The note was then offered in evidence.

Plaintiff further testified on cross-examination that he executed a bill of sale of the machine shop to Mrs. Leupe on July 9, 1932. The bill of sale was identified and admitted in evidence. This bill of sale assigns, sells, conveys, and sets over to Mrs. Leupe as her separate property and not a part of the community property, all of his right, title, and interest in and to all machinery, equipment, and fixtures of every kind whatsoever in Louie's Machine Shop at 235 Highland Avenue, Burlingame, California, together with the good will and name and the leasehold interest thereof, and warrants to the buyer the title to said property.

Plaintiff testified further that his wife borrowed additional money to pay their living expenses for awhile because he had not been working; he paid the $800 note to Mrs. Leupe through earnings from the shop; that he did not bring his books for the shop with him; that he had paid Mrs. Leupe $300 on account of the property settlement agreement and $600 on alimony.

The matter was then continued for further hearing to June 27, 1938, at which time R. E. Benson, plaintiff's bookkeeper, was called as a witness for plaintiff and testified that he was the bookkeeper for Louie's Machine Shop and had been such bookkeeper for over a period of two years; that the books showed, in 1937, that Mr. Leupe's net earnings were $1,852.45; that the books show the earnings for the said business this year are less than last year; that the books showed that Leupe is indebted in the sum of more than $700 on conditional sales contracts and that the monthly payments are $61.03.

On cross-examination the witness testified that the total sales for the five months' period, 1937, was $3,104.27; that the total sales for the five months' period, 1938, was $2,569.95; that the labor costs during the five month period of 1937 was $933.96 and the labor costs for the five month period of 1938 was $461.94, and the difference between the total sales for the years 1937 and 1938 is $534.32; that the labor costs for the year 1938 was $472.02 less than 1937; that the difference between the periods for the years 1937–38 is that the actual income for 1938 is the sum of $62.30; that the total sales made for the five month period of 1938 is $2,569.95; that the total costs and outlay for the period is $1,843.84; that $305.15 of this amount was paid for equipment on contract; that the net income for the period from January 1 to May 30, 1938, is $1,032.-26.

On re-direct examination he testified that the property in the machine shop had been appraised by machinery men and one appraisal, for purposes of sale, was $2,200, and the other appraisal was for $2,000; and on re-cross examination he testified that for income tax purposes the property was valued at $8,000, and the depreciation for the year 1937 was taken in the amount of $833.97.

In opposition to the motion a counter affidavit by defendant Marie Leupe was presented in which it is alleged that it was not true that Louis Leupe did not know that a hearing on said matter was to be had on April 21, 1937; that on the 19th day of April, 1937, affiant was present in court with all of her witnesses who were to testify at the trial of said divorce action; that said plaintiff was present with two of his witnesses; that at said time the court made its order continuing the trial of said action to ten o'clock a. m. on April 21, 1937, and ordered that all witnesses return at said time; that on the 21st day of April, 1937, plaintiff was not present in court but was represented by his attorney, Francis W. Murphy; that on the 19th day of April, 1937, plaintiff had agreed with his attorney and the attorney for affiant as to the proposed settlement of the property rights of the parties and the amount of alimony to be paid in the event that an interlocutory decree of divorce was granted to affiant; that plaintiff consented to the terms of the interlocutory decree of divorce and the payments therein ordered to be made and did have knowledge of the terms and conditions prior to the entry of said decree; that on June 2, 1937, plaintiff was served with a certified copy of the interlocutory decree of divorce; that since the entry of said interlocutory decree plaintiff had paid to affiant the sum of $75 a month by depositing the same in the Bank of America, Burlingame Branch; that a total sum of $900 had been paid by plaintiff since the entry of the interlocutory decree and that $600 of said sum had been paid on account of the property interest of affiant, and the sum of $300 had been received by affiant for her care, maintenance, and support; that affiant did not have on deposit in the Bank of America, Burlingame Branch, the sum of $900.

That prior to the granting of the interlocutory decree of divorce, affiant was in ill health and extremely nervous, suffering from a heart ailment, and that affiant is still suffering from said heart ailment and unable to engage in any type of work to earn her living; that the sum of $25 a month is grossly inadequate to provide for the care and support of affiant, and that affiant has been forced to use the moneys awarded to her under the terms of the decree as her interest in the property of the parties herein for her care, maintenance, and support.

That affiant for a long period of time has been suffering from an infected tooth and has not had sufficient means with which to pay for an operation to remove said infected and impacted tooth.

That affiant is informed and believes that said plaintiff has enjoyed considerable business since the granting of said interlocutory decree and has made a large profit therefrom; and said affiant is without sufficient means to compensate her attorney in defense of the motion and prays that the motion of plaintiff be denied, and that an order be made allowing affiant a reasonable sum for her attorney fees and defense of said action.

That thereupon Mrs. Leupe was sworn and testified that she borrowed $800 to buy the shop for Leupe and borrowed $700 more to pay their house rent and something for their living; that she had one dollar in the bank and about one dollar in her purse, and that she has no other money or resources or income than the payments made by her husband to her; that she had used all of the money her husband had given her, including the $25 a month he was to pay on the property settlement; that she is ill and very nervous, has a bad heart and has fainting spells and cannot do anything to support herself or earn any money for herself; she had to spend money for medicine to relieve the heart condition; she had no money with which to buy clothing; the clothes she had on were all given to her by friends; she needed work done on her teeth and had no money with which to have the work done; she had no money to pay her attorney to defend the motion and had not paid her attorney any money to defend the motion.

On cross-examination she testified that she was managing an apartment house for her brother in Seattle part of the time she was married to Louie; that she was not well enough to manage an apartment house now; that she tried to get employment from the Sisters in Sacramento; she speaks French and thought she could get some work teaching French but she told them about her fainting spells and they would not have her.

Louis Leupe was recalled by defendant for further examination and testified that the only difference between his total sales for the first five months of 1937 and the total sales for the first five months of 1938 was $534.32; that the labor costs for 1938 for the same period was $472.02 less than 1937; that the total sales for the first five months of 1937 was $3,104.27; the total sales for the first five months of 1938 was $2,569.95; his labor costs during the same period for 1937 was $933.96 and his labor costs for the corresponding period for 1938 were $461.91; his labor costs so far this year were $472.02; that the only difference in the income is that the income for the first five months' period of 1938 was $62.30 less; that he won $1,000 in a lottery in 1937 and also a Chevrolet automobile, and he borrowed money on the automobile, about $300; that he had money; that he had $365 in the Bank of America at Burlingame; that he had the property at the machine shop; that he lived at the shop; that the rent for the shop was $35 a month, which rent was charged to the business operation; that his living expenses were about $30 per month.

The matter was submitted and on June 27, 1938, the court made an order modifying the interlocutory decree of divorce as follows: That the personal property interest in said interlocutory decree described shall not be subject to a lien in favor of defendant for the payments to be made by plaintiff; that the interlocutory decree be further modified so that in case plaintiff shall fail to pay the installments set forth in the interlocutory decree that said defendant may not apply for an order to be issued to sell said personal property to satisfy a lien as described in said interlocutory decree; that the said interlocutory decree be modified in regard to the monthly payments to be made to said defendant as follows: That said plaintiff be and he is hereby ordered, adjudged, and required to pay to defendant the sum of $10 per month hereafter and, pending the further order of the court, as and for the care, maintenance, and support of said defendant. It was further ordered that upon completion of the payments of said original sum of $1,500, as provided in said interlocutory decree, that said interlocutory decree be amended so that there shall be no increase in the monthly payments to be made to said defendant for her care, maintenance, and support.

The order modifying the interlocutory decree was filed and entered on July 1, 1938. No notice was given to defendant of the entry of the order. On July 5, 1938, the final decree of divorce was made and entered, and the modified provisions of the interlocutory decree were incorporated therein.

On July 18, 1938, pursuant to an order to show cause why plaintiff should not be made to pay such sums as the court may deem reasonable as and for costs in perfecting her appeal and for such further sums as the court might deem reasonable for attorney's fees for said defendant, the motion for such allowances came on to be heard and was continued to, and finally heard on August 8, 1938. By stipulation all of the proceedings had on the motion to modify the interlocutory decree and the order modifying same, and the final decree, were used on said hearing. In connection with the motion an affidavit by defendant was presented and in which affidavit it is stated that plaintiff has in his possession a great amount of personal property, including the sum of $350 cash, and that defendant has no money or property whatsoever; that plaintiff has sufficient means of his own to pay defendant the sum stated by defendant as costs of appeal and to pay defendant or her attorney a reasonable sum as and for attorney's fees for the prosecution of the appeal.

At the conclusion of the hearing the court denied the motion and dismissed the order to show cause. Within the proper time defendant appealed from this last-named order.

Concerning the grounds of appeal from the order modifying the interlocutory decree, it is the contention of appellant that the court was without authority to order the modification and that the modification of the interlocutory decree was not a proper exercise of the discretion vested in the court in such matters.

It is to be noted that in his affidavit respondent states that he did not know that a hearing was to be had on April 21, 1937; that he was not present in court and did not consent to the terms of the interlocutory decree of divorce and the payments therein ordered to be made by the court, and had no knowledge of the terms and conditions thereof until after the entry of said decree. However, there is nothing in his affidavit to show how long after the entry of the decree he learned about the decree or the terms or conditions thereof. In appellant's affidavit it is stated that on April 19, 1937, she was present in court with her witnesses and that plaintiff was present with his witnesses; that the court continued the trial to April 21, 1937, and ordered all witnesses to return at that time; that on April 21, 1937, respondent was not present but was represented by his attorney, Francis W. Murphy; that on April 19, 1937, respondent had agreed with his attorney and the attorney for appellant to the proposed settlement of the property rights of the parties and the amount of alimony to be paid in the event of the granting of an interlocutory decree, and that respondent consented to the terms of the interlocutory decree and the payments then ordered to be made and had knowledge of the terms and conditions prior to the entry of the decree; and that on June 2, 1937, respondent was served with a certified copy of the interlocutory decree of divorce. There was no specific denial by plaintiff of the service upon him of the certified copy of the interlocutory decree.

Respondent's affidavit states that none of the money has been necessary for appellant's maintenance and support; that she is amply provided for and does not need care, maintenance, and support from said respondent.

Appellant's affidavit specifically sets forth the condition of her health and of her finances. Respondent's affidavit further says that his business has practically disappeared and since June 1, 1938, he had been unable to do sufficient business and collect the money therefor to make any profit. However, the testimony discloses that there was no substantial difference in the proceeds from his business at the time of the granting of the interlocutory decree and the time of the hearing on the motion to modify the decree. It cannot be ascertained from respondent's affidavit whether the machinery which he purchased under conditional sales contract was secured prior to the time when the interlocutory decree was granted or subsequent thereto. The personal property described in the bill of sale hereinbefore referred to was the separate property of appellant.

[1, 2] The court was without authority to award this separate property to respondent without the consent of appellant. In the case of Fox v. Fox, 18 Cal.2d 645, 117 P.2d 325, quoting therefrom, at page 326, it is said: "In an action for divorce, only the community property and the homestead may be awarded; the court is not authorized to assign the separate property of one of the spouses to the other, nor to require one to pay to the other any amount in lieu of an assignment or division of it. Conard v. Conard, 5 Cal.App.2d 91, 41 P. 2d 968." See, also, Allen v. Allen, 159 Cal. 197, 113 P. 160; Heintz v. Heintz, 126 Cal. App. 106, 14 P.2d 317.

The interlocutory decree states that this personal property was awarded to respondent. The court was without authority to make this award without the consent of the appellant.

[3, 4] Whether it be called an award or a transfer, the consideration therefor to appellant was the $1,500, to be paid in accordance with the terms of the decree, the imposition of the lien, and the right to obtain the order of sale in the event of non-payment. The right of the lien and the right of sale were as much a part of the consideration as was the money payment. The respondent, in accepting the property, became bound by the conditions imposed by the interlocutory decree. He should not be permitted to accept and keep the benefit which he received from the transfer of the personal property to him without bearing the burdens attached to the entire consideration. The evidence presented to the trial court at the divorce hearing is not before this court. We must therefore presume that the court acted upon sufficient evidence as to plaintiff's ability to pay and as to appellant's necessities, in providing for the payments for her care, maintenance, and support as provided for in said interlocutory decree.

[5] Also, it is urged that the court, by reason of the lapse of time after the entry of the interlocutory decree and the making of the motion for modification thereof had lost jurisdiction. It may be conceded that the court may not dispose finally of the property rights of the parties, until the entry of the final decree of divorce, but it has been held that where a court does, by its order, make such disposal, its act in so doing constitutes an error of law, which can be remedied only on motion for a new trial or other appropriate motion—or on direct appeal.

In the case of Peis v. Mohr, 126 Cal. App. 300, 14 P.2d 878, 880, it is said: "A trial court should not by interlocutory decree of divorce eo instante assign and dispose of community or homestead property, although it may determine therein how such property shall be ultimately awarded and assigned when the marriage is dissolved by a final decree of divorce; but if such court by its interlocutory decree does in fact make such determination and award, its act in so doing constitutes an error of law which can be remedied only on seasonable motion for new trial or other appropriate motion or upon direct appeal."

[6] As the motion to modify the interlocutory decree was not made for more than six months after the entry of such decree and under all of the circumstances herein appearing, we are satisfied that the motion to modify was not made in time, and that as to the property rights attempted to be settled, the trial court was without authority to order the modification.

[7] Generally an attorney is not vested with authority to bind his client in matters affecting property rights. From the evidence before the trial court perhaps an inference could reasonably have been drawn that there was an agreement between the parties settling their property rights but, in the view we take, it is not deemed necessary to determine the question of the authority of the attorney or whether, as a matter of law, there was such an agreement. These matters, in our opinion, are such as the trial court should determine after an opportunity for hearing directed to those questions.

[8-10] As no substantial difference is shown as to respondent's ability to pay at the time the order modifying the interlocutory decree was made, there is support for the contention that the trial court, in ordering the modification in respect to the alimony, did not exercise a proper discretion. Under the facts herein, the trial court exercised its discretion at the time of the making of the interlocutory decree of divorce providing for the payments for maintenance and support, and the financial circumstances of respondent were substantially the same at the time of the hearing on the motion to modify as they were at the date of the granting of the interlocutory decree. In such matters as this the court has a discretion but there is a definite limit to its exercise and it cannot be arbitrary or capricious. In view of this limitation, the principle set forth in Snyder v. Snyder, 219 Cal. 80, 25 P.2d 403, is applicable herein. In that case it appears that after denial of the motion to modify the interlocutory decree on November 12, 1931, an order was made modifying the interlocutory decree on the same set of facts on February 9, 1932. Therein the court said:

"It is not necessary to determine whether the showing made by defendant on either of the orders to show cause set forth grounds sufficient to authorize the modification of said maintenance order. For it is clear that the court, having denied the application on November 12, 1931, was without authority on February 9, 1932, to alter said decree upon an identical state of facts. It would be incongruous to allow an appealable order to become final and yet to concede the power of a court at a later date, upon the same state of facts, to issue an order nullifying it. The rule of law in this particular is stated in 1 Ruling Case Law, page 948, as follows:

"'Authority to modify the allowance, however, does not include the right to alter the award upon the state of case existing when the decree was entered, or to review the action of the chancellor therein. The parties had their day in court, with the right of appeal if the decree was deemed erroneous, and it cannot be suppposed that it was intended that the court should sit in review of its own decrees, or that the same or some succeeding chancellor presiding in the same court should, after the lapse of indefinite time, have power to reverse, alter or modify a decree for alimony upon the facts existing at the time of its entry.' See, also, to the same effect, 19 C.J. 273. This rule is followed by the District Court of Appeal in Molema v. Molema, 103 Cal.App. 79, 283 P. 956. See, also, a case directly in point decided by the Supreme Court of the state of Idaho, Simpson v. Simpson, 51 Idaho 99, 4 P.2d 345."

The case of Simpson v. Simpson appears to be directly in point. Therein it is held, under facts similar to those established herein, that authority to modify such a decree can only be exercised upon a showing of material, permanent, and substantial change in the circumstances and conditions of the parties.

In regard to the second appeal, it is to be noted that the motion there involved seeking the allowance for alimony, costs, and counsel fees on appeal was submitted upon the evidence theretofore introduced and the order denying the motion was based thereon. We have hereinbefore held that the order heretofore made modifying the interlocutory decree was erroneous and as to the amounts allowed for maintenance and support, was not a proper exercise of the discretion of the court.

[11] It appears very inconsistent, to say the least, that respondent should, by securing an order modifying the terms of an interlocutory decree and thus render appellant unable to support or maintain herself or to pay her counsel fees and costs of appeal, successfully prevent appellant from securing a review by an appellate court of the order thus sustained. We are satisfied that it was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court to deny the motion.

It is ordered that the order modifying the interlocutory decree be reversed and those portions of the final decree incorporating the modifications set forth in the interlocutory decree in pursuance of said order be stricken out, and that an amended final decree be entered as of the date of the original decree, conforming to the provisions of said interlocutory decree as they appeared prior to the making of said order of modification. It is also ordered that the order denying appellant's motion for alimony, costs, and counsel fees on the appeal be, and the same is hereby reversed; and that the trial court fix such amounts as may be found reasonable for costs and counsel fees on appeal.

TUTTLE, J., and THOMPSON, Acting P.J., concurred.

BLANTON et al. v. CURRY et al.

Civ. 2927.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 20, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 17, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 19, 1942.

1. Automobiles ⇐246(60)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile while crossing street at night, giving of instruction on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was error, where that doctrine was inapplicable because accident might have been caused by boy's negligence.

2. Negligence ⇐121(2)

Where plaintiffs in negligence case plead negligence in general terms, subsequent proof of specific acts of negligence relied upon destroys application of doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

3. Automobiles ⇐242(2)

The doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" was inapplicable in action to recover for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile while crossing street at night, where, because of possibility that boy was negligent, it was not sufficiently established that accident was such as in the ordinary course of things would not have happened if driver of automobile had used proper care.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Res Ipsa Loquitur".

4. Negligence ⇐121(2)

The doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" does not apply where an unexplained accident might have been caused by plaintiff's own negligence.

5. Trial ⇐296(4)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, the fact that instruction concerning boy's right to presume that motorist would obey the law did not require that boy should have been exercising ordinary care before being entitled to such an assumption did not require reversal where court also instructed that motorist was entitled to assume that the boy would cross highway in a careful manner.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1195(3)

The conclusion of the Supreme Court on former appeal after considering instructions given at first trial constituted the "law of the case" relating to subject matter of those instructions and was binding upon the parties in the subsequent trial thereof.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Law of the Case".

7. Automobiles ⇐11

Where a street joins with or crosses another street having two traveled portions separated by a private right of way or parkway, there is one "intersection" within the Vehicle Code defining an intersection. Vehicle Code, § 86, St.1935, p. 99.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Intersection".

8. Automobiles ⇐246(51)

Where side street did not go beyond a thoroughfare consisting of two roadways separated by a parkway, but ended at westerly curb of the thoroughfare, there was an "intersection" within provisions of Vehicle Code defining an intersection, and also defining an unmarked "cross-walk" as portion of roadway ordinarily included within prolongation of boundary lines of sidewalks at intersections, and therefore there was no error in use of term "cross-walk" in instruction upon right of way at a cross-walk, in action for injuries sustained by boy struck by automobile while crossing the west roadway of the thoroughfare. Vehicle Code, §§ 85, 86, St.1935, p. 99.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Cross-Walk".

9. Trial ⇐295(6)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile while crossing street at night, instruction that a motorist must take precautions against injuring any users of highway was not prejudicially erroneous when considered with preceding portion of instruction stating that both the boy and the motorist had a right to expect that the other would exercise care.

10. Trial ⇐295(3)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, a portion of instruction stating that a motorist must take precaution that he will not do injury to any of users of highway, when standing alone, was subject to criticism for not taking into consideration whether user of highway was himself negligent.

11. Trial ⇐296(4)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, deficiency in instruction stating in effect that care required of boy depended upon his age was cured by other instructions relating to care required of a child.

12. Automobiles ⇐246(35)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, the plaintiff, being a minor, was entitled to an instruction as to duty of care exacted of minors.

13. Appeal and error ⇐1064(4)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, instruction that burden was on defendants to establish affirmative allegations of their answer, although incomplete in form, was not harmful.

14. Negligence ⇐122(2)

Negligence on the part of a plaintiff is a matter of defense to be proved affirmatively by the defendant, unless it can be inferred from the evidence given in the plaintiff's case.

15. Trial ⇐296(4)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, instruction that to establish defense of contributory negligence it must be first shown that plaintiff's negligence concurred and co-operated with the negligence of the defendants up to the very time of the injury, although not a complete statement of the rule, was not harmful in view of other instructions. Civ. Code, § 1714.

16. Negligence ⇐56(1)

The "proximate cause" of an injury is that cause which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produced the injuries and without which the result would not have occurred.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Proximate Cause".

17. Negligence ⇐82

The defense of contributory negligence is predicated upon a defendant's own negligence, and any want of care on part of plaintiff which is appropriate under the circumstances is negligence and will prevent a recovery if it is one of the proximate causes of the injury.

18. Trial ⇐244(4)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, the fact that court, in giving instructions as to duty of both boy and motorist to use sense of sight, stated that age of boy and maturity of motorist could be considered, did not render instructions erroneous on ground that court overemphasized the matter of the boy's age and cast the greater burden on the motorist to look and see.

19. Trial ⇐244(1)

Courts should not unduly emphasize matters contained in instructions which would be detrimental to either party.

20. Negligence ⇐85(2)

Minors as well as adults are required to exercise ordinary care, but the ordinary care required of a child is to be determined by a different rule than is required in the case of adults.

21. Appeal and error ⇐1068(4)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, oral instruction that judgment might be for $10,000 against driver of automobile but could be for only $5,000 against owner, but if owner was the principal and driver was the agent, then there was no such limitation as to the owner, was not prejudicially erroneous as suggesting amount of damages, where court specifically informed jury that amount stated was an example, notwithstanding that jury returned verdict of $10,000 against both.

22. Appeal and error ⇐1064(4)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile, instruction that in making award for damages resulting in the future, jury could consider future pain and suffering which are the result proximately of the collision, was not prejudicially erroneous because of failure to use term "certain to result". Civ.Code, § 3283.

23. Automobiles ⇐246(51)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile while crossing street, where evidence indicated that the boy was not in the unmarked cross-walk when struck, refusal of requested instruction in language of Vehicle Code stating that pedestrians crossing roadway at point other than cross-walk must yield right of way to vehicles was error. Vehicle Code, § 562(a), St.1935, p. 188.

24. Trial ⇐261

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile traveling north on westerly roadway of street consisting of two roadways separated by a parkway, where plaintiff conceded that motorist had right to travel north on the westerly roadway, defendants' requested instruction that street consisted of two separate highways, and that it was lawful to travel in both directions on each highway, should have been given, substituting the word "roadway" instead of "highway".

25. Highways ⇐166
Municipal corporations ⇐703(1)

The terms "street" and "highway" as used in the Vehicle Code are not synonymous with the term "roadway" in that term "roadway" covers only that territory improved, designed, or ordinarily used for vehicular travel, while term "highway" covers not only that portion used for vehicular travel but also that portion used for parking, sidewalks and pedestrian travel. Vehicle Code, §§ 81, 83, 84, 525, St.1935, pp. 98, 99, 181.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Highway", "Roadway" and "Street".

26. Courts ⇐90(4)
Highways ⇐166
Statutes ⇐225

The words "highway" and "roadway" when used in the Vehicle Code are used for the special purposes of that act, and sections of other codes and decisions under them relating to those terms have little bearing on the meaning of the terms as used in the Vehicle Code. Vehicle Code, §§ 81, 83, 84, 525, St.1935, pp. 98, 99, 181; St.1931, pp. 2102, 2124, §§ 21, 122.

27. Municipal corporations ⇐655

A city thoroughfare consisting of two roadways separated by parkway did not come within provisions of Street and Highway Code authorizing separation of any state highway into separate roadways. St.1939, p. 1520, § 144.

28. Highways ⇐18

A "highway" may consist of two roadways.

29. Automobiles ⇐246(51)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy struck by automobile traveling north on westerly roadway of street consisting of two roadways separated by a parkway, where it appeared that the roadway had not been set aside for one-way traffic, although same roadway in another city several blocks away had been so designated, motorist was entitled to an instruction that it was lawful for him to travel on the right half of the westerly roadway. Vehicle Code, §§ 81, 83, 84, 459(e), St.1935, pp. 98, 99, 164.

30. Trial ⇐29(3)

In personal injury action, where plaintiff endeavored to impeach defendants' witness by showing that witness demanded $25 to testify for the plaintiff, although witness insisted that he merely stated that his loss in leaving his business would amount to that much, trial court's remarks in examining witness were subject to criticism in that court's attitude and words might have indicated to jury that no weight should have been given witness' testimony.

31. Automobiles ⇐245(74)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile while crossing street, whether boy was contributorily negligent was a question for jury where evidence as to care exercised by boy was conflicting.

32. Automobiles ⇐223(2)

In determining whether 12-year old boy who was struck by automobile while crossing street was contributorily negligent, jury could properly consider not only boy's age, but also his capacity for understanding.

33. Negligence ⇐136(29)

The question as to capacity of a particular child at a particular time to exercise care in avoiding a particular danger is one of fact for the jury.

34. Damages ⇐130(3)

$10,000 for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy who suffered a linear skull fracture when struck by automobile and who complained of headaches, and impairment of hearing in his left ear four years after accident, and who stated that he had nose-bleed at night, that he could not watch movies very much and that he didn't learn like he did before the accident was not excessive.

35. Appeal and error ⇐1170(9)

In action for injuries sustained by 12-year old boy when struck by automobile while crossing street, error in giving instruction on doctrine of res ipsa loquitur could not be disregarded as immaterial error under the Constitution, but was prejudicial in view of other errors in the trial. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

This action has been before this court heretofore on an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants which was reversed for reasons therein stated. Blanton v. Curry, 36 Cal.App.2d 575, 98 P.2d 221. Most of the essential facts regarding the accident and injuries are there related.

About 5:30 P. M. on December 12, 1936, John Blanton, Jr., was attempting to cross a thoroughfare known as Euclid Avenue in the city of Upland, when he was run into by a Buick roadster automobile being operated by the appellant Curry. Euclid Avenue is a street consisting of two roadways, each running north and south and having a 65-foot parkway in the center thereof planted with large pepper trees. Euclid Avenue intersects G Street. G Street is a 34-foot street extending east and west but which at its intersection with Euclid Avenue does not continue through to the west in a straight or right-angle course but dead-ends at the westerly curb of Euclid Avenue. John Blanton, Jr., aged 12 years, and his brother Virgil, aged 14, were walking southerly on the sidewalk on the west portion of Euclid Avenue, which roadway is 44 feet wide for a short distance before arriving at G Street. They then pursued a course on an angle toward the southeast to cross the parkway above described and both the east and west roadways of Euclid Avenue, which roadways are 37 feet wide. It was their intention to cross to the sidewalk of G Street on the southeast corner of the intersection. As they reached the west curb of Euclid Avenue, John Blanton, Jr., looked south but saw no cars coming from that direction. He then looked north and saw a car quite a distance away slowly approaching, with its lights burning. After stepping off the west curb of Euclid Avenue at a place described by at least one witness as within the area which would be encompassed by the prolongation of the south curb line of G Street and the south sidewalk line on the south side of G Street near the middle of the roadway, John looked to the south. He then for the first time "heard the motor" and saw a "dark object" approaching "almost on me" but he did not observe any lights on it. Seeing that the car approaching would strike him if he remained in the position he was in when he observed the car for the first time, he darted in a northeasterly direction to complete the crossing and in an attempt to run out of the way of the car, but was struck while in the easterly half of the west roadway of Euclid Avenue by the right portion of the appellants' automobile. He was rendered unconscious by a severe injury to his head. Virgil testified that he did not see any lights on the automobile of the appellants until after the car had come to rest, and at that time he did see the lights shining on the body of his brother which was about ten feet ahead of the standing automobile. Although the foundation for the opinion was quite unsatisfactory, he estimated the speed of the automobile at between "30 and 35 miles at least" when the car passed by, approximately a foot or two in front of him. Appellant Curry testified that he was operating his car in a northerly direction on the easterly half of the west roadway of Euclid Avenue at approximately 20 miles an hour when suddenly there appeared in front of his left headlight the figures of the boys who approached his car from a northwesterly direction, apparently from a point just north of the unmarked cross-walk in question; that he did not see them until he was immediately upon them and was unable to avoid colliding with one of them.

On a retrial of the case the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff John Blanton, Jr., in the sum of $10,000, and for plaintiff John Blanton in the sum of $466.10, against each of the defendants.

[1] It is now contended (1) that the giving of and refusal to give certain instructions was prejudicially erroneous. After giving an instruction to the effect that "the burden of proof in litigation is on the party holding the affirmative of an issue; * * *. It is not enough that the parties charged with the burden of proof produced some scintilla of evidence or enough evidence to raise a suspicion that the fact is as they contend; to maintain such contention it must be established by a preponderance of the evidence," the court, on its own initiative, gave the following instruction (our letters used for identification):

(A) "The court further instructs you that the plaintiffs are not required to show particularly what the specific act of negligence was which produced the accident, but are only required to show that the collision is one which ordinarily would not have occurred had due care been employed by defendant; when and if the plaintiffs made such proof, the burden of proof shifts to the defendants to show their freedom from negligence, or to show that the plaintiff, the minor plaintiff, was also negligent, and that his negligence proximately contributed to the collision."

[2, 3] Appellants contend that in effect this was an application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur; that the jury was instructed that the plaintiffs were not required to show any special act of negligence on the part of the defendant; that if the accident would not ordinarily have occurred had due care been employed by the defendants then the defendants were required to establish by a preponderance of the evidence their freedom from negligence; that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was not applicable to the case at bar and the giving of the instruction was prejudicial error, citing Gonzalez v. Nichols, 110 Cal.App. 738, 294 P. 758; Lake v. Churchill, 20 Cal.App.2d 411, 414, 67 P.2d 107; Keller v. Cushman, 104 Cal.App. 186, 189, 285 P. 399; Gritsch v. Pickwick Stages System, 131 Cal.App. 774, 783, 22 P.2d 554, and Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 609, 265 P. 238, 59 A.L.R. 480. This and other courts have criticized instructions attempting to expound the res ipsa loquitur rule wherein it is stated that the burden of proof shifts from side to side. Ireland v. Marsden, 108 Cal.App. 632, 642, 291 P. 912. Although respondents pleaded negligence in general terms, upon the trial they immediately endeavored to prove, as a part of their case, the specific acts of negligence relied upon. This has been held to destroy the application of the doctrine. Gorden v. Goldberg, 3 Cal.App.2d 659, 40 P.2d 276; Mansfield v. Pickwick Stages, N.D., 68 Cal. App. 507, 229 P. 890; Carlsen v. Diehl, 57 Cal.App. 731, 208 P. 150. Respondents did not sufficiently establish that the accident was such as in the ordinary course of things did not happen if those who had the management and control used proper care. This was an essential element to the application of the doctrine. The reasoning used in Tower v. Humboldt Transit Co., 176 Cal. 602, at page 607, 169 P. 227, at page 230, fully supports this conclusion and is particularly applicable. There it was said:

"As between street cars and other vehicles or persons on the public streets, neither has a superior right, and neither is bound to exercise a higher degree of care than the other. It cannot be said that 'in the ordinary course of things' a street car does not run into a person on the street if the street car is properly operated. On the contrary, the mishap is quite as likely to be due to the fault of the person struck, or of some third person, or to some unforeseen and unpreventable cause, as to the negligence of those operating the car. At best, the instruction was inapplicable, and therefore misleading."

[4] It has also been held that the rule does not apply where an unexplained accident might have been caused by plaintiff's own negligence. Olson v. Whitthorne & Swan, 203 Cal. 206, 263 P. 518, 58 A.L.R. 129. The rule has been held to apply in certain automobile accident cases not factually similar. 19 Cal.Jur. p. 714, § 129; 3 Cal.Jur. p. 964, § 196; Ireland v. Marsden, supra. Under the authorities cited the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was not applicable to the facts in this case. The giving of this instruction was therefore error. Elsewhere in the instructions, however, the jury were repeatedly told that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the negligence of the defendant was a proximate cause of the injury.

In the Tower v. Humboldt Transit Co. case, supra, a similar instruction on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was held erroneous because not applicable to the facts. Notwithstanding the fact that the court did give a proper instruction in reference to the burden of proof, the Supreme Court reversed the action because of that and other erroneous instructions. There the court pointed out that the proof of negligence in that particular case was so unsatisfactory that the errors in instructions could not be disregarded.

In Gonzalez v. Nichols, supra, it was held that the giving of the res ipsa loquitur instruction similar in form was error, but due to the exceptionally clear case of negligence presented under the facts it was held that the giving of the instruction did not result in a miscarriage of justice. The question to determine here is whether under the facts of this case, the evidence of negligence may be so classed and therefore the error can be disregarded under the provisions of section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution. We will consider this question in conjunction with the other instructions and other claimed errors hereinafter set forth.

[5] The next two questioned instructions (B and C) involved the right of the plaintiff to presume that the defendant would obey the law. It is argued that neither of these instructions contained the necessary limitation that the plaintiff should be exercising ordinary care before he would be entitled to assume that the defendant was exercising ordinary care. A similar instruction with slight variations to meet the factual situation involved was approved in Schroeder v. Baumgarteker, 202 Cal. 626, 628, 262 P. 740. Immediately following the two criticized instructions the court said: "And the defendant Curry had a right to expect that the minor plaintiff, or anyone else of his age and experience, would cross the highway in a careful and prudent manner." It thus appears that the court told the jury in effect that both the minor plaintiff and the defendant Curry had a right to assume that the other would obey the law and would exercise due care and caution in respect to their use of the highway. While it may be true that they do not contain all of the elements which should enter into instructions of this character, the instructions, when considered as a whole, were no less favorable to the defendants than to the plaintiffs and not so incomplete as to justify a reversal of the case.

Objection is made to instruction lettered (D) (plaintiff's instruction No. 7), upon the question of the right of way at a cross-walk. Exception is taken to this instruction particularly as to the use of the term "cross-walk," as defined in section 85 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 99, viz.: "That portion of a roadway ordinarily included within the prolongation or connection of the boundary lines of sidewalks at intersections where the intersecting roadways meet at approximately right angles, * * *." It is contended that there was no cross-walk at the intersection in question because there was no sidewalk, the boundary lines of which could be prolonged on the highway under consideration; that because there was no sidewalk across the highway adjacent to G Street as it intersected the parkway, there was consequently no cross-walk over the westerly roadway of Euclid Avenue in the vicinity where the accident occurred which could be attributed to the prolongation of a sidewalk across the parkway; that any claimed cross-walk across the east roadway of Euclid Avenue would not constitute the prolongation of any sidewalk paralleling G

Street, as that sidewalk terminated and merged in the sidewalk paralleling Euclid Avenue; that the above-quoted section of the Vehicle Code limited unmarked cross-walks to those which were the result of a prolongation of the boundary lines of sidewalks and removed the portion of the roadway under consideration from those classified as cross-walks. In other words, it is appellants' contention that there was no legally defined cross-walk at the place of the accident.

[6] Upon the first appeal in this case the appellants urged this identical point and argued that these particular instructions which the court refused to give and which were requested at the first trial were erroneous in defining the rights of pedestrians at cross-walks. It was there held that these instructions were in accordance with the law and that it was error to refuse to give them. In their petition for a hearing in the Supreme Court the appellants again made the same argument which again was disposed of adversely to their contention. The conclusion of the upper court reached on the former appeal, after considering the instructions given at the first trial, constitutes the law of the case in this respect and is binding upon the parties in the subsequent trial thereof. Reid v. Northern Assurance Co., 63 Cal.App. 114, 218 P. 290; Table Mt. T. Co. v. Stranahan, 21 Cal. 548.

[7, 8] Irrespective of this conclusion, section 85 of the Vehicle Code defines an unmarked cross-walk as the "portion of a roadway ordinarily included within the prolongation or connection of the boundary lines of sidewalks at intersections * * *." [Italics added.] Section 86 of the Vehicle Code defines an intersection as "the area embraced within the prolongation of the lateral curb lines, or, if none, then the lateral boundary lines of the roadways, of two highways which join one another at approximately right angles or the area within which vehicles traveling upon different highways joining at any other angle may come in conflict." [Italics added.] It has been uniformly held that where a street joins with or crosses a double street, that is, where one whose two traveled portions are separated by a private right of way or parkway, there is one intersection within the meaning of our statute. Cruzen v. Wilcox, 20 Cal.App.2d 728, 67 P.2d 709; Driscoll v. Shipp, 13 Cal.App.2d 591, 57 P.2d 177; Lowenbruck v. Stiglmeier, 7 Cal.App. 2d 204, 46 P.2d 251; Schulman v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 44 Cal.App.2d 122, 111 P.2d 924; Colburn v. Schilling, 41 Cal.App. 2d 541, 107 P.2d 279; Kienlen v. Holt, 106 Cal.App. 135, 288 P. 866. The intersection here involved comes within the provisions of sections 85 and 86 of the Vehicle Code.

[9, 10] On its own initiative the court gave this instruction:

(E) "Our streets are dedicated to the use of the public at all times, the old and the young, the strong and the active. The driver of a vehicle must, accordingly, take precaution that he will not do injury which may be injurious or fatal to any of the users of the highway."

Appellants complain because this instruction in effect, it is claimed, advised the jury that the driver of a vehicle was required to take such precautions as would prevent injury to any of the users of the highway; that the obligation on the part of the driver of an automobile is to exercise ordinary care; that the instruction in question obligates the driver of a motor vehicle to "take precaution that he will not do injury"; that this, in effect, makes the driver of an automobile an insurer of the safety of the users of the highways; and that appellant was only required to take such precaution as would be taken by an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances, citing Prato v. Snyder, 12 Cal. App.2d 88, 95, 55 P.2d 255. This instruction as given and standing alone meets with condemnation for the reason that the question whether the user of the highway was himself negligent is not taken into consideration. Thompson v. Baldwin, 26 Cal. App.2d 703, 80 P.2d 198. The basis of the instruction is that in the enjoyment of a common right the participant must exercise constant care that the correlative rights of others may not be unnecessarily impaired or destroyed. Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal.App. 157, 201 P. 471. The criticized portion of the instruction was taken out of the context of an instruction in which the court told the jury "that every person has a right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law * * * Specifically applying that instruction to the case before you, the plaintiff in this case had the right to expect that the defendant Curry would drive his car with due care and circumspection and caution; and the defendant Curry had a right to expect that the minor plaintiff, or anyone else of his age and experience, would cross the highway in a careful and prudent manner." Then followed the criticized quoted portion. The instruction, when considered as a whole, is not prejudicially erroneous.

[11] Relative to the degree of care required of minors the court gave this instruction which was deficient:

(F) "You are to determine with reference to the pleadings what would an ordinarily prudent child of the age of the boy at the time of the accident do under similar circumstances, or the same circumstances. (Italics ours) * * * In determining the question * * * you must take into consideration, as I have indicated to you, that he is to be judged by the standard of due care of a child of his age at the time of the injury, and that the defendant Curry should be judged by the standard of the age which he appears to be, as to care and caution."

A more complete rule is stated in Todd v. Orcutt, 42 Cal.App. 687, 691, 183 P. 963, 965, where the court said that "plaintiff was required to exercise the same degree of care, no more and no less, than would be expected from a child of his age, or which children of his years ordinarily exercise under like circumstances, taking into consideration, not only the boy's age, but his capacity for understanding." (Italics ours.) The court did give additional instructions, one covering part of the deficiency complained of which appellants also criticize, without merit, for other reasons. It reads in part:

(G) "The plaintiff in the instant case is a minor and judgment is not passed on his conduct with the same strictness as in the case of adults. Children are not regarded as possessing the same mental capacity to appreciate the danger incident to the use of a public thoroughfare as those of mature age. What is required of a child is that he shall exercise the same degree of care as will ordinarily be expected of a reasonably careful child of the same age and intelligence under like circumstances."

In addition to many similar instructions, at appellants' request the court gave an instruction to the effect that:

(H) "The fact that the plaintiff was a boy between 12 and 13 years of age did not free him of the obligation of exercising ordinary care for his own protection. He was required to exercise that care which an ordinarily prudent person of his age, discretion and intelligence would have used under the circumstances."

[12] The plaintiff John Blanton, Jr., being a minor, was entitled to an instruction as to the duty of care exacted of minors. Bowdoin v. Southern Pacific Co., 178 Cal. 634, 174 P. 664. Similar instructions have been upheld. Studer v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 400, 404, 53 P. 942, 66 Am.St.Rep. 39; Shannon v. Central-Gaither Union School District, 133 Cal. App. 124, 23 P.2d 769.

It is argued that it is equally as dangerous for a minor as for an adult to cross a street after ascertaining the approach of an automobile. There can be no claim that the jury was incorrectly advised as to the law in this respect.

[13, 14] Appellants next complain of an instruction (I) given on the court's own motion, on the question of burden of proof. This instruction informed the jury that "the burden is on the defendants to establish the affirmative allegations of their answer, for example, regarding the point of contributory negligence * * * that is, negligence of the minor plaintiff, which proximately contributed to the injury of the plaintiff, the burden is on the defendants to sustain that contention."

Appellants argue that the instruction did not clearly state the rule which is that the defendants have the burden of proving contributory negligence, unless it affirmatively appears from the plaintiffs' own evidence, citing Marr v. Whistler, 49 Cal.App. 364, 371, 193 P. 600; Soda v. Marriott, 118 Cal.App. 635, 642, 5 P.2d 675. The rule, correctly stated, is that negligence on the part of a plaintiff is a matter of defense to be proved affirmatively by a defendant unless it can be inferred from the evidence given in the plaintiffs' case. Marr v. Whistler, supra. In Daniel v. Asbill, 97 Cal.App. 731, 276 P. 149, the appellant claimed that a similar instruction was erroneous. In answering that argument the court held that the instruction was a correct statement of the law and did no more than inform the jury as to the question of the burden of proof; that if the defendant desired a further instruction to be given, he should have requested it, but obviously, no harm could have resulted from the giving of the instruction. To like effect see Richmond v. Moore, 103 Cal.App. 173, 284 P. 681. Appellant offered no additional instruction on the subject. Although incomplete in form, no harm could have resulted from the giving of the criticized instruction.

[15-17] On its own motion the court gave this instruction:

(J) "In order that contributory negligence may be successfully established as a defense, it must be first shown that negligence of plaintiff alleged to be contributory negligence, concurred and cooperated with the negligence of the defendants up to the very time of the injury." (Italics ours.)

Appellants charge error because this instruction led the jury to believe that the failure of the minor plaintiff to look before crossing the roadway may not have proximately contributed to the accident because it occurred prior to the "very time of the injury" and did not concur and cooperate with the negligence of the defendants "up to such time," and argue that the error was aggravated by the refusal of the court to give two of appellants' instructions bearing on the question. To say that the negligence of a plaintiff, in order to be contributory, must concur and cooperate with the negligence of a defendant up to the very time of the injury is not a complete statement of the rule. Salomon v. Meyer, 1 Cal.2d 11, 32 P.2d 631. It is apparent that the court was endeavoring to paraphrase the rule that the proximate cause of an injury is that cause which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produced the injuries, and without which the results would not have occurred; that the defense of contributory negligence is predicated upon a defendant's own negligence; and that any want on the part of a plaintiff of the care which is appropriate under the circumstances is negligence and will prevent a recovery if it be one of the proximate causes of the injury. Civ.Code, § 1714; Wiezorek v. Ferris, 176 Cal. 353, 167 P. 234; Konig v. Lyon, 49 Cal.App. 113, 192 P. 875; Steinberger v. California Electric, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 386, 168 P. 570. The instruction as given, when considered with other proper instructions on the subject, was not harmful. Similar instructions have been approved. 19 Cal.Jur. 649, § 78.

[18-20] The court voluntarily on its own motion gave several instructions, designated (K), which outline a general rule respecting both plaintiffs and defendants as to the duty to look and see that which they could have seen had they looked. In many instances the court commented with words to this effect: "In determining that issue, you must take into consideration the age of John Blanton, Jr., and the maturity of Curry, of course." Appellants contend that the court overemphasized the matter of the age of respondent John Blanton, Jr., and accordingly cast a greater burden on the defendants than on the minor respondent to look and see. No error appears. Duehren v. Stewart, 39 Cal.App.2d 201, 209, 102 P.2d 784. Courts, of course, should not unduly emphasize matters contained in instructions which would be detrimental to either party. Minors, as well as adults, are required to exercise ordinary care, but it is well settled that the ordinary care which a child is required to exercise must be determined by a different rule than is required in the case of adults. Mayne v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 178, 175 P. 690; Schierhold v. North Beach & M. R. R. Co., 40 Cal. 447. It was therefore proper to say to the jury in effect that in determining whether or not the failure of the minor plaintiff to see, if he looked, assuming it did find that he looked and failed to see constituted negligence, it should take into consideration the fact that he was a minor. It cannot be said that the action of the trial court in this respect was erroneous.

[21] The trial court, by way of explanation and example, orally instructed the jury (L) that the judgment in the case might be for $10,000 against Curry, the driver, but could be for only $5,000 against Koehler, the owner of the car, but if Koehler was the principal and Curry was the agent, as stipulated, then there was no such limitation as to Koehler. The jury returned a verdict of $10,000 against both, the same amount suggested in the example. Appellants complain because they believe the jury followed the suggestion of the court and not the evidence as to the amount of damages. It is difficult to appraise the power of suggestion, especially as between the trial judge and the jury. Precaution should be taken to prevent criticism in this respect. In the instant case, however, the trial court did specifically inform the jury that the amount stated was "as an example, and not in any way as a suggestion." While this instruction is not to be commended, standing alone, it cannot be considered prejudicially erroneous.

[22] The court in one instruction (M) upon the issue of damages, on its own motion, said: "* * * damages, if any, * * * may be awarded for the detriment resulting after the commencement of the action and for damages resulting in the future * * *. You are to take into consideration * * * pain and suffering to the injured in the future, if any, which are the result proximately of the collision." (Italics ours.) The instruction is claimed to be prejudicially erroneous because it did not contain the limitation "for detriment resulting or certain to result in the future," citing Melone v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 113, 116, 91 P. 522; Civ.Code, § 3283. This was the only instruction upon the issue of future damages. It is clear that the instruction as worded does not use the term "certain to result," as used in section 3283 of the Civil Code. Since the decision of Melone v. Sierra Ry. Co., supra (1907), several cases have been before our higher courts which, to some extent, have relaxed the rule therein stated. In several of these cases the courts discuss the propriety of instructions relative to future damages which do not contain the words "certain to result in the future" and which appear to be less favorable to a defendant than the instructions in question here. They are held to be proper and not to constitute error. Zerbo v. Electrical Products Corp., 212 Cal. 733, 735, 300 P. 825; Learned v. Peninsula R. T. Co., 49 Cal.App. 436, 439, 193 P. 591. We do not believe the language used in the instruction is such that it left the estimation of future damages to the conjecture or whim of the jury as contended. Although the word "certain" does not appear in the instruction as given, nevertheless the element of certainty is present and there can be no room for conjecture when the jury has been limited to the loss or damage "resulting in the future" which the evidence shows the minor plaintiff will sustain and "which are the result proximately of the collision." The instruction given, while not a model to be followed in the future, cannot be held to be prejudicially erroneous.

[23] The trial court refused appellants' instruction 25 (N), offered in the language of section 562, subdivision (a) of the Vehicle Code (1935), St.1935, p. 188. There is evidence that the respondent might have been crossing the roadway at a point other than in an unmarked cross-walk.

In this respect Robert E. Curry testified that:

"Q. You are familiar with the place where G Street intersects the west roadway, are you? A. I am.

"Q. With relation to that intersection where were you when you first observed the Blanton boys? A. I was even with the curb of the curb line; the front of my bumper was almost even with the north curb line." A diagram of the car was then placed on the map (indicated C-1). The position of the front end of the car at that place, from the map, would be approximately on the north line of the unmarked cross-walk in question.

Appellant then testified:

"Q. When you reached this point 'C-1,' you say you first saw something abnormal there in the road? A. Well, I saw two boys coming to me from off my left, it couldn't have been more than five or six feet from my left-hand bumper—

"Q. You have indicated, but probably not expressed verbally the direction from which the boys approached you. A. They came, they were coming into my car diagonally from the northwest from me," (about a 45 degree angle).

"Q. Prior to the time you collided with him, he had proceeded on an angle, something like this, towards your automobile (indicating)? A. I don't know what angle he was proceeding; when I saw the boys they were running directly at my left front fender; they were coming more from the north—or as much from the north as they were from the west.

"Q. In other words, you would say about a 45 degree angle? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then he turned off in the opposite direction, at about the same angle, like this (indicating)."

"Q. Can you locate approximately the point, Mr. Curry, where the two collided * * * where the car and the boy came together? A. Well, they were just about even with the front curb—maybe a little bit farther north.

"Q. With respect to the two points indicated as C-1 and C-2, can you indicate about where your car was when you struck the boy? A. I would say just about beyond the curb on the north of 'G' when I hit the boy.

"Q. This is the curb you were talking about and indicating? A. Yes, sir; I was maybe a little bit farther north when I hit the boy." (Which point was outside of the unmarked cross-walk.)

"Q. How far from 'C-1' did you progress before your car was brought to a stop? A. Well, the front end of my bumper was about even with the south curb of G Street on the north" (point C-2). This distance would be approximately 30 feet. Curry testified that "I stopped in about 12 feet" after striking the boy. The place of the accident then, according to this testimony, would be 12 feet back from point C-2, which would be about 18 feet north of the cross-walk in controversy.

From this evidence, together with the inferences that may be drawn from the facts stated, this court cannot say that there was no evidence from which the jury may have been justified in believing that the injured boy was not crossing within the unmarked cross-walk. At the time the car struck the boy, it is most convincingly shown that the boy was not in the unmarked cross-walk.

The instruction in question should have been given. It was material to the issue. Garcia v. Conrad, 40 Cal.App.2d 167, 104 P.2d 527. This was error. However, the court did give an instruction on the subject that "Curry" was bound "under the law to yield the right of way to * * * Blanton, Jr., provided you find that" he "* * * was crossing * * * within the unmarked cross-walk * * *." The only question to determine is whether or not the error was prejudicial under the circumstances. This will be subsequently discussed.

[24] The court refused appellants' instruction No. 10 (O). The evidence produced by appellants indicates that some cars use the east roadway or lane of Euclid Avenue, both northbound and southbound; that a portion of the northbound traffic also uses the east half of the west roadway of Euclid Avenue. Upon cross-examination appellant Curry was interrogated with the apparent effort to establish that the westerly roadway of Euclid Avenue was used exclusively by southbound traffic. The interrogation was directed towards establishing that appellant was driving his automobile at a place where he did not have a right to be. This refused instruction was as follows:

"You are instructed that at the time and place involved in this case, Euclid Avenue consisted of two separate highways; that for the purpose of traveling thereon each highway constituted a complete highway, which could be lawfully used as such, independent of the other highway, and that upon each of said highways, it was lawful to travel in both directions."

The reason why the trial court refused the instruction is not given. Whether an instruction on the subject, proper in form, should have been given depends on the nature of the roadway at the point involved, and whether appellant was lawfully and rightfully on that portion of the highway. Appellant has raised the question and claimed the right to this instruction, but does not fortify the claim by applicable authorities. We are not enlightened on this subject by respondents' brief because they justify the court's refusal to give the instruction, not on the theory that appellant was traveling on the wrong side of the highway, but on the theory that the trial court properly refused the instruction because "there was no dispute" on the trial of the case as to the right of appellant to travel north on that portion of Euclid Avenue where he was traveling, "and in fact the right was conceded" by respondents. If this concession is correct, the instruction should have been given, but using the word "roadway" instead of "highway" where that word appears in the instruction.

In Casalegno v. Leonard, 40 Cal.App.2d 575, 105 P.2d 125, the court used the term "highway" instead of "roadway" in an instruction. It was there held that the misuse of the word "highway" did not mislead the jurors, who were assumed to be of ordinary intelligence.

In Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743, 748, the court said: "There may well have been a misapprehension in the minds of the jury concerning the right of vehicles to use the left-hand portion of a highway. Appellant was entitled to the instruction that he was lawfully and rightfully upon that portion of the highway."

[25, 26] Section 81 of the Vehicle Code [1935], St.1935, p. 98, defines "street" or "highway" as "a way or place of whatever nature open to the use of the public as a matter of right for purposes of vehicular travel." Section 83 of the Vehicle Code [1935] defines a "roadway" as "that portion of a highway improved, designed or ordinarily used for vehicular travel." The terms "street" and "highway" as used in the Vehicle Code are not synonymous with the term "roadway." The term "roadway" covers only that territory improved, designed or ordinarily used for vehicular travel. The term "highway" covers not only that portion used for vehicular travel but also that portion used for parkings, sidewalks and pedestrian travel. § 84, Vehicle Code [1935]; Casalegno v. Leonard, supra; Buchignoni v. DeHaven, 23 Cal.App.2d 76, 80, 72 P.2d 159; Ketchum v. Pattee, 37 Cal.App.2d 122, 98 P.2d 1051; Summers v. Dominguez, 29 Cal.App.2d 308, 84 P.2d 237; Scalf v. Eicher, 11 Cal.App. 2d 44, 53 P.2d 368; Mecchi v. Lyon Van & Storage Co., 38 Cal.App.2d 674, 102 P. 2d 422, 104 P.2d 26. In considering the definitions of the words "highway" and "roadway", as used in these sections, we must bear in mind that when used in the Vehicle Code they are used for the special purposes of that act, and that sections of other codes and the decisions under them relating to the use of the same or similar words can have little bearing on the solution of this problem. Sills v. Forbes, 33 Cal.App.2d 219, 223, 91 P.2d 246; Scalf v. Eicher, supra. In 1931 section 21 of the California Vehicle Act, St.1931, p. 2102, defined a highway as "Every highway, road, * * * laid out or erected as such by the public or dedicated or abandoned to the public, or intended or used by or for the general public, except such portions thereof as are used or prepared for use by pedestrians as sidewalks." There was no definition of a "roadway," as such, nor was there a legal distinction drawn between a highway and a roadway. Section 122 of the California Vehicle Act [1931], St.1931, p. 2124, then provided that "Upon all highways of sufficient width, other than one-way highways, the driver of a vehicle shall drive the same upon the right half of the highway," with certain exceptions. It will be noted that the word "highway" is used rather than the word "roadway." Section 525 of the Vehicle Code [1935], St.1935, p. 181, provides that "upon all roadways of sufficient width a vehicle shall be driven upon the right half of, and as close as practicable to the right-hand curb or edge of, such roadway" [not highway] (Italics ours), with certain exceptions, among them being, "(d) Upon a roadway designated and signposted for one-way traffic."

[27, 28] The record in the instant case indicates that the roadway in question, in the city of Upland, has not been designated by that city under ordinance as, nor signposted for, one-way traffic. The evidence discloses, however, that several blocks south of the place where the accident occurred, in the city of Ontario, this same roadway has been designated and signposted for one-way traffic by an ordinance of that city under section 459, subdivision (e) of the Vehicle Code [1935], St.1935, p. 164. This fact strengthens the argument that this particular roadway here involved would not be considered as a one-way traffic lane until so designated and signposted by the city of Upland under proper ordinance. Section 144 of the Street and Highway Code, Chapter 268, Stats.1939, p. 1520, provides for the dividing and separating of any state highway into separate roadways, and makes it unlawful to drive other than on the right of the central dividing curb or separation. The street or highway under consideration here does not come within the provisions of that act. A highway may consist of two roadways. This court so held in Kienlen v. Holt, 1930, 106 Cal.App. 135, 288 P. 866, 867, where a similar condition of roadways existed. It was there stated: "There are two roadways for vehicular traffic, each 35 feet in width, separated between intersecting streets by a parking 40 feet in width." The case of Driscoll v. Shipp, 1936, 13 Cal.App.2d 591, 57 P.2d 177, involved two roadways along San Vicente Boulevard in Los Angeles. Each roadway was 40 feet wide and was separated by a railway right of way. One of the cars involved in the accident was proceeding west on the southerly roadway of San Vicente Boulevard. No question was raised as to its right to travel on that roadway. Lowenbruck v. Stiglmeier, 1935, 7 Cal.App.2d 204, 46 P.2d 251, involved an accident on Crenshaw Boulevard in Los Angeles. That boulevard runs north and south, having two roadways, each about 59 feet in width. These roadways, at that time, were each used for both north and south travel and were separated by a strip of land 33 feet in width on which street car tracks were laid. Each of the roadways were paved and had a curb on each side. There the plaintiff drove his car south on the westerly roadway of Crenshaw Boulevard. The court gave an instruction to the effect that "* * * in law, there are really two streets which constitute Crenshaw boulevard." The court then, as a part of that same instruction, erroneously defined the intersection. The instruction was disapproved because of the definition of the intersection. Again no contention was advanced that the plaintiff was on the wrong side of the roadway.

The highway described in Cruzen v. Wilcox, 20 Cal.App.2d 728, 67 P.2d 709, is factually similar to the instant case. See, also, Cunningham v. Cox, 126 Cal.App. 685, 15 P.2d 169.

[29] Our attention has not been directed to and we find no provisions of law which would have prevented the appellant from lawfully traveling on the right half of the roadway where his car was admittedly traveling. The appellant was therefore entitled to an instruction to that effect. Raymond v. Hill, supra.

[30] The appellants called Paul V. Snyder, a storekeeper in Upland, California, who testified that on the night of the accident appellant Curry came to his store to make a purchase and upon leaving called attention to the fact that one of the lights on his car was out; that thereupon Curry got into his automobile and changed the beam; that the lights were then satisfactory; that the witness so indicated to appellant who then drove away north on Euclid Avenue. At the previous trial Snyder had been called by the appellants and testified to the same effect. Before the second trial, for some reason, Snyder was subpoenaed by the respondents through a Mr. Kerr. After the witness testified for the appellants, upon cross-examination respondents endeavored to impeach his testimony as follows:

"Q. Did you tell Mr. Kerr at that time, before you came up to this trial to testify for the plaintiff that you would want $25 to come up? A. I told Mr. Kerr that it was worth that much to leave my business and lock it up because I operate it almost single handed, with the exception of a delivery boy.

"Q. Mr. Kerr told you that he would give you the exact mileage provided by law plus $4? A. No, he didn't. Mr. Kerr refused to pay me anything. I presume it was because he knew I was subpoenaed by the other side; and he said he had no authority to make any payment. * * *

"Q. But you demanded $25 of him? A. I didn't demand $25; I told him it was worth that if I closed up my business.

"Q. And you told him you would not do anything unless you got your $25, isn't that correct? A. No, that is not true."

Thereupon the court took up the examination and instead of accepting the witness's testimony that he had not demanded $25 as a fee to appear as a witness for the plaintiffs, assumed the attitude of the attorney for the plaintiff that the witness had demanded $25 as a fee for appearing in court. The court then proceeded to examine the witness upon the assumption that his testimony had been purchased by the appellants as evidenced by the following part of the record:

"By the Court: When you were subpoenaed by the defendants, were you paid a fee? (Objection by Mr. Wilson.)

"The Court: I want to know if this witness is at all partisan. You will answer the question. A. I was not paid fees at the time. I was paid fees before I came on the witness stand.

"Q. Did you demand fees of the process server who served process for the defendants? A. I did, and he told me that he would take care of it under the circumstances that he did at the first trial; due to the fact that I would have extra expense of the store he was glad to take care of that.

"Q. How much have you been paid for coming in here? A. $15 * * *.

"Q. And you wanted $25 from the process server of the plaintiff also? A. No, I didn't ask him for $25, I told him that it would cost me that much to come—the loss of time and business.

"Q. You were attempting to get $25 out of the plaintiff, plus the extent of your extraordinary expenses from the defendant? A. * * * I didn't know how much time would be required, and might have to come one day for one side and one for the other.

"Q. (By the Court): You realize that courts of law are entitled to some consideration, and your duty is to come in and serve the court when you are served with process. (Objection by Mr. Wilson.)

"The Court: Overruled. What I am concerned with is the demand of this witness for compensation considerably beyond the statutory requirement, the statutory fees and the statutory mileage; and the reason I am concerned about that is to determine whether or not this witness is interested, by the fact that he has been paid money by the defendant in excess of that to which he is entitled. A. I didn't know in civil actions that I was forced to comply with subpoenas of that kind; I know that I would in criminal actions.

"Q. You are a citizen, I take it. A. Yes, sir.

"The Court (addressing the jury): Because of the extraordinary character of the examination of this witness, you are not to reach a conclusion prejudicial to the defendant, except insofar as the weight of the testimony of this witness is concerned. This witness's examination as to his compensation was to determine the weight of his testimony, as to whether he was influenced by receiving fees beyond the statutory provision * * *. The only prejudice the defendant can suffer is as to the weight of this witness's testimony. The court made a special inquiry because of the surprise of the court that any man, that any citizen, could think that he had a right to fix his own fee for coming in and testifying in the courts of law. The processes of our courts are mandatory; the functions of government are far more important than the personal rights of any individual and our citizens must respond to the agencies of the government without being bought." (Italics ours.)

"Mr. Wilson: With all due respect and deference to Your Honor, may I now note an exception to the concluding remarks of the court insofar as they may, if they do, reflect on the defendant or the defendants' case now on trial?

"The Court: Very well, you may have an exception."

It is now contended by the appellants that the effect of this examination by the court, regardless of his instructions or his statements, was to leave the jury with the impression that the testimony of the witness had been purchased by the appellants; that the witness had committed some irreparable offense for accepting money from a person who was willing to reimburse him against loss; that regardless of the witness's denial, the court was convinced that he had demanded a witness fee of $25 from the defendants and that no weight should be given to this testimony; that the attitude of the court, as expressed by his words and actions, resulted in a complete rejection of the witness's testimony and a natural discrediting of the appellants' case.

In Anderson v. Mothershead, 19 Cal.App. 2d 97, 100, 64 P.2d 995, 997, where the trial court was charged with prejudicial misconduct, it was stated:

"It would be but natural for the jury to believe that the judge looked with disfavor upon defendant's statements concerning the circumstances of the collision. The error was made worse by the court's remarks which tended to discredit defendant's counsel with the jury. The words of the court in McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300, may appropriately be quoted here: 'From the high and authoritative position of a Judge presiding at a trial before a jury, his influence with them is of vast extent, and he has it in his power by words or actions, or both, to materially prejudice the rights and interests of one or the other of the parties. By words or conduct he may on the one hand support the character or testimony of a witness, or on the other may destroy the same, in the estimation of the jury; and thus his personal and official influence is exerted to the unfair advantage of one of the parties, with a corresponding detriment to the cause of the other." See also, Davis v. Pezel, 131 Cal.App. 46, 50, 20 P.2d 982; Nicholas v. Crosetti, 16 Cal.App.2d 376, 60 P.2d 335; Robbins v. Roques, 128 Cal.App. 1, 8, 16 P. 2d 695.

In Davis v. Pezel, supra [131 Cal.App. 46, 20 P.2d 984], the court said: "We have long known of the excellence of the judge who presided in the court below, and we appreciate the difficulties and annoyances besetting any trial judge. But these considerations must yield to the principle that obtains in this state's courts that the jury must have free rein under the law to determine the facts of the case without intimation thereon from the judge. Whatever loose street criticism is current, it is nevertheless a very fortunate fact that citizens impaneled as jurors look up to and respect the person and opinions of judges presiding. They are quite apt to catch even a slight prejudicial act of the judge and enlarge it into a controlling feature of the case, the most careful and emphatic instructions to the contrary notwithstanding. Some of the comments and actions of the judge presiding in this case could well have impressed the jury with the idea that he had more than a slight leaning toward the plaintiff's side of the case."

Grouping the incidents as reflected from the record, it seems to us that these same remarks would be appropriate here, and the attitude assumed by the trial judge may be similarly summarized.

[31-33] Appellants next contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict and in particular that it established contributory negligence as a matter of law. The jury had the right to determine from the evidence that the injured boy was within an unmarked cross-walk at the time of the accident; that it was the duty of the driver of the approaching car to yield the right of way to him; that the driver of the automobile failed to look; that the lights on his automobile were not lighted; that these acts were acts of negligence and were the proximate cause of the injuries. The evidence in reference to the care taken by the injured boy is conflicting and open to two opposite conclusions, that is, that he was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the cause of his injuries, or that he was not guilty of such contributory negligence. In this connection the jury had the right to take into consideration not only the age of the injured boy but also his capacity for understanding. Todd v. Orcutt, supra. It has been repeatedly held that the question as to the capacity of a particular child at a particular time to exercise care in avoiding a particular danger is one of fact falling within the province of a jury to determine. Mayne v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., supra. It cannot be said that the respondent John Blanton, Jr., was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[34] The last objection presented is that the judgment is excessive. It is contended, under this heading, that the jury accepted the illustration or example given as an indication of the court's attitude as to the extent of the damage incurred by the respondent; that the amount awarded may also be attributed to the influence upon the jury of the court's instructions concerning future damages, which were not limited to those damages reasonably certain to be incurred; that the medical testimony, so far as future damages are concerned, left the matter one of conjecture; that the amount of the verdict was the result of passion and prejudice of the jury as well as the errors committed by the trial court.

The injuries complained of and established by the evidence show that John Blanton, Jr., suffered a linear skull fracture in his left occipital region as revealed by X-rays; that he was rendered unconscious and remained so for about a week; that he subsequently complained of headaches, some disturbance of vision, and some impairment of hearing in his left ear; somewhat run down and loss of weight; that these headaches still persisted at the time of the second trial, almost four years after the accident; that they were then recurring at least four times a week. John Blanton, Jr., testified that his "left ear is awful deaf; I cannot talk over the telephone and listen; I cannot hear well over the telephone; and my eyes bother me quite a bit." He testified that he hears better after his ears are treated but after the treatment they go "back to the deafness awful fast"; that he has "nose bleed awfully at night"; that he does not wear glasses but when he goes to movies he "can't watch them very much"; and that in his school work he did not "get his mind to function" and he didn't learn like he did before the accident.

Although the verdict is quite a substantial amount, considering the injuries, it cannot be said that it is the result of passion and prejudice of the jury and not supported by sufficient evidence. Bowman v. Motor Transit Co., 208 Cal. 652, 284 P. 443; Lahti v. McMenamin, 204 Cal. 415, 268 P. 644.

[35] The question now presented is whether, notwithstanding the errors committed by the trial court in giving the erroneous instructions indicated, and the refusal to give the other instructions indicated, together with the prejudicial conduct noted, considered in connection with the evidence of appellants' negligence and the evidence of respondents' contributory negligence, the judgment can be affirmed under section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution, or whether the proof of negligence of appellants was so unsatisfactory and the question of respondents' contributory negligence so close that the errors in instructions and the prejudicial conduct of the court cannot be disregarded under the above-mentioned provision of the Constitution.

It will be remembered that upon the first trial of this case, on practically the same evidence, but of course without the benefit of full and complete instructions, the jury found for the defendants.

We are convinced that the question of the negligence of the appellants and the question of the contributory negligence of the respondents is so close that, when considered in connection with the erroneous instructions given, particularly instruction lettered (A) in reference to the res ipsa loquitur rule, the giving of the instruction under the circumstances constituted prejudicial error. In this connection the jury may have concluded that the burden of proof shifted to the defendants to establish their freedom from negligence. This erroneous instruction, when considered in connection with the attitude of the trial court in endeavoring to impeach the witness Snyder, produced by the appellants to establish the fact that the lights were burning on his car shortly prior to the accident, was most prejudicial because the trial court indicated, at least by innuendo, that the witness had been bought. This, in connection with other erroneous instructions given and the error of the court in refusing certain instructions, in our opinion deprived the appellants of a fair and impartial trial.

The judgment therefore must be and is reversed and a new trial ordered.

BARNARD, P. J., concurs in the reversal of the judgment.

MARKS, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent:

In order to make my reasons clear for failing to agree with my associates in reversing the judgment, I must enlarge on the statement of facts contained in the foregoing opinion.

The portion of Euclid Avenue here involved is a public street of the city of Upland with two driveways, separated, between intersections, by wide central parkways. It runs north and south and has a total width of 196.2 feet between the exterior edges of the sidewalks which extend along its two sides. These cement sidewalks run along both sides of the avenue and are each five feet in width. Between the sidewalks and the driveways are parking spaces 19.7 feet wide bounded on the street sides by curbs. The easterly driveway of the avenue is 37 feet wide and the westerly is 44.2 feet wide. The central parkways north and south of the G Street intersection are 65.6 feet wide. These parkways are bounded by curbs which return on broad curves at G Street. The returns start at points about opposite the inside of the sidewalks on the two sides of G Street. The intersection is 24 feet wide at its narrowest part which is between the curbs of the central parkways. G Street enters Euclid Avenue at right angles from the east. For the purposes of this opinion it can be stated that G Street dead ends at the west curb line of the west driveway of the avenue.

The evidence in many important particulars is not conflicting. The main conflicts are: (1) Whether John Blanton, Jr., and his brother Virgil were walking or running across the west driveway of Euclid Avenue; (2) the exact point of impact; (3) whether the lights on the car driven by Curry were illuminated.

John and Virgil both testified that they were walking in the unmarked cross-walk across the west driveway, at least until John became conscious of the car almost upon him and tried to get out of its way. Curry testified that he first saw the boys when they were five or six feet from his front bumper; that they were running and approaching from the northwest; that Virgil clung to the side of his car until it came to rest; that John turned and ran to the northeast and was struck in the intersection.

Both John and Virgil traced the course they had pursued in crossing the driveway on a map introduced in evidence. They both testified that they looked for approaching cars, both before and at the time they entered the west driveway and saw none approaching from the south; that they entered the intersection at about the center of the unmarked cross-walk; that they proceeded easterly and did not leave the area of the unmarked cross-walk; that John was struck in or near that unmarked cross-walk when he was about two-thirds or more across the west driveway, that is, in the east half of the west driveway. Curry placed the point of impact further north.

The evidence on the question of the illumination of the lights on the Curry automobile is sharply conflicting.

John Blanton, Jr., testified that after looking for approaching automobiles and seeing none, "we started across, and heard a noise, and it sounded like a motor of a car—I guess that is what it sounded like—and looked south, and there was a car, and I started to get out of the way as fast as I could, and that is all I remember. * * * Virgil was just a step or so behind be, and when I heard this noise of the motor I looked south, and the car was just almost on me, so far as I remember, and I was about like that. (Indicating.)

"Q. You have indicated that as being in a northeasterly direction—in other words, you were engaged in an effort to get by the car—is that right? A. Yes, sir.

"And, as you testified, that is the last thing you remember? A. Yes, sir. Virgil corroborated this evidence.

Ned Duvall, a boy who was out in front of a house about 115 feet north of the intersection, testified that he did not see the collision but heard the impact and saw a form flying through the air "that looked like a bale of hay in the air". * * * I heard the screech of brakes and looked around and saw something going through the air. * * *"

Curry testified that he was driving north on the east half of the west driveway of Euclid Avenue at a speed of "about 20 or 25 miles an hour"; that when his car was in the unmarked cross-walk, "well, I saw two boys coming to me from off my left. It couldn't have been more than five or six feet from my left-hand bumper.

"Q. What did you do then? A. Well, they were running quite fast, and I put my brakes on and of course swerved my car a bit to the right; I didn't have a chance to swerve very far; one boy dodged to his left and jumped in front of my car and jumped up in the air when I hit him, and the other boy jumped on the side of my car and grabbed my seat"; that when he first saw the boys they were approaching him from the northwest at an angle of about forty-five degrees. Curry further testified:

"Q. So you started on up the street, and came to the point of collision, as we understand it, and just at the moment, or just as you hit the boy, or just before, he darted and swerved to his left? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In a northerly direction? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In other words, towards the north? A. Yes, sir." It seems clear from Curry's testimony hereafter quoted that John's course of flight was to the northeast instead of the north.

This evidence, with the other evidence by Curry quoted in the foregoing opinion, is the only evidence in the record to support an inference that the two boys were crossing the driveway outside the unmarked cross-walk. Curry was not asked and did not attempt to locate the position of the two boys when he first saw them, whether they were inside or outside of the unmarked cross-walk. He did locate the position of his car on the map when he first saw the boys and as I view it placed the car well within the unmarked cross-walk and not approximately on its north line. If the markings on the map are reasonably correct the boys were in the cross-walk when he first saw them. I realize the difficulty of attempting to scale a map, such as the one we have before us, where, as here, the witness first marked the position of his car on a map and then an attorney drew broad lines over those marked by the witness. However, Curry saw the boys when they were close to his car. He was not asked whether they were then inside or outside the cross-walk. It must be presumed that his answer to that important question, had it been put to him, would have been against him. It is my opinion that the evidence clearly shows that the boys were crossing in the unmarked cross-walk and were entitled to the protection afforded them by section 560 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 188. (All references to that code will be to it as enacted in 1935.) The most that can be said to the contrary is that the great preponderance of the evidence shows the boys to have been in the cross-walk with very slight, if any, evidence to the contrary.

It may be, and perhaps is true that John left the cross-walk and ran to the northeast when he saw the Curry car almost upon him and was hit outside the cross-walk. He was in a position of great peril and it was a natural thing for him to run in a vain attempt to escape the imminent danger of being run down by the Curry car. No negligence can be predicated on this attempt to escape, especially in view of Curry's testimony that had John "stopped right then, or maintained his course, I would have hit him with my left front fender; as it was, I hit him on the right side of my car."

I must consider the propriety of giving defendants' proposed instruction number 10, refused in the court below, which in effect told the jury that Euclid Avenue consisted of two separate highways, each of which constituted a separate highway, upon each of which it was lawful to travel in both directions.

If I understand the foregoing opinion correctly, it is conceded that this instruction was not a correct statement of the law; that before it could be given as a correct statement of the law, the word "roadway" would have to be substituted for the word "highway" wherever the latter appeared.

This concession that the instruction as proposed was not correct should end the argument concerning any error in refusing to give it. A trial judge is not required to give a proposed instruction which is not correct and no error can be predicated upon a refusal to give such an instruction.

However, the foregoing opinion seems to argue that the instruction should have been modified, and as modified should have been given; that it was prejudicial error to fail to do so. I cannot subscribe to any such holding nor do I agree with the argument made at length to the effect that the driveways between the center parkways and the curbs along the outside parking spaces constituted separate roadways upon each of which vehicles could travel in both directions. Such a holding would make it impossible for drivers so traveling to obey other rules of the road established in the Vehicle Code.

In the Vehicle Code, the terms "street" and "highway" are synonymous. § 81, Vehicle Code.

The term "street" means the land set apart and designated for the use of the public (Earl v. Dutour, 181 Cal. 58, 183 P. 438, 6 A.L.R. 1163), and includes sidewalks. § 84, Vehicle Code; Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 130, 7 P. 442; Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 91, 25 P. 258; Martinovich v. Wooley, 128 Cal. 141, 60 P. 760.

"A sidewalk is a walkway along the margin of a street or other highway, designed and prepared for the use of pedestrians, to the exclusion of road vehicles and horsemen. It may embrace all that portion of a street from the building line to the curbing, including grass plats or park strips between the walk proper and the curbing." 25 Am.Jur., page 343.

I therefore conclude that Euclid Avenue, a public street, includes all that portion of ground between its east and west bounding property lines, regardless of the particular use to which any portion of it is put.

Prior to the adoption of the Vehicle Code, the California Vehicle Act, § 122, required drivers of vehicles to drive upon the right half of the highways. At that time driveways were included within the definition of highways and referred particularly to ways to be used by the public on the grounds of universities, colleges and institutions, § 21, California Vehicle Act, as well as certain private ways. § 22, California Vehicle Act, St.1923, p. 520. There was no statutory distinction made by that act between highways and roadways.

When the Vehicle Code was adopted in 1935, the statutory distinction between highways and driveways was omitted and the term "roadway" was defined as "that portion of a highway improved, designed or ordinarily used for vehicular travel." § 83, Vehicle Code. Based upon this definition my associate argues that the two driveways (used here to denote separated portions of a street used for vehicular travel) were separate and distinct roadways on both of which vehicles could travel in both directions. I cannot agree with this conclusion because a vehicle proceeding south on the west half of the east driveway or north on the east half of the west driveway could not possibly cross an intersection without violating the law. This is demonstrated when we consider the definition of an intersection as applied to this case.

I agree with my associate that there was but one intersection at the point here involved. This conclusion is sustained by the authorities cited. The intersection is bounded on the east by the production of the east curb line of Euclid Avenue across G Street and on the west by the west curb of Euclid Avenue.

This satisfies the definition of an intersection as given in section 86 of the Vehicle Code. All of this intersection is paved and is "improved, designed or ordinarily used for vehicular travel" and so it constitutes a single roadway as defined in section 83 of that code.

Section 525 of the Vehicle Code requires a vehicle to "be driven upon the right half of, and as close as practicable to the right-hand curb or edge of, such roadway," with certain exceptions not important here. Thus as each intersection on Euclid Avenue constitutes but a single roadway, in order to obey the law it is necessary for all vehicles to cross each intersection to the driver's right of the center of the intersection, which is a medial line equally distant from the west curb and the east curb line of the highway produced across intersecting streets. Thus a driver proceeding north on the east half of the west driveway must, to obey the law, cause his car to make a lateral right angle leap of over 32 feet to his right when reaching the south line of the intersection in order to proceed across the intersection on the right half thereof and obey the provisions of section 525 of the Vehicle Code.

No such impossible construction need be given to section 83 of the Vehicle Code if it is remembered that the singular includes the plural for then roadways are those portions of highways improved, designed or ordinarily used for vehicular travel.

While this is true of section 83 of the Vehicle Code it does not entirely clear the further ambiguity created by section 525 of the same code which provides in part as follows: "Upon all roadways of sufficient width a vehicle shall be driven upon the right half of, and as close as practicable to the right-hand curb or edge of, such roadway * * *."

The construction to be given this section is probably responsible for the divergence of opinion in this case. My associate gives the section the literal interpretation of permitting a vehicle to be driven on the right-hand side of a driveway and the left-hand side of the center line of a highway without considering the effect of such a holding on other sections of the Vehicle Code, while I believe the various sections of the code should be construed together and brought into harmony if possible.

In Fresno City H. S. Dist. v. De Caristo, 33 Cal.App.2d 666, 92 P.2d 668, 671, it is said: "It is a cardinal rule of construction that, where possible, every clause and word of a statute should be given effect and meaning. Sec. 1858, Code Civ.Proc.; Smith v. State Board of Control, 215 Cal. 421, 10 P.2d 736; Los Angeles County v. Graves, 210 Cal. 21, 290 P. 444; Crowe v. Boyle, 184 Cal. 117, 193 P. 111; Gill v. Johnson, 103 Cal.App. 234, 284 P. 510; Cory v. Cooper, 117 Cal.App. 495, 4 P.2d 581. It is equally true that in construing the component parts of a legislative act the courts should, where possible, give force and effect to each so that the whole act may have life and vitality. Ahern v. Livermore Union H. S. Dist., 208 Cal. 770, 284 P. 1105; In re Haines, 195 Cal. 605, 234 P. 883; People v. Rabe, 202 Cal. 409, 261 P. 303."

In Re Washer, 200 Cal. 598, 254 P. 951, 954, the Supreme Court said: "We are mindful of the rules of construction which must bind us, which said rules are as follows:

"'Absurd or unjust results will never be ascribed to the Legislature and it will not be presumed to have used inconsistent provisions as to the same subject in the immediate context. The courts will be astute to avoid such results. (Wells Fargo & Co. v. Mayor, etc., of Jersey City, D.C., 207 F. 871.) In the interpretation of statutes courts are not bound by grammatical rules, and may ascertain the meaning of words by the context. Cavender v. Hewitt, 145 Tenn. 471, 239 S.W. 767, 22 A.L.R. 755.

"'"The mere literal construction of a section in a statute ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the Legislature apparent by the statute; and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction it is to be adopted to effectuate that intention. The intent prevails over the letter, and the letter will, if possible, be so read as to conform to the spirit of the act. 'While the intention of the Legislature must be ascertained from the words used to express it, the manifest reason and the obvious purpose of the law should not be sacrificed to a literal interpretation of such words.' Words or clauses may be enlarged or restricted to effectuate the intention or to harmonize them with other expressed provisions. Where general language construed in a broad sense would lead to absurdity it may be restrained. The particular inquiry is not what is the abstract force of the words or what they may comprehend, but in what sense they were intended to be used as they are found in the act." Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction, (2d Ed.) § 376, p. 721.' In re Haines, 195 Cal. 605, 613, 234 P. 883, 886." See, also, Pasqual v. De Vries, 101 Cal.App. 479, 281 P. 1057; Southern Pacific Co. v. Riverside County, 35 Cal.App.2d 380, 95 P.2d 688.

With these rules of construction before me I cannot conclude that the legislature intended to permit drivers to travel both ways on each side of a highway having two driveways such as we have here. To so hold would make lawful driving impossible by a driver proceeding south on his right-hand side of the east driveway or north, as Curry was doing, on his right-hand side of the west driveway. He could not lawfully cross the intersection. I therefore conclude that Curry was driving on the wrong side of the street at the time and place of the accident and in doing so was negligent as a matter of law.

This conclusion does no violence to the language used in the quoted paragraph of section 525 of the Vehicle Code. It merely construes that section as though it read as follows: "Upon all roadways of sufficient width a vehicle shall be driven upon the right half of, and as close as practicable to the right-hand curb or edge of such roadway"—upon which such vehicle may lawfully travel under the provisions of other sections of this code. The emphasized phrase does not change the necessary meaning of the quoted provision but merely adds to it the limitations contained in other sections, which construction is necessary under the rules already quoted. It harmonizes the various provisions of the code pertaining to this subject without doing violence to the language of any instead of producing an impossible condition under which lawful driving is impossible, which construction is unnecessary and should be avoided.

I am unable to understand what possible bearing an ordinance of the city of Ontario declaring the two driveways of Euclid Avenue in that city one-way streets can have on this case as the portion of that avenue involved here is in the city of Upland. The ordinances of one city can have no force or effect in another municipality. Because one city has legislated on a given subject, and another has not, is of no importance.

Nor can I attach any importance to the evidence found in the record that numerous vehicles were driven in both directions on both of the driveways. Proof that others had violated the law cannot excuse a like violation of the law by Curry. Scalf v. Eicher, 11 Cal.App.2d 44, 53 P.2d 368.

The statement in respondents' brief filed in this court to the effect that the right of Curry to drive north on the east half of the west driveway is conceded, should not influence the decision here. That the question was raised in the trial court is evident from the fact that the instruction under consideration was proposed there. Having been raised there it may be considered here.

I have read all of the cases cited in the foregoing opinion on this question, as well as numerous others, and can find nothing in any of them which is in conflict with the conclusions I have reached. Because in some of them the statements of facts show that one of the parties was driving on his right-hand side of the left roadway does not tend to show a holding that such party was lawfully driving in that position when that question was neither raised, presented nor considered in either the trial or the appellate courts.

In the case of Kienlen v. Holt, 106 Cal. App. 135, 288 P. 866, 867, the statement there made that "There are two roadways for vehicular traffic, each 35 feet in width, separated between intersecting streets by a parking 40 feet in width" cannot be construed into a holding that each driveway constituted a complete separate roadway through its entire length and across intersections upon each of which vehicles might be driven in both directions. The accident in that case happened in 1926 and the opinion was filed in 1930. At that time the word "roadway" had no statutory definition given to it in the California Vehicle Act as it now has in the Vehicle Code, adopted in 1935. In that opinion "roadway" was used in the same sense that "driveway" is used here, namely, as descriptive of the separated portion of a street which was used for vehicular travel.

I agree that the res ipsa loquitur instruction should not have been given, one reason being because the evidence did show particularly what the specific acts of negligence were which produced the accident. For that same reason I cannot regard the instruction as prejudicial. The evidence clearly shows Curry guilty of two acts of negligence, namely, (1) in not yielding the right of way to a pedestrian in an unmarked cross-walk, and, (2) in driving on the wrong side of the street. These acts of negligence are sufficient to support the verdict and judgment.

Generally speaking, I agree with much of the balance of the opinion of my associate except the holding that the errors are so prejudicially erroneous as to have caused a miscarriage of justice and require a reversal of the judgment. With this I cannot agree.

The cross-examination of the witness Snyder should not be condoned. However, I do not regard this error so serious as to require a reversal. Snyder's evidence was directed to the sole question of the illumination of the lights on the Curry car. If those lights had been illuminated Curry should have seen the two boys in the unmarked cross-walk and should have yielded the right of way to them. If they were not illuminated, that fact, in itself, constituted negligence. Regardless of the illumination of the lights, Curry stands charged with two acts of negligence established by the evidence, namely, failing to yield the right of way to a pedestrian in an unmarked cross-walk and driving on the wrong side of the street. With these facts established in the record by a great preponderance of the evidence, the judgment is amply supported and I can see no miscarriage of justice. It follows that the mandate of section 4½ of Article VI of the Constitution comes into play and that the judgment should be affirmed.

Under statute providing that if after polling the jury, no disagreement be expressed, the jury's verdict is complete and jury should be discharged, and statute providing that an informal or insufficient verdict in not covering the issues submitted may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court or the jury be sent out again, although the jury has been polled, the court may on appropriate objections resubmit the issue for the purpose of correcting an incomplete verdict, since the court retains control over such proceedings with power to procure correction of an insufficient verdict until the verdict is recorded and the jury finally discharged. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 618, 619.

8. Trial ⇐339(2)

In action against automobile operator and owner for injuries sustained in an automobile accident, where on plaintiff's objection the case was resubmitted to the jury after it had returned an insufficient verdict, and defendant's objection after return of second verdict was directed solely to the entry of any greater judgment against owner and operator than in accordance with jury's arbitrary division of total damages assessed against them, trial court was authorized to resubmit again the cause to the jury in order that their verdict might accord with the statute fixing liability of owner and operator of automobile. Vehicle Code, § 402, St.

Appeals from judgments for the plaintiffs in consolidated actions.

The plaintiffs sued for damages sustained by reason of the conceded negligence of the defendant Berntsen, who was operating an automobile owned by the defendant Enge, when it collided with an automobile in which the three plaintiffs, Sparks, Johnson and Coker, were riding. At the time of the accident Berntsen was operating the automobile with the consent of Enge, but not in the latter's business or employment. The only question on the trial was the amount of damages. The only question on these appeals is whether the trial court entered judgments against each defendant and in favor of each plaintiff in accordance with the jury's verdict and the law of this state.

[1] The court instructed the jury on the limitation of the owner's liability as prescribed by section 402 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 153, as amended St. 1937, p. 2353. That section provides that the owner of a motor vehicle driven by his permission or consent but not in his employment or business is liable for death or injury resulting from negligence in the operation of the vehicle to the extent of not more than $5,000 for death of or injury to one person in one accident and not more than $10,000 for the death of or injury to more than one person in one accident, and not more than $1,000 for damages to the property of others in one accident.

Under the statute the owner is primarily and directly liable jointly with the driver, and the owner's liability is the same as the driver's unless the verdict or judgment is in excess of the prescribed amounts. Broome v. Kern Valley Packing Co., 6 Cal.App.2d 256, 44 P.2d 430; Milburn v. Foster, 8 Cal.App.2d 478, 480, 47 P.2d 1106; Carnes v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 21 Cal.App.2d 568, 572, 69 P.2d 998, 70 P.2d 717.

After the case was submitted to it the jury returned to the court room for further instructions on the question of the liability of the respective defendants. By stipulation the written instructions were taken to the jury room for consideration by the jury in its deliberations. Thereupon the jury returned verdicts in favor of the plaintiffs in all three actions. It assessed the damages in the Sparks case at $8,000 against the defendant Berntsen, the driver, and $3,000 against Enge, the owner; in the Johnson case, at $1,250 against the driver and $845 against the owner; and in the Coker case at $1,250 against the driver and $750 against the owner. The difference between the sums so assessed against the owner in the two latter cases represented the stipulated property damage sustained by the plaintiff Johnson.

At the request of the plaintiffs the jury was polled. The plaintiffs objected to the entry of the verdicts on the ground that they were not in accordance with law and the court's instructions. The plaintiff requested further submission of the issue to the jury. The court referred the cases again to the jury, with appropriate typewritten instructions. During the course of its further deliberations the jury returned to ask the question whether, if it assessed a certain sum against each defendant, the total of such sums was assessed in favor of the plaintiff. The court then instructed the jury to write its verdict in its own way. The jury then returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff Sparks and against both defendants and assessed "damages against the said defendants in the total sum of $11,000.00, of which sum we assess damages against defendant Paul Anker Berntsen in the sum of $8,000.00 and assess damages against defendant Reidar Enge in the sum of $3,000.00." Similarly in the Johnson case it assessed a total of $2,095 against both defendants, dividing it $1,250 against Berntsen and $845 against Enge; and in the Coker case, a total of $2,000 against both defendants, divided $1,250 against Berntsen and $750 against Enge. On motion of the plaintiffs and over the objection of the defendants the court directed the entry of the verdicts as follows: In the Sparks case against the defendants and in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $11,000, limiting the amount recoverable against the defendant Enge to the sum of $5,000; in the Johnson case, against both defendants in the sum of $2,095; and in the Coker case against both defendants in the sum of $2,000. From the judgments so entered the defendants have appealed.

The defendants contend that the trial court erred in sending the cases back to the jury after the jury was polled and that in any event the court could properly enter the verdicts only in the sums assessed against the defendant driver, namely, $8,000, $1,250 and $1,250, and against the owner in accordance with his statutory liability. The defendants rely on King v. Unger, 35 Cal.App.2d 192, 94 P.2d 1040, and the provisions of section 618 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In the case of King v. Unger the jury returned a verdict against defendants driver and owner and assessed damages in the sum of $6,677.16. The case was resubmitted to the jury under instructions to correct its verdict to reflect the owner's statutory liability, whereupon the jury returned a verdict against the defendant driver in the sum of $5,341.71 and against the owner in the sum of $1,335.45. The jury was polled on the final verdict and, over the plaintiff's objection, that verdict was entered and judgment entered accordingly. On appeal the plaintiff indicated his willingness to accept the verdict of $5,341.71 against the driver, and the District Court of Appeal directed entry of judgment against the driver in the sum of $5,341.71, and against the owner, based on his statutory liability, in the sum of $5,000. The District Court of Appeal held, however, that the failure of the trial court properly to guard the rights of the plaintiff in the matter of assessment of damages amounted to a miscarriage of justice and that, except for the agreement of the plaintiff to accept the lesser sum, he would have been entitled to a reversal and a new trial. As was pointed out in the concurring opinion in that case, the jury may not substitute its arbitrary judgment for the fixed statutory liability of the owner.

[2-4] The case relied on involves the converse of the situation here presented. Here the final verdict was in a single total sum against both defendants in each case. No more was required of the jury. In one trial against two or more defendants jointly liable for the same tort, a separate verdict against each defendant is improper. There should be but one verdict for a single sum against all the defendants jointly liable. Marriott v. Williams, 152 Cal. 705, 711, 93 P. 875, 125 Am.St.Rep. 87. Any statutory limitation of liability applicable to any defendant as distinguished from the full liability of other defendants may and should be incorporated in the judgment entered on the verdict. Any limitation of liability of the owner would follow as a matter of law, and that liability the jury could not change. The final verdicts of the jury in the present case needed no interpretation. The arbitrary division of the total damages by the jury was not in accordance with law and was mere surplusage which the trial court refused to effectuate.

[5] The same observation, however, may not be made as to the first verdicts. Those verdicts were similar to the second verdicts returned in the Unger case. In accordance with the holding in that case, if the court in the present cases had entered judgment on the verdicts so returned, parties objecting thereto would have been entitled to a reversal and a new trial. In the Unger case the jury's intent was clearly expressed in its first verdict, and its intent, defeated by the resubmission; while in the present case its intent, which was ambiguous and insufficiently expressed by the first verdicts, was clarified by the resubmission. We conclude that the judgments rendered by the court were in accordance with the verdicts and with law.

There is nothing in the provisions of section 618 of the Code of Civil Procedure which contravenes our conclusion. The pertinent provisions are that after the reading of the verdict either party may require the jury to be polled, and if "no * * * disagreement be expressed, the verdict is complete and the jury discharged from the case." Section 619 provides that when the verdict is announced, if it is informal or insufficient, in not covering the issue submitted, it may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court, or the jury may be again sent out.

[6, 7] The sections should be read together. We can attach no such formality to the polling of a jury as would preclude the exercise of the court's powers under section 619 for the purpose of correcting an incorrect or insufficient verdict. The trial court retains control over such proceedings with power to procure correction of informal or insufficient verdicts until the verdict is recorded and the jury finally discharged. Brown v. Regan, 10 Cal.2d 519, 524, 75 P.2d 1063; Redo Y Cia v. First National Bank, 200 Cal. 161, 166, 252 P. 587. General power to that effect was also recognized in Prager v. Isreal, 15 Cal. 2d 89, 98, 98 P.2d 729, and in Mitchell v. Stringer, 133 Cal.App. 207, 209, 23 P.2d 765. As was said in Vitimin Milling Corp. v. Superior Court, 1 Cal.2d 116, at page 120, 33 P.2d 1016 at page 1018, "In the absence of a verdict entered as required by law, there is no finality to the proceedings."

The duty of the court upon appropriate objection to require the jury to correct its verdict after it had been polled was recognized in Pray v. Trower Lumber Co., 101 Cal.App. 482, at page 491, 281 P. 1036, on authority of section 619 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendants present no case holding that it was too late for the court to order a correction of the insufficient verdict after the jury had been polled thereon.

[8] It is not contended that the objection of the defendants to the entry of the second verdicts was made for the purpose of having the verdicts corrected a second time. Their objection was directed solely to the entry of any greater judgment against the respective defendants than in accordance with the jury's arbitrary division of the total damages assessed against them. In the absence of any proper objection it may be assumed that the trial court, on the return of the first verdicts herein, could have entered judgment against the defendant driver in the sum assessed against him, and against the defendant owner in accord with his statutory liability. But upon appropriate objection it would be the duty of the trial court to refer the verdicts back to the jury as was done in the present case upon the objection of the plaintiffs. Brown v. Regan, supra. A resubmission under somewhat similar circumstances was also approved in Kerrison v. Unger, 135 Cal.App. 607, 611, 27 P.2d 927, and a contention that the first verdict was neither insufficient nor informal was rejected.

The judgments are affirmed.

WARD, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment by the court, sitting without a jury, in favor of defendant in an action to recover from him the sum of $1,050 alleged to be due plaintiff corporation, whose president, as real estate broker, conducted negotiations for the sale of certain real property.

For an understanding of the case, it is necessary to set forth the facts in detail. The property involved is owned by one Robert V. Anderson, a resident of New Jersey; is approximately 800 acres in extent and is situated in San Mateo County. The terms of the agreement for its sale are to be gathered from letters and telegrams exchanged between appellant and its principal, Anderson, and letters and conversations between appellant and respondent.

On May 23, 1939, Mr. Smith, president of appellant corporation, acting for Anderson, sought an interview with defendant and offered to sell him the land for a price of $25,000. This defendant declined, and made a counter offer in writing of $20,000, agreeing also to assume payment of $1,000 as the agent's commission as an additional consideration in the event the sale was consummated. The offer contained as conditions the following: "Title free and clear. No leases. No easements other than existing Rapley and Sumner road easements and P. G. & E. power line. Taxes to be prorated. I to have six weeks to examine title and close." On the same day appellant communicated with Anderson, stating that Neylan offered $20,000 cash, but did not mention that the latter agreed to assume payment of the commission as above. Anderson immediately, May 24th, replied by telegram, declining the offer, and suggested a compromise figure of $21,000 net to him, with $4,000 to be paid immediately to close the bargain. Thereupon, without any further communication with Neylan, appellant informed Anderson that Neylan had raised his offer $1,000 so as to net Anderson $20,000, and received from him, on May 27th, the following telegraphic reply: "Regret conditional offer fails to meet $21,000 minimum agreed with wife." Two days later, May 29th, appellant advised Anderson: "Neylan agrees to meet twenty-one thousand in accordance with telegram May 27th and accepts conditions. Will send deed for signatures. Please wire confirmation." Anderson sent the following reply: "I confirm agreement sale Neylan terms my telegram May 27th." On June 1st appellant advised Neylan of the interchange of telegrams between him and Anderson, and was immediately informed by Neylan in a letter dated June 2nd that he was surprised by the unqualified character of Smith's telegram to Anderson of the 29th regarding the acceptance of conditions, and further stating categorically that he did not propose to pay any deposit prior to the 5th day of July, and that the sale if made would not be predicated upon Anderson's wire of May 27th, but upon his, Neylan's, offer, with the sole modification that he would pay Anderson $21,000 and would adjust the commission matter with appellant. On June 13th, appellant wrote Anderson that it had misunderstood the latter's telegram of May 27th; had thought that Anderson had waived the matter of a payment of $4,000 and had been endeavoring to get Neylan to agree to such a payment but without success.

On June 16th appellant wrote Neylan disclosing for the first time an encumbrance upon the property, involving a quarry on adjoining land with a road easement over the Anderson land. Appellant again wrote Neylan on June 22nd stating that it had advised Anderson of the full details as to how the deal would be closed in accordance with Neylan's offer, and that in the absence of hearing from Anderson it would appear that he was either out of town or acquiescing. Neylan replied on June 26th. He expressed concern about the encumbrance disclosed in the letter of June 16th, pointed out that he had already heard from the title company that it was ready to proceed but was awaiting instructions, and referred to the inadvisability of depending on Anderson's acquiescence through silence.

In a letter dated June 28th, appellant communicated to Neylan the following telegram from Anderson dated the previous day: "Authorize delivery deed to Neylan against payment on or before July fifth of $21,000 to my account American Trust Company, Palo Alto." On the following day, June 29th, Neylan in a conversation with Smith, in which the matter of the encumbrance on the property was discussed, informed the latter that if he would get an option to July 15th and deliver it to him before 5 P. M. of the 30th he would make the deal.

On the same day, June 29th, appellant sent Anderson the following telegram: "Rapley has leased quarry for county and other work. Neylan objects continuous hauling. Had Neylan up there; argued matter there and here and he finally agrees to waive objection if granted before tomorrow night ten day extension to close * * *." To this telegram Anderson immediately replied: "On strength Neylan's contract I refused other offer for property and made commitments relying upon him as man of his word. Will grant ten days' extension but only on condition that four thousand dollars part payment is deposited to my credit at American Trust Company by July fifth * * *." On June 30th appellant informed Anderson by wire that Neylan had accepted the condition—which was untrue—and mailed copy of the telegram to Neylan, who received it on July 3rd. Neylan thereupon, on the same day, wrote appellant in part as follows: "I did not, and do not, agree to deposit any money as a consideration for an extension. The fact is, there was nothing to be extended. I did agree on Friday, June 30th, that I would deposit, on July 5th, $4,000 as a part payment on a total purchase price of $21,000 for the Anderson ranch, if by July 15th the California Pacific Title & Trust Co. will write a policy guaranteeing a clear title, with the exceptions noted in my original offer, plus an exception of the easement in relation to the Johnson quarry on the Rapley property which, prior to July 15th, must be reduced to legal form acceptable to me. * * * On Saturday morning your son read to me escrow instructions sent by you to the title company. One of these instructions was to the effect that I was to deposit on July 5th $4,000 in the American Trust Company to the credit of Professor Anderson. I was very much astonished at this instruction as I never contemplated the rather absurd suggestion that anyone would consider paying money to a seller for property in advance of a report on title. * * * I think this whole matter ought to be reduced to an orderly basis so as to avoid misunderstandings in the future. Therefore, let me outline these steps, which are essential if a deal is to be made: (1) Professor Anderson will deposit with the California Pacific Title & Trust Co. a grant deed acceptable to me, covering all of his holding of ranch land in the area of the Skyline Boulevard in San Mateo County; * * * (3) A definite legal agreement covering the matter of the privilege granted to Johnson operating the quarry on the Rapley property, which shall be in terms agreeable to me, must be deposited with the title company before July 15th; (4) The only other exceptions to clear title shall be those outlined in my original offer; (5) On July 5th, I shall deposit with the [title company] $4,000 to be held by them under instructions covering the entire deal; (6) On or before July 15th, I shall deposit with the [title company] an additional $17,000, being the balance of the purchase price of $21,000 which is to be paid Professor Anderson on July 15th if all conditions are complied with; (7) The matter of commission shall be adjusted between you and myself; (8) The payment of the commission by me, however, shall not be construed as giving you any agency from me, but as additional consideration for the property. To avoid any misunderstanding, I desire a confirmation of the terms herein set forth on the enclosed copy of this letter before five o'clock, Wednesday, July 5th."

On July 5th Neylan filed his instructions with the title company, in accordance with his letter to Smith of July 3rd, together with check for $4,000. On the following day, July 6th, Neylan and Smith had a telephone conversation. Appellant and its principal had failed to comply with Neylan's letter of July 3rd. In the conversation Neylan informed Smith that he was sick and tired of the whole matter; that his money was on deposit; that he was legally committed to Anderson, and demanded compliance of Anderson immediately. Smith asked Neylan to bear with him for a day or two and said he was getting in touch with Anderson immediately, to which Neylan replied: "Yes, wire Anderson immediately, and tell him that I am sick of this thing, and either get it cleared up or I am going to call the deal off."

On July 7th, Neylan wrote the title company suggesting a time for an examination by him of the deed and the hauling privilege, and stating that Mr. Smith had been requested to dispose of the conflict in the instructions.

With reference to the above telephone conversation of Neylan and Smith on July 6th, contrary to Neylan's request Smith did not wire Anderson, but wrote him on the 7th and did not receive a reply until July 11th.

In the meantime, the extension requested having been granted by Anderson only upon the condition, unacceptable to Neylan, that $4,000 should be deposited to the former's credit at his bank—the Anderson instructions to the title company being also to the same effect—Neylan wrote the title company advising that it had been impossible to reconcile the instructions and requesting a return of his deposit—which was done—and on the same day wrote Smith informing him of the course he had taken.

[1] The complaint is in three counts. The first, to which defendant's demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, was based upon an express contract. Appellant's briefs do not discuss the sufficiency of this count against demurrer; hence it will be disregarded. The two counts upon which the action went to trial were common counts. Count two alleged that on or about July 8th defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the amount in dispute for services, work and labor performed by plaintiff as a real estate broker for defendant at his special instance and request. Count three alleged that between May 24, 1939, and July 15, 1939, plaintiff performed services for defendant at his request, as broker, in the purchase of real estate.

The court made findings that plaintiff was not the agent of Neylan, but represented Anderson in negotiations for the purchase of the land; that there was no agreement in writing subscribed by defendant or any agent of his authorizing plaintiff as agent or broker to purchase the Anderson lands for compensation or a commission, but that defendant "did assume and promise in writing to pay the plaintiff's commission as a broker in the event that the defendant's proposed purchase of the Anderson lands was consummated"; that defendant's counter offer was not accepted within the time limits set therein, and that his proposed purchase was never consummated through no fault or wrongful act on his part. The remaining findings are to the effect that plaintiff was not employed to investigate water rights on neighboring lands in San Mateo County.

[2, 3] It is appellant's contention that through telegrams and other communications a contract of purchase and sale came into existence on May 31st, and that appellant at this point had earned its commission by bringing the parties together. This contention is not sound for, as above shown, there had been a misrepresentation or misinterpretation on the part of appellant as to there having been a meeting of the minds of the contracting parties.

As found by the court, Neylan at no time employed appellant as a broker—his employment being by Anderson—and Neylan's promise to pay him the commission was as a further consideration for the conveyance of the land. The land through no fault of the respondent never having been conveyed, the stipulated consideration never became payable, either in whole or in part. Colton v. O'Brien, 217 Cal. 551, 20 P.2d 43. The situation is analogous to that in which the broker agrees to receive his commission out of the purchase price. In that case, if the purchase price for any reason is not paid, there is no fund out of which the commission is payable.

[4] The respondent did not waive his right to rely on the terms of his agreement with Anderson by permitting a continuation of negotiations for its execution after July 5th, the limit of time set for its performance. As shown, Anderson's response to Neylan's request for an extension of time was a renewed demand for the payment of $4,000 to his credit at his bank as part payment of the purchase price; and the filing of vendor's instructions with the title company to that effect was entirely contrary to the agreement previously entered into between the parties in conformance with which Neylan's instructions were filed. The parties had never been able to agree on the steps necessary to be taken to consummate the sale, and this situation was ample justification for Neylan's determination to terminate the matter.

The evidence is ample to support the court's findings, and the judgment rendered. The judgment is affirmed.

Where former owner of land, sold to reclamation district for delinquent interest installments on reclamation district bonds, in accordance with terms of interlocutory decree, quieting title to land in reclamation district subject to right of former owner to redeem land or any portion thereof by payment within specified time of all delinquent assessments and taxes thereon, and within the time specified as extended by subsequent orders of court, exercised right to redeem a particular tract, and there were at the time in the hands of receiver sufficient funds belonging to former owner to effect such redemption, court had no authority to enter final judgment quieting title in reclamation district to all the land, including tract redeemed by former owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Arthur Coats, Judge Assigned.

Action to quiet title to realty by California Gibson, as County Treasurer and as trustee of Reclamation District No. 108, and others against the River Farms Company of California, a corporation, wherein Frederick F. Cooper and others and Mary E. Morris, intervened. From a judgment quieting title in plaintiff, regardless of a provision in interlocutory decree, which in effect quieted title in plaintiff subject to the right of defendant to redeem the land or any portion thereof, by the payment of all delinquent assessments, taxes, interest and penalties thereon within a specified time, defendant appeals.

Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

A. I. Diepenbrock, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, for respondents.

Athearn, Chandler & Farmer and Milton T. Farmer, all of San Francisco, for plaintiffs, interveners and respondents Cooper and others.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for intervener and respondent Morris.

THOMPSON, Acting Presiding Justice.

The defendant, River Farms Company, has appealed from a final judgment quieting title in plaintiff to land in Reclamation District 108, contrary to, and regardless of, a provision in the interlocutory decree in effect quieting title thereto in defendant, subject to the payment of all delinquent assessments, taxes, interest and penalties which were charged against the land or any redeemed portion thereof, within a specified time. The proceeds derived from crops raised on the land in 1938 were awarded to the defendant for the purpose of redeeming any portion of the land. The interlocutory decree specifically reserved jurisdiction to modify its terms at any time prior to the entry of a final judgment. An appeal from that interlocutory decree was perfected. The judgment was affirmed by this court October 29, 1938. Gibson v. River Farms Co., 28 Cal.App.2d 757, 83 P. 2d 966. On account of that appeal, the time for payment by the defendant of delinquent assessments, taxes, interest and penalties was extended from time to time until September 11, 1939. On April 26, 1939, the defendant gave written notice exercising its option to redeem Tract 17A, and to apply thereon the proceeds of sales of crops in the possession of the referee, which on September 19, 1939, exceeded the amount necessary for that purpose, entitling the defendant to a final decree quieting title to said tract in its favor. On motion of the respondent and intervener Morris, a judge of the court in which the action was pending, other than the chancellor who tried the case, rendered a final decree quieting title to all of the land, including Tract 17A, in plaintiff, regardless of the previous extensions of time and in spite of defendant's previous election to redeem Tract 17A in accordance with the terms of the interlocutory decree. The theory upon which the final decree was granted is that the previous extensions of time for performance of the conditions specified in the interlocutory decree constituted an unlawful attempt to materially change substantial terms of a decree over which the chancellor had lost jurisdiction, and that such orders were therefore ineffectual and void. From the last-mentioned final decree the defendant has appealed.

The problem to be determined on this appeal is whether a court of equity has authority to reserve in its interlocutory decree quieting title to real property the right to subsequently extend the time allowed therein for a party to perfect its title by conforming to a specified condition incorporated in the final decree, by the payment of ascertained delinquent assessments, taxes, interest and penalties attached thereto.

The defendant, River Farms Company of California, a corporation, owned 29 tracts of agricultural land in Reclamation District Number 108, consisting of 13,000 acres, subject to a bonded indebtedness of that district. The plaintiff, California Gibson, was a trustee of Reclamation District Number 108. The defendant failed to pay reclamation assessments which were levied against the land in 1931. For failure to pay these assessments the land was sold and conveyed to plaintiff December 29, 1932, pursuant to the provisions of the statute. The district retained possession of the land until 1937. On account of delinquent county taxes, the land was subsequently sold and conveyed to the State of California, July 2, 1937. Thereafter the land was leased by the State of California to the defendant, which reentered, took possession thereof in the fall of the last-mentioned year and farmed the entire tract in 1938. The Trustees of the Reclamation District brought suit against the defendant in 1936, to quiet title. The defendant answered that complaint, setting up the invalidity of the assessments under which the purported sales of property were made to the district. The defendant also affirmatively asked that title thereto be quieted in it. Judge Jones of Lake County, who tried that suit, adopted findings favorable to the defendant, holding that the proceedings preliminary to the sale, including the reclamation assessments, were void and that the sales were invalid. In the exercise of its equitable authority, the chancellor rendered an interlocutory decree vesting title to the land in plaintiff, "subject, however, to defeasance" thereof by defendant's payment of the delinquent assessments, taxes, interest and penalties on or before November 25, 1938. In effect, this constituted a decree quieting title to the several tracts of land in the defendant, conditioned upon its payment of all the assessments and tax obligations existing against the land, before the specified date. The decree then awarded to the defendant "the net proceeds of the 1938 crop (including pasturage) grown upon all the parcels of land described in said Exhibit 'A', which is received by said receiver," for the purpose of fulfilling the conditions and accomplishing the defeasance. The decree authorized the defendant to redeem or perfect its title to all or to any one of said 29 tracts of land, and to apply the proceeds from the sales of crops produced in 1938 on the entire property, to the redemption of any one selected tract, if so desired. A receiver was appointed. The above-mentioned proceeds of sales were paid to and retained by the receiver. Jurisdiction to modify the decree in any authorized manner was reserved by the following language: "This court retains continuing jurisdiction of this suit and of the interlocutory decree entered herein until the entry of final judgment herein."

Upon motion, and on due notice of hearings thereof, the trial judge made five successive orders extending the time within which the defendant was authorized to pay said assessments, taxes, interest and penalties and to reclaim the property, the last one of which designated September 11, 1939, as the final date therefor. On that date the total amount of delinquent assessments, taxes, costs and penalties necessary to redeem or perfect title in the defendant to Tract 17A of the land in question was $63,886.93. It appears there was then net cash in the hands of the receiver, belonging to the defendant for the purpose of clearing its title to the whole or to any one tract of said land, the aggregate sum of $66,253.65 which included the sum of $6,157.51, earned in connection with said lands as federal soil conservation benefits, which had then been paid to the receiver.

April 26, 1939, the defendant served upon the trustees of the reclamation district and upon the receiver a written notice exercising its right to claim and to redeem Tract 17A by payment of all designated charges against it, by application of its funds in the hands of the receiver. This notice of election to redeem Tract 17A was served upon all interested parties and the necessary proceeds were demanded six and a half months before the expiration of the time fixed therefor by the last order of the court. Prior to the expiration of the time for redemption, the referee's account was filed for settlement, showing there was a sum of money in his hands on September 11, 1939, available for the foregoing purpose which, added to the soil conservation benefits fund, which was subsequently paid, amounted to $66,926.77. That account was first disallowed because the referee neglected to take into account the proceeds of sales of crops produced from Tract 17A in the year 1939. The account was, however, settled subsequent to September 11, 1939, which was the final date set for completing title to defendant's Tract 17A, by payment of the assessments and taxes imposed thereon. However, the defendant had previously elected to do so. March 20, 1940, in spite of the formal extensions of time, and, regardless of the written notice of election to redeem Tract 17A of the land, the respondent and intervener Morris presented to the judge of the superior court in which the action was pending, other than the chancellor who tried the case, an application for final decree, which was granted, quieting title in plaintiff to all of the land, including Tract 17A. The theory upon which this final decree was granted was that the several extensions of time to perfect defendant's title to all or any portion of the land in question constituted an unlawful attempt to change substantial terms of an interlocutory decree, over which the court had lost jurisdiction.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion the extensions of time for the defendant to perfect its title to land involved in that suit were lawfully authorized as a just prerogative of a court of equity. These orders did not have the effect of changing substantial terms of the interlocutory decree. They merely extended the time for enabling the defendant to follow the procedure prescribed by the decree to secure the title and to apply funds belonging to defendant in satisfaction of delinquent assessments and taxes so as to redeem the land and to save it from forfeiture. The extensions were in the interest of equity which abhors forfeitures. In the former appeal from the interlocutory decree it was definitely determined that the sales of the land for delinquent assessments and taxes, upon which the plaintiff relies for title, were void. In spite of that fact, title was quieted in plaintiff, with the privilege of defendant's redeeming or defeating that tentative title by paying in full all delinquent assessments, taxes, interest and penalties against the whole or any selected portion thereof on or before the designated date. It was certainly just and equitable for the court to award to the defendant the net proceeds of sales of the crops which were produced from the lands by defendant's efforts and at its expense in the year 1938. It was also equitable that, since the redemption of the property was necessarily suspended for nearly a year before the first appeal was finally determined, and since the proceeds of the sales of crops in 1938 were held by the referee in the custody of the court, and not finally settled until the latter part of 1939, the court should extend the time for the exercising of defendant's option to redeem the property, or any portion thereof, so as to prevent forfeiture of title thereto. The defendant was thereby enabled to save one small tract of land. The plaintiff, nevertheless, secured title to the remaining portion of the entire property, consisting of 13,000 acres, in spite of the fact that the former appeal determined that the conveyances to plaintiff were void on account of irregularities which occurred in the foreclosure proceedings.

[3, 4] It is true that the material determinations of an interlocutory decree may constitute a final judgment with respect thereto, which may not ordinarily be modified or changed. But there is a clear distinction between material adjudicated portions of a judgment or decree, and mere procedural matters incident to the determined issues, which are incorporated as the proposed means of fulfilling the judgment, such as the granting of a limited period of time within which payments of alimony, delinquent taxes or deferred purchase money may be made. It has been held in California that when a decree or judgment reserves jurisdiction, as it did in the interlocutory decree which is involved on this appeal, to change or modify mere procedural provisions, as distinguished from material adjudications of substantial issues, it is not an abuse of discretion for the chancellor to extend the time limit, in accord with equity, to enable the party thereto to fulfill the specified terms of the judgment or decree. Leslie v. Federal Finance Co., Inc., 14 Cal.2d 73, 81, 92 P.2d 906; Los Angeles A. T. Co. v. Superior Court, 94 Cal.App. 433, 271 P. 363; Tyler v. Shea, 4 N.D. 377, 61 N.W. 468, 50 Am.St.Rep. 660; 15 R.C.L. 678, sec. 129; 34 C.J. 232, secs. 451, 452.

In the Los Angeles A. T. Co. case [94 Cal.App. 433, 271 P. 364], first cited, a court of equity rendered an interlocutory decree determining that plaintiff's title to certain land would be quieted "unless within 30 days after entry of the interlocutory judgment the company paid to a 'trustee,' appointed and named in the decree, and for the plaintiff, the sum of $15,500 and interest, and certain sums expended by plaintiff for taxes," in which case the defendant would be relieved from the forfeiture, and title would thereupon be quieted in defendant. The money was not paid within that limited time. On application, the time for making the designated payment was extended five successive times. It was held these orders did not constitute a material change in substantial adjudicated portions of the judgment. On the contrary, it was held those extensions of time merely applied to procedural matters intended to accomplish the enforcement of the judgment, and that the orders constituted a valid exercise of jurisdiction retained by the court. That case appears to be determinative of the issue on appeal in the present action.

The Leslie case, supra, approves the principle determined in the last-mentioned case by special reference thereto. Quoting with approval from that case, the court says at page 81 of the Leslie opinion [14 Cal.2d 81, 92 P.2d 910]:

"Under the authorities cited, the superior court had the right to relieve against the forfeiture of this sum. * * * No payment was made within the time limited and plaintiff moved for final judgment. The motion was denied on a showing that defendant would be able to comply within a short time. Thereafter the court granted numerous extensions of time. * * *

" 'The power of a chancery court to supervise the execution of its orders, and even to modify them in ways affecting only the details of their performance, has long been recognized. "There are some cases of decrees which, although they are final in their nature, require the confirmation of a further order of the court, before they can be acted upon. In cases of decrees of foreclosure, the court will, upon application, enlarge the time for payment of the money, even though the final order has been enrolled." Daniell's Chancery Practice, 6th Am.Ed. pp. 991–993. We find nothing in our statute or decisions which can be said to have been intended to limit the power of the superior court in a suit in equity to grant relief properly adjusted to the equitable rights of the parties as determined by the court, and to control the parties in all matters connected with their required obedience to the orders embodied in the decree.'"

[5] In support of the text found in 34 C.J., page 235, sec. 452, that "Directions [in a decree] with respect to carrying a judgment into effect, but which do not change or modify the judgment with respect to matters put in issue and determined by the judgment, may be inserted or modified by amendment," the note under citation 95b, quoting from the Tyler case, supra, has this to say regarding the right of the court to extend time for payment of money to perfect title to land:

"The court has power to make an order extending the time within which, by the terms of a judgment for specific performance, a defendant is required to pay purchase money and accept title to land. Adams v. Ash, 46 Hun., N.Y., 105.

"Where a time is prescribed within which money must be paid to entitle a party to the benefit of the judgment, the court may, even after such time has expired, extend it by a modification of the judgment in furtherance of justice."

[6] We conclude that the foregoing authorities support the principle that a court of equity has power and jurisdiction to extend the time specified in an interlocutory decree quieting title to land within which payment of delinquent assessments and taxes shall be made. That is exactly what the court did in the present case. Sufficient money belonging to the defendant was in the hands of the receiver, subject to order of the court, with which to fulfill the judgment in that regard, before the defendant exercised its option under the order extending the time therefor, and elected, in writing to redeem Tract 17A of the land in question, entitling it to a final decree quieting title to that particular tract of land. The orders extending time were not subsequently modified or set aside. They remained in full force until after the option was exercised. It follows that the court was not authorized to disregard those orders and to render a final judgment defeating defendant's adjudicated rights, or to quiet title to Tract 17A in plaintiff regardless of equity and the express terms of the interlocutory decree as properly modified.

The judgment is modified and the trial court is directed to quiet title to Tract 17A of the land involved on this appeal in the appellant, River Farms Company of California (a corporation), subject to all assessment calls of assessment number five of Reclamation District No. 108, commencing with that of October 1, 1939. As so modified the judgment is affirmed. The appellant may recover its costs. It is so ordered.

In prosecution for willful failure to provide for minor children, error, if any, in trial court's refusal to admit testimony to show receipt by defendant's wife of monthly check for services of minor son during part of period covered by the information was not prejudicial, where, even if defendant had been credited with an additional contribution by reason of such receipt, evidence would still have been sufficient to sup-

In determining whether justice's court of San Rafael township was a class A justice's court on January 31, 1941, so as to have jurisdiction of a prosecution for willful failure to provide for minor children, population of township would be deemed to be population as shown by the census of 1930, and not as shown by the census of 1940, where the results of the 1940 census were not announced until after date of filing the information. In prosecution for willful failure to provide for minor children, failure of superior court clerk's entry of judgment to show that defendant's failure to provide for his children was "willful" and "without lawful excuse" did not render judgment void, where such elements were charged in the information, and there was a verdict of guilty which constituted an adjudication that the offense was willful and without lawful excuse. Rellis Q. Dorius was convicted of willful failure to provide for minor children, and he appeals.

David B. Fyfe, of San Rafael, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Dennis Hession, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice.

Defendant was charged by information with wilful failure to provide without lawful excuse for his two minor children. Penal Code, sec. 270. He was found guilty upon a trial by jury. His motion for a new trial and his motion in arrest of judgment were denied. He was sentenced to the county jail for thirty days, execution of said sentence was suspended and probation was granted. Defendant appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the order denying his motion in arrest of judgment.

[1] Defendant first contends that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict but we find no merit in this contention. The information charged that on or about December 31, 1940, and for more than six months prior thereto, defendant did wilfully and without lawful excuse fail to provide his two minor children with necessary food, shelter, clothing, medical attendance and other remedial care. It appeared from the evidence that defendant was a journeyman painter who was capable of earning and did earn good wages during said period except at the times that he failed to obtain or retain employment by reason of his excessive use of intoxicating liquor. He was nevertheless employed during the greater portion of said period. Defendant took the stand and testified from recollection regarding the amount of his earnings and the amounts turned over to his wife for the support of the family. This testimony appears to have been rather indefinite and unsatisfactory but it did definitely show that defendant averaged over $160 per month in earnings for at least three months of the period covered by the information. His wife testified that she had no record of the money turned over to her but that it was about $45 per month, not over $50. She further testified that the money turned over to her was never sufficient to pay the rent and other necessary household expenses, all of which she was expected to pay therefrom; that in December, 1940, there was a large accrued indebtedness for rent, utilities and food; that the electricity had been disconnected on two occasions for nonpayment of the electricity bill; that the credit of the family with the dairy company has been discontinued for nonpayment of that company's bill; that on two occasions she had been compelled to borrow money for necessaries as she was unable to procure it from defendant; and that the minor son had left home because conditions were intolerable and said son had joined the Civilian Conservation Corps. Defendant himself conceded that "Sometimes we might be short of food a day or two certain times."

We deem it unnecessary to summarize further the evidence. A reading of the record shows that the jury could properly conclude from the evidence that defendant did not diligently seek employment and perform the services which he was able to perform in order to provide for the family; that he used a considerable portion of his actual earnings for the purchase of intoxicating liquor; and that he wilfully failed without lawful excuse to provide his minor children with the necessaries of life in violation of said section 270 of the Penal Code.

[2] Defendant further contends that the trial court erred in refusing to admit testimony to show that his wife received a check in the sum of $22.50 each month for the services of the minor son after said son had joined the Civilian Conservation Corps. Defendant states that he and his wife were equally entitled to said earnings of said minor son (Civil Code, section 197) and that defendant was entitled to have one-half of each check or $11.25 applied to the support of the minor daughter who was the only minor child then needing support from him. Assuming, without deciding, that error was committed in excluding said testimony, we do not believe that such error was prejudicial to defendant. The information covered a period of time prior to as well as after the entry of said son into the Civilian Conservation Corps, and furthermore, even if said evidence had been admitted and defendant had been credited with an additional contribution of $11.25 per month for each month after said minor son left home, the evidence would still have been sufficient to show a violation by defendant of said section 270.

Defendant further contends that the trial court was without jurisdiction of the offense charged. It is claimed that the justice's court of San Rafael Township was a Class A justice's court (Code of Civil Procedure, section 81) at the time of the filing of the information herein and that said justice's court, rather than the superior court, had jurisdiction of the offense charged. (Penal Code, section 1425.) The consideration of this contention requires the statement of further facts.

At the time of the filing of the information, the 1930 census was the last published census and it showed that San Rafael Township had a population of less than 30,000. The justice's court of that township was therefore acting at that time as a Class B justice's court. Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 81. Concededly, Class B justice's courts did not have jurisdiction over the offense charged but Class A justices' courts did have such jurisdiction. Penal Code, sec. 1425. In 1940, a new census was taken but the results thereof were not announced until February 18, 1941. The information herein had been previously filed in the superior court on January 31, 1941, and the trial was concluded on February 26, 1941. When the results of the 1940 census were announced on February 18, 1941, it appeared that the population of San Rafael Township on April 1, 1940, was 30,111. Upon learning the results of the 1940 census showing that San Rafael Township then had a population which was slightly in excess of 30,000, defendant urged these facts in support of his motion in arrest of judgment which motion was denied.

Defendant cites and relies upon Los Angeles County v. Justice's Court, 208 Cal. 429, 281 P. 611; People v. Tossetti, 107 Cal. App. 7, 289 P. 881; and People v. Wong Wang, 92 Cal. 277, 28 P. 270, to support his contention that it is the fact of population which is determinative of the question of jurisdiction of the justices' courts. These cases were all decided, however, prior to the 1933 amendment and later amendments to section 81 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said cases illustrate the perplexing jurisdictional problems which were presented to the courts prior to the amendment of said section and it appears that the amendments to said section were adopted for the purpose of making it possible to determine definitely the question of jurisdiction at any given time.

[3, 4] Said section 81 of the Code of Civil Procedure now reads in part "For the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of any justice's court therein, the population of a judicial township shall be deemed to be above or below 30,000 either as may have been found to be the fact in any proceeding in mandamus brought in a court having jurisdiction thereof, or as shown by the last preceding census taken under the direction of the Congress of the United States, whichever may be later." It is conceded that the population of San Rafael Township has never been determined in any proceeding in mandamus.

It will be noted that the words "shown by" are the words employed in said section with reference to the census. These words necessarily refer to a census which has been officially announced so that the figures may be definitely ascertained and may be the subject of judicial notice. Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 1875, subd. 3. The words "shown by" could not possibly refer to a census which has been taken but the results of which have not been officially announced. We are therefore of the view that for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of the justice's court of San Rafael Township on January 31, 1941, the population of said township was deemed to be the population as then shown by the census of 1930 and not the population as subsequently shown by the census of 1940. Said justice's court therefore did not have jurisdiction of the offense and the information was properly filed on January 31, 1941, in the superior court, which last mentioned court continued to have jurisdiction for the purpose of hearing and disposing of the cause. 22 C.J.S., Criminal Law, § 165, p. 261.

[5, 6] The final contention of defendant is that the "judgment is void for the reason that it fails to show that appellant's failure to provide for his children was wilful and without lawful excuse." Defendant cites and relies upon In re Cowan, 137 Cal.App. 209, 30 P.2d 443 and In re Mize, 11 Cal.2d 22, 77 P.2d 472. There is language in the Cowan case which tends to support defendant's contention but that case is distinguished in the Mize case. In re Mize, supra, 11 Cal.2d page 27, 77 P.2d 472. Furthermore, both cases involved petitioners who had been convicted in the justices' courts. In the case before us the defendant was charged by information in the superior court. The allegations of the information were full and complete including the allegations that defendant failed to provide for his minor children "wilfully" and "without lawful excuse." Defendant was tried by a jury which rendered a verdict of "Guilty." This was a sufficient verdict as it "imports a conviction * * * of the offense charged." Penal Code, sec. 1151. Judgment was thereafter rendered upon said verdict.

But defendant calls attention to section 1207 of the Penal Code which reads "When judgment upon a conviction is rendered, the clerk must enter the same in the minutes, stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had, and the fact of a prior conviction, if any." Here the clerk's entry in the minutes, before setting forth the sentence imposed, merely recited that "Whereas, the said Rellis Q. Dorius having been found guilty in the court of misdemeanor to wit: Failure to Provide for Minor Children:" It did not recite that defendant had been convicted of failing to provide for his minor children "wilfully" or "without lawful excuse" or that he had been convicted of a violation of section 270 of the Penal Code. It is a sufficient answer to defendant's contention to point out that the verdict of the jury here "constituted an adjudication that the offense was wilful and without lawful excuse" which was ground of distinction pointed out in In re Mize, supra, 11 Cal.2d at page 27, 77 P.2d 472. It was there said on page 26, of 11 Cal.2d on page 475 of 77 P.2d, in discussing said section 1207, that if a defendant felt prejudiced by an omission from the clerk's entry in a superior court action, "his remedy would be to secure a correction of the entry to state the offense of which he had been convicted by verdict of the jury or finding of the court entered in the minutes. The clerk's record may be amended to speak the truth."

The order denying the motion for a new trial and order denying the motion in arrest of judgment are affirmed.

KNIGHT, Justice.

[1] Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered in favor of defendants after trial on the merits, and the appeal is presented on a bill of exceptions; but plaintiff has not complied with the mandatory provisions of section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure which require an appellant on an appeal from a final judgment to furnish the reviewing court with a copy of the judgment roll. Consequently, it is impossible to ascertain from the transcript, or for that matter from either of the briefs filed by the respective parties, the nature of the action, the relief sought, the defenses interposed, the issues tried and determined, or the form of the judgment rendered. Under well-settled rules an appeal may properly be dismissed by the court of its own motion if the record fails to comply with legal requirements; however, consideration has been given to the points urged by plaintiff in support of the appeal, and it is apparent that no finding of error can be based thereon.

[2] The evidence set forth in the bill of exceptions consists of the testimony given by the plaintiff and one of the defendants; also several documentary exhibits introduced by them; and the facts to be gleaned therefrom may be stated as follows: Joe E. Johnson and his wife, Zula Joyce Johnson, were the owners and holders of a trust deed dated December 30, 1936, covering real property belonging to the plaintiff Don Theodore Stoops, and given to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date therewith for the sum of $1,550. On April 15, 1937, the defendant Ernest R. Van Houten acquired said trust deed and note by transfer and assignment from the Johnsons as part payment in a real estate transaction which took place between the Johnsons and Van Houten. Some time thereafter, the date not appearing in the record, Stoops brought the present action against the Johnsons and Ernest R. and Doris K. Van Houten, presumably to quiet title to the property, claiming according to Stoops' testimony, that the Johnsons had given him an agreement to the effect that he was to pay them only $500, and that he, Stoops, had told Van Houten about the agreement before the latter acquired the trust deed and note. The agreement was never recorded, and while the bill of exceptions recites that it was introduced in evidence, no portion of its contents is set forth in the record, in substance or otherwise; nor is there anything in the record showing when it was made. Stoops claimed also in his testimony that he had tendered Mrs. Johnson $250, which she refused to accept, and that thereafter his attorney sent a letter to the Johnsons tendering $194 and informing them "that a promissory note was executed in their favor." But there is nothing in the record showing when these asserted tenders were made, whether before or after Van Houten acquired the trust deed and note, or whether before or after the commencement of the present action.

Van Houten denied having any knowledge whatever of the existence of said agreement prior to or at the time of the transfer to him of the trust deed and note. In this respect he testified that the Johnsons had never mentioned the agreement to him, and that he met Stoops for the first time on April 17, 1937, which it will be noted was two days after the trust deed and note had been transferred to him. He testified that on that date he called on Stoops to notify him that he was then the owner of the trust deed and note and that all future payments should be made to him; also to inquire whether Stoops had paid the taxes on the property; that upon being so notified, Stoops became "very angry" and declared he would not pay Van Houten anything; that he "had nothing to do with him"; and that Stoops then went on to say that the Johnsons had made an agreement with him "to take $500 for the trust deed." Continuing Van Houten testified that he told Stoops he knew nothing of the existence of such an agreement; that he "did not want to get into any trouble" over the matter, and that although the transaction with the Johnsons had been closed he would see if it could be undone; and his testimony shows that he took steps to that end, but his efforts were unsuccessful. The Johnsons were not called as witnesses by either side.

The evidence further shows that there was a second conversation between Stoops and Van Houten which took place in the tax collector's office, but again there is a direct conflict as to whether it occurred before or after the date of the transfer of the trust deed and note to Van Houten. Therefore, in view of the trial court's judgment in favor of defendants, it must be taken as true as testified by Van Houten that both conversations took place after he had acquired the trust deed and note.

With respect to the findings, the bill of exceptions recites merely that the court found that Stoops "did not pay or tender to" the Johnsons $250 nor deliver to them his promissory note for that amount; also that there was a finding "to the effect" that the trust deed was a lien for the sum of $1,550 on the property. No other findings are mentioned; and as to the judgment the bill recites only that it was therein decreed that the Van Houtens were "the owners and holders in due course and for a valid consideration of the first trust deed mentioned in their answer"; also that the agreement entered into between plaintiff and the Johnsons "was not a valid and subsisting lien upon the property * * * and was of no force and effect."

The first point made by plaintiff in his brief is that contrary to the trial court's finding the uncontradicted testimony shows that plaintiff "made an actual tender of money and an actual tender upon a promissory note pursuant to his agreement" with the Johnsons. Obviously, however, to be binding on Van Houten it was essential to establish either that the tender was made prior to the transfer of the trust deed and note to Van Houten, or that the latter acquired the trust deed and note with knowledge of the existence of the agreement. With respect to the latter, as already pointed out, there is an implied finding based on conflicting evidence that Van Houten had no such knowledge; and as to the former, no portion of the agreement is set out in the record; hence there is nothing to show that any tender was ever made in conformity with the terms thereof, or if so, then there is an entire absence of evidence showing when it was made. For aught that appears in the record the tender may have been made after the commencement of the action.

[3] Plaintiff's second point is that "the evidence is * * * uncontradicted to the effect that there was $1,200 balance due on the trust deed and despite this fact, the court made findings to the fact that there was $1,550 due on the trust deed." Just what, if anything, the trial court decreed in this respect does not appear in the record because of the absence of a copy of the judgment, and the only reference made thereto in the bill of exceptions is the finding already mentioned "to the effect that the trust deed was a lien for the sum of $1,550 on the property"; and there is evidence to support such finding. In this connection Van Houten testified that he "was the owner and holder of a promissory note in the principal sum of $1,550 * * * secured by a trust deed on the property described in the complaint, in the same amount," and that the Johnsons had transformed said trust deed and note "to him in payment of $1,200 due him under an agreement they had with him for his parking lot. * * *" True, plaintiff testified that during the first conversation between him and Van Houten the latter told him he "understood that there was $1,200 due on the trust deed"; but apparently the trial court declined to accept as true that portion of plaintiff's testimony, as it did the remainder of his version of the conversation. In any event, if before Van Houten acquired the trust deed and note the amount due thereon had been reduced to $1,200, plaintiff certainly would have known thereof and he gave no testimony to that effect.

Plaintiff calls attention to the fact that the Johnsons did not testify, and in this connection he devotes the last two and a half pages of the four-page printed brief he filed in support of the appeal to quoting excerpts from decisions embodying restatements of the disputable presumption declared by subdivision 5 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "That evidence willfully suppressed would be adverse if produced." Wherein plaintiff claims those decisions are here pertinent is not made clear, for nowhere in the record is there anything to justify even a suspicion of suppression of evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILSON v. GREY et ux.

Civ. 11265.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 21, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 20, 1942.

1. Payment ⇐73(1)

In action to set aside a conveyance from husband to wife as in fraud of a creditor and to subject property to satisfaction of a judgment based on money loaned to defendant husband for use in conducting a dog coursing track, evidence was insufficient to support a finding that receipt by plaintiff of stock in corporation organized for purpose of operating the track, pursuant to an agreement among creditors of defendant husband, but to which neither defendant husband nor defendant wife was a party, constituted "payment" of the indebtedness, where it appeared that agreement provided that debts were to be paid from profits derived after issuance of the stock.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Payment".

2. Estoppel ⇐114

Although ordinarily estoppel must be pleaded, where it is relied upon by plaintiff to meet new matter affirmatively pleaded in the answer, introduction of evidence of estoppel to meet the new matter is permitted under statute. Code Civ.Proc. § 462.

3. Husband and wife ⇐129(4)

Evidence that deed was delivered to defendant wife by defendant husband on November 8, 1920, but was not recorded until July 3, 1933, and that plaintiff extended credit to defendant husband in reliance on ownership of the property prior to recording of deed by defendant wife, if established, would operate to "estop" both defendant husband and wife from asserting the transfer of the property to defendant wife prior to time money was advanced by plaintiff.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estop".

4. Husband and wife ⇐129(4)

Where a wife permits her husband to hold record title to her realty, the general rule is that she is "estopped" to assert her title thereto as against one extending credit to husband in reliance on such ownership.

5. Estoppel ⇐52

The doctrine of "estoppel" does not require a showing of some actual turpitude on part of one against whom estoppel is asserted, but rather all that is meant in the expression that an estoppel must possess an element of fraud is that the case must be one in which the circumstances and conduct would render it a fraud for the party to deny what he had previously induced or suffered another to believe and take action upon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; Robert R. Syer, Judge.

Action by Blanche Wilson against Arthur L. Grey and wife, to set aside a conveyance from defendant husband to defendant wife as in fraud of a creditor and to subject the property to the satisfaction of a judgment. From a judgment for defendants, the plaintiff appeals.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment refusing to set aside a conveyance from defendant Arthur L. Grey to defendant Hazel A. Grey, his wife, and to subject such property to the satisfaction of a judgment theretofore recovered against defendant Arthur L. Grey.

The complaint alleged the recovery of the judgment in the sum of $5000, the failure to satisfy it except to the extent of $56.18, and that after the indebtedness was incurred the defendant Arthur L. Grey on or about July 3, 1933, had conveyed the property to his wife without consideration and for the purpose of preventing the satisfaction of the judgment. The answer pleaded as affirmative defenses: 1. That plaintiff had been paid by the receipt of certain stock in a corporation; and 2. that the property in question was conveyed to defendant wife on November 8, 1920.

[1] Upon this appeal respondents do not in their brief urge the defense of payment although the trial court found in their favor on that issue. The agreement relied on does not support the finding of payment. The money was lent by plaintiff for use in the conduct of a dog coursing track. After the original project failed certain creditors entered into a contract with the owner of the land upon which the track was located, whereby a corporation was to be formed to operate the track, and the signatories were to receive equal amounts of stock in the proposed corporation. Defendants were not parties to this agreement. It was provided in this agreement that the profits to be derived from the venture should be applied after certain pressing claims were first met, 50% to the payment of liens against the property, and 50% to the creditors joining in the agreement, including plaintiff, "until their full amount * * * has been paid." It is clear that the parties did not agree that the issuance of the stock in the proposed corporation should constitute payment of their debts. They were later to be paid from profits, and it is not claimed or found that they were paid from profits or indeed that there ever were any profits from the venture.

At the trial, after it developed from the evidence that the deed was delivered to defendant wife on November 8, 1920 as affirmatively pleaded in the answer although not recorded until July 3, 1933, the plaintiff introduced evidence that prior to making the loan to defendant husband which resulted in the $5000 judgment against him, defendant Arthur L. Grey had informed plaintiff that he owned real property, and that plaintiff had caused an investigation to be made and after learning that the property involved in this action stood of record in his name, and relying on that fact, she had advanced the $5000. To this evidence defendants objected on the ground that it was outside the issues, no estoppel having been pleaded in the complaint. The court received the evidence but failed to make any finding on the subject and of this failure appellant now complains.

[2] While ordinarily estoppel must be pleaded this is subject to the settled exception that where it is relied upon by a plaintiff to meet new matter affirmatively pleaded in the answer the provisions of section 462, Code of Civil Procedure, take the place of a replication at common law and permit the introduction of evidence of estoppel to meet the new matter pleaded in the answer. The rule is well stated in Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 210, 213, 155 P. 986, 987: "It is well settled that under our simplified system of procedure, where plaintiff's pleadings on the facts begin and end with the complaint, there is by law afforded him an opportunity, without pleading, to interpose evidence overcoming any affirmative matter of defense set up in the answer. Thus he may establish a fraud or an estoppel."

The same rule was tersely stated in Buford v. Florin Fruit Growers' Ass'n, 210 Cal. 84, 91, 291 P. 170, 173: "In this case it was not necessary to plead estoppel, for it was relied upon as a defense to matter set up in the manner."

See also Corporation of America v. Harris, 5 Cal.App.2d 452, 462, 43 P.2d 307; First Nat. F. Corp. v. Five-O Drilling Co.,

[3, 4] The evidence recited above if believed by the trial court would operate to estop the defendants from asserting the transfer of the property to defendant wife prior to the time the money was advanced to the husband in reliance upon his ownership of the property. "When a wife permits her husband to hold the record title to her realty, the general rule is that she is estopped to assert her title thereto as against one extending credit to the husband in reliance on such ownership." 10 R.C.L. 743.

[5] Respondents insist that the doctrine of estoppel requires a showing of some actual turpitude on the part of defendant wife. This may once have been the rule in California (10 Cal.Jur. 633, 634), but it is now settled that there need be no showing of actual fraud. "All that is meant in the expression that an estoppel must possess an element of fraud is that the case must be one in which the circumstances and conduct would render it a fraud for the party to deny what he had previously induced or suffered another to believe and take action upon. * * * There need be no precedent corrupt motive or evil design." Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 796, 106 P. 88, 95, 134 Am.St.Rep. 154; Comer v. Associated Almond Growers, 101 Cal.App. 687, 690, 282 P. 532; Standard Oil Co. v. Woolner, 113 Cal.App. 66, 70, 298 P. 77.

The case of Franck v. Moran, 36 Cal. App. 32, 171 P. 841, is direct authority for the proposition here asserted by appellant that where credit is extended on the faith that the grantor was owner of the property it would be unequitable to allow the grantee who failed to record his conveyance until after the indebtedness was incurred to prevent the creditor from resorting to the property to satisfy his judgment for the debt so incurred. The same rule has been frequently applied in the case of personal property. 10 Cal.Jur. 641, 642.

It follows that the failure to find on the issue of estoppel raised by appellant was prejudicial error.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Mines and minerals ⇐85

An amended complaint alleging that defendants, by misrepresentations, induced plaintiff's deceased husband to enter into contract by which husband investing $1,500 with defendant was to receive interest in defendants' mining properties, to be evidenced in a corporation to be incorporated, in which husband was to be designated as an owner, and that the consideration had failed, and seeking an accounting and recovery of any balance found to be due, was sufficient to state cause of action, and overruling of demurrer thereto was not error, where bar of statute of limitations did not appear on face thereof.

A plaintiff suing for accounting and for any balance found due based on misrepresentation and failure of consideration for agreement to sell an interest in mining properties, and to issue certificates of stock in corporation to be formed, had burden to establish the allegations of her complaint.

An action for accounting and for any balance found due, based on misrepresentation and failure of consideration for agreement of November 3, 1924, to sell an interest in mining properties and to issue certificates of stock in corporation to be formed, was barred by statute of limitations, where amended complaint was not filed until January 23, 1937. Action by Frances Tadin against H. C. Crofoot and others for an accounting and for payment of any balance found in the defendants' hands, based on misrepresentation and failure of consideration. From a judgment for the plaintiff after denial of a motion for new trial and from an order denying a new trial, the defendants appeal.

Reversed, and appeal from order dismissed.

John H. Leonard, of Santa Cruz, for appellants.

Frank V. Kingston, of Redwood City, for respondent.

MONCUR, Justice pro tem.

The above matter is before the court upon an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendants after denial of a motion for a new trial. The case was tried upon a first amended complaint and the answer of defendants thereto, defendants having answered after the overruling of their demurrer, which demurrer was for the want of sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action and the bar of the statute of limitations.

In view of the contention of defendants that the first amended complaint did not state a cause of action, it appears necessary to set forth, at considerable length, the allegations of this pleading. It alleges that at all times mentioned, beginning with November 3, 1924, and for a long time prior thereto, up to and including the time of the death of Philip Forencich, the latter and plaintiff were husband and wife; that said Philip Forencich died on June 14, 1931, and that plaintiff is the surviving widow; that on October 11, 1935, after proceedings duly had in the matter of the estate of Philip Forencich, deceased, the court assigned to plaintiff as surviving widow of said decedent, the whole of decedent's estate, including a certain contract referred to in the amended complaint, attached thereto and marked Exhibit "A"; that ever since said October 11, 1935, plaintiff has been and is now the owner and holder of all the rights of decedent in and to said contract; that at all times mentioned, beginning with November 3, 1924, defendants were, and ever since have been and now are partners or joint adventurers in a mining business, which partnership or joint adventure had never been dissolved; that on November 3, 1924, defendants and said Forencich entered into the said contract above referred to; that at the time said contract was made defendants represented to decedent that they were the owners and holders of certain leases, agreements, and options to purchase and contracts on certain mining property situated in Butte County and known as the Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Properties; that at said time said defendants further represented to said decedent that if decedent would invest with said defendants the sum of $1,500, that they, said defendants, would convey to said decedent an interest in said mining properties, leases, contracts, and options in value equal to $7,500 of the ground floor price of the properties when appraised; that at said time defendants represented to decedent that they would cause the incorporation of said properties and that in said corporation said decedent would be designated as one of the owners of said corporation; that said representations were made by said defendants to said decedent for the purpose of inducing said decedent to pay to said defendants the said sum of $1,500 and that by said representation decedent was induced to pay and at said time did pay to defendants the sum of $1,500; that thereafter and at all times since November 3, 1924, and up to the time of the death of said decedent said defendants represented to decedent that they were the owners of said properties; that they had conveyed to said decedent said interest agreed to be conveyed as aforesaid and that said properties had been incorporated as agreed as aforesaid, and that decedent was designated in said corporation as the owner of an interest therein in value equal to $7,500 of the ground floor price of said property when appraised, and that said properties were appraised; that said representations were false in the following particulars, to-wit: that said defendants were not on said November 3, 1924, the owners and holders of said leases, agreements, options to purchase, and contracts; that defendants did not convey to said decedent an interest in said properties in value equal to $7,500 of said ground floor price or any other value whatsoever; that said properties were never appraised; that said properties were never incorporated in any corporation wherein said decedent was designated as one of the owners thereof; that at all times during the lifetime of decedent from and after November 3, 1924, said decedent, believing said representations and relying thereon, believed that defendants were the owners and holders of the said properties; that they conveyed to said decedent said interest therein and that said properties had been incorporated and that said decedent was designated in said corporation as one of the owners thereof; that said defendants never at any time informed said decedent, and that said decedent never at any time knew that said defendants were not the owners of said property or that said defendants had not conveyed said interest to said decedent or that said properties had been incorporated and that said decedent was designated in said corporation as one of the owners thereof; that said defendants never at any time informed said decedent, and that said decedent never at any time knew that said defendants were not the owners of said property or that said defendants had not conveyed said interest to said decedent, or that said properties had never been incorporated in such manner as would show that said decedent was one of the owners thereof; that on December 18, 1935, said plaintiff made her demand in writing to said defendants that said defendants account to plaintiff for said moneys, but that said defendants have refused to account therefor.

The prayer is for judgment against defendants for an accounting of said moneys and that defendants be ordered to pay over to plaintiff any balance thereof found in their hands, and for her costs.

[1] The agreement involved is as follows:

"Exhibit 'A'

"Agreement to Sell Interest.

"Whereas, H. C. Crofoot and John H. Leonard, are the owners and holders of certain leases, agreements, and Options to Purchase, and Contracts, on certain mining property situate in Butte County, and known as the Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Properties, and Philip Forencich has invested with said H. C. Crofoot and John H. Leonard, the sum of Fifteen Hundred Dollars ($1500.00), the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, it is "Agreed That said Philip Forencich shall have an interest in said mining properties and Leases, Contracts, and Options, in a value equal to Seventy-five Hundred Dollars ($7,500.00) of the ground floor price of the properties when appraised.

"It Is Understood That said properties are to be incorporated at the earliest possible time, and that in such corporation said Philip Forencich shall be designated as one of the owners.

"Dated: November 3d, A. D. 1924.

"(Signed) H. C. Crofoot, by J. H. Leonard
"John H. Leonard
"Philip Forencich."

"Endorsed: Filed January 23, 1937.
"H. E. Miller, Clerk of said court."

It is the contention of respondent that the foregoing agreement creates a trust. In support of this contention, Civil Code, section 2219; Scovill v. Guy, 205 Cal. 386, 388, 389, 270 P. 934; Dow v. Swain, 1899, 125 Cal. 674, 683, 58 P. 271; Thomas v. Lamb, 1909, 11 Cal.App. 717, 719, 106 P. 254, are cited. An examination of said code section and of the authorities cited, in our opinion, does not support this contention, and we are satisfied that the said agreement does not create a trust.

Appellants in their brief cite the case of People v. Crowfoot, 84 Cal.App. 107, 257 P. 463, in support of their contention, which will be hereinafter referred to, that a corporation was formed. Evidentiary foundation for consideration of that case for that purpose is not in the record. However, an agreement was referred to therein which was similar in its terms to the one here involved, and in that case the court held that it was merely a case where a sale was made and where the vendee had failed to make payment of the consideration called for. There was no evidence to show either a bailment or a trust between the parties. From the evidence it is apparent that there was no confidential relationship existing between the parties and, in fact, appellant Leonard had only met Forencich about two days prior to the making of the agreement and appellant Crofoot, if he had ever met Forencich, had no recollection of it. We are satisfied that the instrument is just what it says it is, an agreement to sell an interest. The agreement says nothing about a partnership and it is clear that none was intended.

[2, 3] For the purposes of the demurrer, the prayer of the amended complaint cannot, of course, be considered. The agreement does nothing more than evidence a sale by appellants to Forencich of certain leases, agreements, and options to purchase and contracts on the mining property therein mentioned and represents that appellants are the owners thereof and that Forencich has invested with them the sum of $1,500, the receipt being acknowledged, Forencich to have an interest in said mining properties, leases, contracts, and options of a value equal to $7,500 on the ground floor price of the properties when appraised, to be evidenced in the corporation to be incorporated and that in such corporation said Forencich should be designated as an owner.

In the usual procedure in such matters this simply means that title to the mining properties was to be vested in a corporation; that Forencich would come in as one of the promoters and that certificates of stock in the corporation would be issued to him to the value of $7,500. So construing the amended complaint and the contract, the action is one based upon misrepresentation and the failure of the consideration for which the $1,500 was paid and, as so construed, we are of the opinion that the complaint states a cause of action; the bar of the statute of limitations does not appear upon the face of the complaint. There was, therefore, no error in overruling the demurrer to the first amended complaint.

In the answer to the complaint it was said: "That defendants save and do not waive the point that plaintiff's alleged cause of action is barred by the provisions of Sections 336, 337; Subdivisions 1 and 4 of Section 338; and Section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California; that defendants save and do not waive the point that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The answer does not deny the making of the agreement but denies the other allegations of the complaint except as is therein alleged that defendants or neither of them at any time made to Philip Forencich any representations other than the representations made in the agreement referred to in the complaint. The answer further alleges that the sum of $1,500 was entirely expended in the work and development of the mine mentioned in the agreement, and upon information and belief it is alleged that the properties were incorporated and at the time of the said incorporation the commitment to the said corporation was made in favor of said Forencich in fulfillment of the terms of said agreement; also that the defendants nor either of them, expended or used any part of the $1,500 for their, or either of their, individual benefits or for any other purpose except the purpose of mining the properties as mentioned in said agreement.

The motion for a new trial was based upon the grounds of excessive damages; insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and judgment, and errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the defendant. The appeal is from the judgment and the whole thereof and from the order denying the motion for a new trial. The findings of the court follow substantially the allegations of the first amended complaint and the judgment is based thereon.

[4-7] Plaintiff Frances Tadin, following the death of Philip Forencich, married Tony Tadin. Plaintiff and said Tony Tadin were called as witnesses for plaintiff, and appellants H. C. Crofoot and John H. Leonard were also called for plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From the evidence of plaintiff and her husband it is apparent that they had no knowledge of the circumstances existing leading up to the execution of the agreement involved herein, the plaintiff's evidence of those facts depending upon the testimony of appellants. From the testimony of the latter it appears that they did own, at the time of the making of the agreement, a lease, options to purchase, and contracts on the mining property referred to; that a corporation was formed; title to the properties was vested in the corporation and that under a permit from the Corporation Commissioner, stock was issued to Philip Forencich and placed in escrow to be delivered to him upon the fulfillment of certain conditions by the incorporators. Also, that notice of the proceedings leading up to the forming of the corporation and of the formation of the corporation was given to the parties interested, including Philip Forencich. The testimony of appellants herein was not deemed sufficient by the trial court without corroboration but there appears nothing inherently improbable in their testimony and there is nothing in the record to show why their testimony should not be weighed as required under the settled rules of evidence. The burden was upon the plaintiff to establish the allegations of her complaint. Generally, fraud is not presumed and must be established by the party alleging it by at least sufficient evidence. If the testimony of appellants be entirely disregarded, there is no evidence in the record to support the allegations of the complaint concerning the alleged misrepresentation and of the failure of the consideration and the findings of the trial court respecting those allegations.

On the other hand, if the testimony of appellants respecting the alleged misrepresentations and of the performance by them of the provisions of the contract is given any weight whatever, the findings of the trial court are against the evidence. In either event, there is no support for the judgment.

We are not unmindful of the fact that the stock in question was not delivered directly to Philip Forencich but was placed in escrow to be delivered to him upon the performance of the requirements of the Corporation Commissioner. This was a matter not within the power of appellants. All of the parties to the agreement must be presumed to have entered into it with knowledge of the requirements of the law in respect to the formation of corporations and the issuance of certificates of stock thereof in this state. There is no evidence to disclose that Philip Forencich was not familiar with the law in respect to such matters or that appellants did anything or said anything to deceive him in respect to this matter. There is no evidence to show that from the time he entered into the agreement until the date of his death, a period of about seven years, he appeared to be dissatisfied with what was being done.

The agreement does not provide that the $1,500 involved should be expended in the mine or upon the mining property, but the testimony of appellants is that the said $1,500 was so expended.

[8] The record does not disclose when the original complaint was filed but it appears that the first amended complaint was filed January 23, 1937. If the testimony of appellants be entirely disregarded there is no showing sufficient to toll the statute of limitations. If any weight whatever be given to the testimony of appellants it affirmatively appears that the plea of the bar of the statute of limitations as set forth in the answer must be upheld.

[9] It appearing to us that there is no evidence in the record to support the findings and conclusions of law and judgment, and that the action is barred under the provisions of the statute of limitations referred to, it is ordered that the judgment be reversed. An order denying a motion for a new trial is not appealable. The appeal from that order is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles D. Ballard, Judge.

Action by Antioch College of Yellow Springs, Greene County, Ohio, a corporation, against G. Edward Barnhart for money due on a note. Defendant filed cross-complaints and counterclaims. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed. Appeal dismissed.

Waldo & Waldo, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Henry L. Knoop, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff as assignee of the original payee sued to recover from the defendant maker on 26 non-negotiable promissory notes. These notes are similar in form, with the exception of amounts and dates, and some unimportant minor differences in text. In each note there appears the following two clauses:

"* * * payable semi-annually, out of the profits, proceeds or other avails of the inventions, whether patented or unpatented of said G. Edward Barnhart for or in connection with seamless metal tubing, whether straight or tapered or metal rods, beams, and other metal parts, as and when the same shall be realized by said G. Edward Barnhart and not otherwise * * *.

"The Statute of Limitations is hereby waived and shall not begin to run until the Maker shall inform the Holder of the above note that profits, proceeds, or other avails have been received which are applicable to the payment of said note."

[1] Upon the primary issue as to whether or not the defendant had received money from inventions referred to in the notes, the trial court found that he had received $41,569.13 in profit, proceeds, and other avails applicable to the payment of the notes. Although given the opportunity so to do, the defendant failed to testify to any proper offsets to this amount. On this issue the defendant's testimony was evasive and shifty. After reviewing the extensive record, we can find no reason why we should disturb the finding of the trial court.

[2] All through the case runs what might be termed another primary issue: Whether or not the notes in suit were an integral part of a contract represented by the notes and other writings between the maker and the plaintiff. This defense was urged by defendant on a number of different occasions, and ruled upon by different judges of the superior court. First, when the trial court sustained demurrers to portions of defendant's answers, cross-complaints and counterclaims, without leave to amend. There were three of these pleadings: The answer, cross-complaint and counterclaim; the first amended answer, cross-complaint and counterclaim; the second amended answer, cross-complaint and counterclaim. Second, upon the refusal of the trial court to permit amendments to the pleadings to be made upon the trial of the case. And thirdly upon the offer in evidence of the contracts which the defendant alleged were part and parcel of the notes in suit.

We agree with the decision of the several judges of the trial court who heard the several matters to which we have referred, that a reading of these contracts demonstrates that they were no part whatever of the contracts represented by the promissory notes. In finally disposing of this contention it may be said that the other agreements were cancelled by the parties thereto without making any reference to the notes.

[3] Finally, the appellant complains because of the ruling of the trial court overruling his demurrer to the complaint. This instrument we have likewise read carefully, and we agree with the trial court that it states a cause of action. It is apparent that the defendant endeavored to require the plaintiff to plead in his complaint the contract relationship which the defendant contended for. This was not required.

[4] Also, the demurrer raised the point that on its face the causes of action pleaded were barred by the statute of limitations.

"* * * A demurrer on the ground of the bar of the statute of limitations does not lie, where the complaint merely shows that the action may have been barred. It must appear affirmatively that, upon the facts stated, the right of action is necessarily barred." Pike v. Zadig, 171 Cal. 273, 277, 152 P. 923, 925; Vassere v. Joerger, 10 Cal.2d 689, 693, 76 P.2d 656.

[5, 6] And the clause in the notes which we have quoted waived the running of the statute of limitations as between the parties. This may be done by contract. Brownrigg v. DeFrees, 196 Cal. 534, 238 P. 714; Dexter v. Pierson, 214 Cal. 247, 4 P.2d 932.

Appellant's brief raises a number of other points which are not necessary to our decision. There is no question here about the fact that the notes are non-negotiable, or that the holder takes them subject to equities running between the maker and the payee, or principles of accounting or joint adventure.

[7] A review of the record in this case, which includes 773 pages of appellant's brief and supplement (which brief and supplement contains a citation of 540 authorities, including 60 text books and encyclopedias) brings the case down to this: The defendant made and delivered to the payee a series of non-negotiable promissory notes, for which he received the money in full; the payee assigned them to plaintiff, and the defendant has paid no part of the money he received. During the years which elapsed after the making of the notes, the defendant was paid $41,569.13 which should have been applied upon payment of the notes. He had an opportunity to explain what part of this money, if any, could have been used as a set-off thereto,—an opportunity of which he did not avail himself. There is no merit to his contention that the notes were part of a larger contract involving some different contractual relationship between him and the payee of the notes than that embodied in the contract expressed by the notes themselves. This is just another case in which there is substantial evidence to support the findings and judgment of the trial court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed. The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by defendant husband from a judgment allowing the plaintiff wife the sum of $60 per month for separate maintenance. The husband pleaded in defense an agreement made and entered into between himself and his wife in March of 1936 wherein she agreed to waive all further claim upon him for support and maintenance. The court found as to this agreement that it was executed by plaintiff without sufficient consideration and was not voluntarily made by plaintiff, but that she was induced to sign said property settlement agreement by means of duress, and undue influence exercised upon her, and fraud practiced upon her by said defendant.

The chief attack on appeal is upon this finding, appellant claiming that it finds no support in the evidence.

[2] It should also be mentioned that the previous year the husband had filed suit for divorce and then left the state and that when a cross-complaint asking for support was served upon his attorneys the action was dismissed a few minutes before the cross-complaint was filed thereby defeating her attempt at that time to obtain support. Subsequently the parties became reconciled but the trial court was entitled to consider this prior conduct of the husband and the effect that the recollection of it might have on the mind of the wife in inducing her to sign the later agreement.

Section 158 of the Civil Code provides that in transactions between husband and wife they are subject "to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying the confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts." Turning to that title we find that by section 2228 "a trustee is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary, and may not obtain any advantage therein over the latter by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat, or adverse pressure of any kind."

[3] Under the evidence above recited the court was justified in finding that the execution of the agreement by plaintiff was not binding on her. Contracts of this character are always subject to the close scrutiny of the courts. Moog v. Moog, 203 Cal. 406, 264 P. 490; Steinmetz v. Steinmetz, 67 Cal.App. 195, 227 P. 713; Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 39 P. 801. The wife had the right to continued support from her husband. Clark v. Clark, 203 Cal. 441, 264 P. 761. This he deliberately deprived her of at the same time absenting himself from the state so that she could have no effective recourse against him. As a result her debts mounted to over $1,000 and she was deprived of both funds and credit. In this condition she signed the agreement, as she testified "paying the bills and a slight sum left over." Measuring the facts against the code provision that a trustee "may not obtain any advantage * * * by the slightest * * * adverse pressure of any kind" we cannot say that the finding attacked did not find support in the evidence.

[4-6] The wife was not required to tender back the amount which she received under the agreement and which was needed and used by her in the meantime for her necessary support (Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 194 Cal. 73, 83, 227 P. 715), and when a contract obtained through abuse of confidential relations is pleaded defensively the plaintiff can always attack its validity. Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 140, 204 P. 583. Nor is she estopped to do so by the fact that she has used the funds in the meantime for her support. Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, supra; Estate of Cover, supra.

[7] The evidence was sufficient to justify the court in finding that defendant had the ability to pay $60 per month. He testified to receiving $13,000 from the sale of stock in a dairy a few months before the trial, to the ownership of other property worth at least $5,000 and while he testified that he was not engaged in any occupation at the time of the trial he had previously for a number of years been employed as the manager of a dairy.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiffs sued for personal injuries to three fingers of the right hand of plaintiff Bernice Dubbs alleged to have occurred when the fingers were caught between the open door of the car which she was entering and the side of defendant's car. The cause was tried to a jury and defendants had a verdict. The defendant Eugene Sweetland, a minor, was operating the car with the consent of the owner, and we will refer to him hereafter as the defendant.

Both cars were parked in a public parking lot with a space of about one foot between them. Plaintiff entered on the right hand side of her car, opened the door and attempted to close it with three of her fingers on the outer rim of the door. As she was entering her car, the car of defendant moved forward and her fingers were caught between the door and the left side of defendant's car.

The appellants rest their appeal from the judgment on the statement that the evidence without conflict established defendant's negligence and the absence of contributory negligence on their part. They also complain of one of the instructions submitting to the jury the issue of contributory negligence on the ground that there was no evidence to support that plea.

The appeal does not present any debatable question of law. The evidence offered by appellants discloses that the parking lot was well lighted at the time, that Mrs. Dubbs was well aware of the narrow space between the two cars and might have observed that the defendant was seated in his car preparing to start forward, that she witnessed her husband and two sons entering the car before her, and that when she attempted to close the front door she grasped the outer rim with her fingers instead of the inside handle specially installed thereon for that purpose. From this evidence alone the jury might have inferred that she carelessly chose the dangerous method of closing the door instead of the safe one, which was available and more efficient.

The entire argument of appellants rests upon the theory that defendant was negligent and Mrs. Dubbs was not negligent as matters of law. But the evidence is conflicting upon both issues. As the evidence and inferences of contributory negligence supported the defendant's plea of that issue, the instruction on that subject was properly given.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⇐239

A transfer of note to bank by trustees for creditors of payee, indebted to bank, and his partner, pursuant to agreement of bank, partners and trustees, after termination of trust, was not governed by rule that trustee cannot deal with trust property for his own advantage because one of trustees was also a vice president of bank, and hence was not invalid, even if not made in ordinary course of business. Civ.Code, § 3133.

3. Bills and notes ⇐359

A bank's release of its claims against other assets of partners indebted to it than those mentioned in agreement for transfer to bank of note payable to one of partners and accounts receivable of their business, coupled with partners' antecedent debt, agreed to be satisfied pro tanto by liquidation of such note, constituted valuable "consideration" for negotiation of note.

5. Bills and notes ⇐330

The fact that indorsement of note to bank by trustees for creditors of payee and his partner, pursuant to agreement providing for satisfaction of payee's debt to bank pro tanto by liquidation of note, was "without recourse", did not prevent bank from becoming "holder in due course" of note.

6. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⇐232

The words "notes receivable excepted" in agreement that partners indebted to bank and trustees for their creditors should transfer to bank a certain note and mortgage, together with all accounts receivable of partners' business, "notes receivable excepted", did not exclude such note and mortgage.

7. Assignments for benefit of creditors ⇐232

A bank's agreement to proposal of partners who were its debtors that property described in prior agreement of bank, debtors thereof and trustees for their creditors for conveyance to bank of described realty, a note and mortgage, and accounts receivable of debtors' business for liquidation of such assets, should not be sold without giving debtors 45 days' written notice to enable them to secure better price, if possible, referred to parcels of realty transferred to bank, not to such note and mortgage, as mortgaged property could be sold only by court on foreclosure.

8. Mortgages ⇐245

The fact that note and mortgage, transferred to bank by debtors thereof and trustees for creditors under agreement that bank should liquidate them and other assets so transferred as rapidly as possible, were held in pledge did not prevent bank from bringing action to foreclose mortgage.

Civ.Code, § 3440.

12. Mortgages ⇐258

One executing note and mortgage securing it could not relieve himself of obligation thereon, so as to preclude rendition of deficiency judgment in foreclosure action, by agreement with mortgagees without consent of bank, to which mortgagees and trustees for their creditors transferred note and mortgage for satisfaction of their debt to bank pro tanto by liquidation of note. DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage made to secure a promissory note and providing for a deficiency judgment against the maker of the note, defendant Rudolph J. Scholz.

The note in the principal sum of $6,000 and the mortgage were executed by defendant Rudolph J. Scholz in favor of defendant Edward F. Sophey on November 3, 1937. The note by its terms was payable two years after date.

The defendants Sophey, who were engaged in business as co-partners, on December 30, 1937, entered into an arrangement for the benefit of their creditors whereby they agreed to transfer to three trustees all of their assets. Pursuant to this agreement they endorsed and delivered the promissory note involved in this action to such trustees.

On March 1, 1929, the plaintiff Exchange Bank, the defendants Sophey and the three trustees of the trust for creditors above referred to entered into an agreement which provided that the defendants Sophey were indebted to the bank in the sum of $23,602.32, that defendants Sophey and the three trustees would convey to the bank certain described real property and would further transfer to the bank the note and mortgage here in suit, together with all accounts receivable of the business known as Sophey Bros., "notes receivable excepted," "it being the intention of the parties hereto that the first party (bank) will take the assets herein set forth and liquidate them as rapidly as possible."

On its part the bank agreed to pay the Sopheys the sum of $1,000, and to release and discharge any claim that it might have or assert against any and all assets of the Sopheys not mentioned in the agreement, and that such assets might be transferred to a corporation to be formed free from any claim of the bank.

Pursuant to this agreement the trustees endorsed the promissory note and delivered it to the bank and the Sopheys executed and delivered to the bank an assignment of the mortgage.

[1] At the outset appellants attack the transfer of the note and mortgage to the bank on the ground that the trustees for creditors could not give good title to the bank without the creditors' consent. This argument overlooks the express provisions of the agreement by which the trust for creditors was created. That agreement contained the following provisions: "Fourth: This Trust shall be irrevocable for a period of One (1) year next after the execution of this Indenture, excepting however, that this Trust Agreement may be declared imperative (inoperative?) in the event all of said creditors' claims and all other claims be paid and discharged before the expiration of said One (1) year period. * * *

"Twelfth: It is further understood and agreed that upon the payment and discharge of all claims, charges and expenses * * * and the payment and discharge of all the claims of said creditors, together with any and all other costs * * * said Trustees shall pay over unto said Trustors all moneys in their possession, and reconvey unto said Trustors any and all real and/or personal property held by them, and then and in that event, and/or upon the expiration of said One (1) year period, this trust shall forever cease and terminate."

Under the plain terms of the agreement the trust was created for the period of one year and automatically terminated at the end of that period. The trustees had no further duty than to reconvey all the property held by them as trustees to the Sopheys. That being so it is immaterial that they endorsed and delivered the promissory note directly to the bank. They did so by the agreement and direction of the payee and owner of the promissory note. In legal effect the result was the same as if defendant Edward F. Sophey had himself delivered the note properly endorsed to the bank.

This conclusion disposes of a host of arguments based upon the theory that the bank did not become a holder in due course because of the lack of authority of the trustees to transfer the note to the bank, and the specific arguments based on this premise need not be specially noticed.

[2] One of the trustees, Williams, was also a vice president of the bank. It is urged by appellants that the transfer of the note is governed by the settled rule that a trustee cannot deal with the trust property for his own advantage or convey it to himself. What we have said likewise disposes of that contention. The trust for the creditors having terminated the only fiduciary duty owed by Williams was to the Sopheys. The transfer of the note to the bank was the voluntary and deliberate act of the Sopheys.

[3, 4] The negotiation of the note was for value. The bank's release of its claims against other assets of the Sopheys that they might otherwise have looked to for satisfaction of their debt standing alone would have been sufficient for that purpose. Coupled with this was the antecedent debt of the Sopheys to the bank in excess of $23,000 which by agreement was to be satisfied pro tanto by the "liquidation" of the note. It is the settled rule that an antecedent debt is valuable consideration for the negotiation of a promissory note. Adoph Ramish, Inc., v. Woodruff, 2 Cal. 2d 190, 203, 40 P.2d 509, 96 A.L.R. 1146, and cases there cited.

[5] The fact that the endorsement by the trustees to the bank was "without recourse" did not prevent the bank from becoming a holder in due course. 10 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, § 334, p. 836; Ross v. Title Guarantee, etc., Co., 136 Cal.App. 393, 29 P.2d 236.

The claim that the transfer of the note was not in the ordinary course of business, if tenable under the Negotiable Instrument Act (10 C.J.S. 791; Civil Code, sec. 3133), is based upon the claims that a trustee cannot deal with himself and that the trustees had no power to negotiate the note. These contentions have already been disposed of.

[6] The court did not err in finding that this promissory note and mortgage were not excluded by the language added to the agreement of March 1, 1929, "notes receivable excepted." These words were inserted in the provision providing for the transfer to the bank of accounts receivable. The entire paragraph providing for the transfer of this particular note and mortgage to the bank was left in the agreement untouched.

[7] The bank agreed to a proposal made by the Sopheys in a letter dated April 27, 1929, "that the property described in the agreement dated March 1, 1929, will not be sold without giving 45 days' written notice to Sophey Bros. for the purpose of enabling them to secure a better price, if possible." If this agreement was supported by any new consideration, it obviously referred to the parcels of real property transferred to the bank, and not to this note and mortgage. The property covered by the mortgage could not be sold by the bank, but only by a court on foreclosure, and the purpose expressed of enabling Sophey Bros. to get a better price if possible could only apply to sales of property which the bank had power to make. The bringing of the foreclosure action would itself give Sophey Bros. ample time to get a better price at the foreclosure sale, if they were in a position to do so.

[8, 9] If the note and mortgage were held in pledge that would not prevent the bank from bringing this action. The agreement under which they were transferred to the bank provided that the bank should take the assets described "and liquidate them as rapidly as possible." In any event a pledgee may collect any evidence of debt pledged to him when due. Civil Code, sec. 3006; Fernandez v. Tormey, 121 Cal. 515, 520, 53 P. 1119; Security-First National Bank v. Spring St. Properties, Inc., 20 Cal.App.2d 618, 67 P.2d 720.

[10] The transfer of the note and mortgage to the trustees was not void under Civil Code, section 3440. The section specifically excludes "thing in action" and the note and mortgage cannot under any stretch of the imagination be regarded as a part of Sophey Bros.' stock in trade.

[11] A large part of appellants' brief is taken up with the claim that the note and mortgage in question were not what they seemed to be, but by reason of an agreement between Scholz and Sophey the deed to Scholz was in fact a mortgage to him to secure the repayment to Scholz of the amounts advanced and paid by him to Sophey. The bank being a holder in due course would only be subject to this defense if it took with notice. Sophey testified that he advised Williams of the true effect of the note and mortgage before the transfer to the bank but Williams denied this. The court chose to believe Williams' testimony on this subject. The same may be said of payments claimed to have been made to Sophey. The bank credited all payments of which it had knowledge. 10 C.J.S., Bills and Notes, § 510, p. 1125.

[12] There is nothing in the point that because of any agreement between the Sopheys and Scholz or Sopheys' occupancy of the land a deficiency judgment should not have been given against Scholz. The obligation was Scholz's and he could not relieve himself of it without the bank's consent. Sec. 1457, Civil Code.

Appellant Scholz claims that he should have had judgment against the Sopheys on a cross-complaint. The record shows the cross-complaint was dismissed by Scholz during the trial. Despite the dismissal of this and another cross-complaint against the bank "without prejudice" the court made findings that their allegations were untrue. While the judgment is silent on these matters, appellant Scholz should not be prejudiced by allowing these findings to stand.

Many other claimed errors are briefly suggested by appellant. We have read the transcript with these claims in mind and find none of them well taken. It would expand this opinion to unreasonable length to deal with each of such claims seriatim.

The trial court is directed to strike from the findings those findings upon issues presented only by the cross-complaints of Rudolph J. Scholz which were dismissed. The judgment is affirmed, with costs on appeal to respondent Exchange Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; W. D. L. Held, Judge.

Harold Hunter was convicted of kidnapping and he appeals.

Affirmed.

J. R. Thomas and Newell Rawles, both of Ukiah, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and J. Q. Brown, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

THOMPSON, Acting Presiding Justice.

The defendant was convicted on two counts of an information charging him with kidnapping different young girls, under sixteen years of age, contrary to the provisions of section 207 of the Penal Code. In a third count he was charged with the crime of rape with relation to one of the girls. The jury acquitted him of the last-mentioned charge. From the judgment of conviction of the first two offenses and from the order denying a new trial he has appealed.

The appellant contends that the verdicts and judgment of conviction of the crimes of kidnaping are not supported by the evidence, that the identity of the defendant as the perpetrator of the first alleged crime was not established, and that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in calumnious references which he made regarding the defendant, in the course of the trial and in his argument to the jury.

The first count charges the defendant with forcibly seizing, without authority or right, a young girl on November 10, 1940, in Ukiah, Mendocino County, and carrying her to another part of the same county, against her will.

The second count accuses him of forcibly taking another young girl on July 1, 1941, without right or authority, from a point on the Redwood Highway near Ukiah, and transporting her to another part of the same county without her consent.

The information alleges no purpose or intent, on the part of the defendant, for kidnaping the girls. Although the jury acquitted the defendant of the actual commission of the crime of rape, as alleged in the third count, it is apparent that his purpose, in both instances, was to ravish the girls. The defendant had been enrolled with the Civilian Conservation Corps in that vicinity. He was discharged from that camp a few months prior to the date of the first alleged offense. He was twenty-three years of age. He was tall, slender and dark-complexioned. He was a total stranger to the girls, never having met either of them before the perpetration of the offenses charged. He came from Fort Bragg, but he was in and about Ukiah on both dates when he was charged with the offenses. He had been previously convicted of robbery.

[1] The first girl kidnaped was an intelligent high school student residing in Ukiah. She had a good reputation. About six o'clock on the evening of November 10, 1940, she started to walk along the roadway adjacent to the railroad track, from her residence on Perkins Street, a distance of several blocks, to the home of a young lady friend, on Norton Street. It was dusk, but it was not raining and she was able to see quite clearly. She observed a man following her on the opposite side of the road. There were no other pedestrians in sight. As she approached a bridge the defendant overtook her and attempted to engage her in conversation. He waited until an approaching automobile passed them, and then, without warning, he deliberately seized her and dragged her across the track behind a pile of railroad ties. She screamed and struggled to secure her release. He placed his hand over her mouth to prevent her from being heard. She was terribly frightened. He then attempted to kiss her while he continued to hold her by the wrist. After some scuffling she managed to jerk away and fled from his presence. She testified that he was a tall, dark-complexioned young man; that he had dark hair, and he wore a dark hat and a plaid woolen jacket. She positively identified him as he sat in the court room between two other strangers as the man who kidnaped her on that occasion. She also identified a plaid jacket which was taken by the sheriff from the defendant at the time of his arrest, and which was produced in court, as the one he wore at the time of the assault. It is true that a companion of the defendant, who worked with him in the C. C. C. camp and elsewhere, testified that he sold that jacket to the defendant in May, 1941, for the sum of fifty cents. But his evidence in that regard was conflicting and unsatisfactory. The jury was warranted in disbelieving his story. Another disinterested man testified that the defendant came to his restaurant in the vicinity of the place where the crime was committed at seven o'clock that same night and sat about for some time, and that he was then wearing a "woolen jacket."

The defendant testified that he was staying on the Guntley ranch, on the Low Gap Road, in Coyote Valley, near Ukiah, and that he often visited in that city. He would not swear that he was not in Ukiah on November 10, 1940, the date of the alleged assault. He did deny that he kidnaped the young girl as alleged, or that he had ever seen her until shortly before the trial of the case. He also denied that he owned or wore the plaid jacket before May, 1941, at which time he purchased it from his friend. Robert Grazini, who ran a restaurant in Coyote Valley, near Ukiah, testified that the defendant came into his restaurant about seven o'clock on the evening of November 10, 1940, and sat around there for some time and that he was then wearing a woolen jacket.

The young girl upon whom the defendant is charged in the second count of the indictment with making an attack on July 1, 1941, was only thirteen years of age. She was living with her parents in Leggett Valley on the Redwood Highway above Ukiah. She is also an intelligent girl, who was then attending the eighth grade of an elementary school. About two o'clock on the afternoon of that day, she left home in company with a young girl friend. They proceeded up the Redwood Highway for some distance to pick fruit in an orchard owned by Mr. Lavender. As they passed Terrill's Inn on the Redwood Highway the defendant accosted them, and without an invitation followed the girls to the Lavender orchard, where all three of them spent some time picking cherries. The girls then started to return southerly along the highway. The defendant accompanied them. When they reached the intersection of the Fort Bragg road, the defendant gave one of the girls fifteen cents with which to buy her a milk shake at Terrill's place some distance beyond that point. She went on her way. The defendant then detained the complaining witness, saying he wanted to talk with her.

After the other girl disappeared in the Terrill place, the defendant asked the prosecutrix to cross the roadway to the shelter of a shade tree, where they could talk, which she did. There was then no other person in sight. He at once seized her and violently kissed her, at the same time making improper proposals. She testified that she kicked, scratched, struggled and resisted his advances as best she could, but that he picked her up and carried her along an old roadway a distance of some sixty yards into a clump of bushes on a wooded hill. While doing so he held his hand over her mouth to prevent her from screaming. Upon arriving at that secluded spot, she said that he dropped her upon the ground, and overcoming her resistance, he tore her clothing and succeeded in having sexual intercourse with her. She claimed to have been frightened and that she was helpless to prevent the act. He then released her, and she fled from his presence down the roadway to the highway and thence to the Terrill Inn, where she found her girl friend waiting for her.

When she arrived at Terrill's Inn, she was weeping and disheveled. Her clothing was torn, a seam in her dress was ripped open, her belt was hanging down on one side and her face was inflamed. A welt and other red marks were visible on the right side of her face. She told her friend all about the affair and she corroborated the last-mentioned facts. Two other disinterested witnesses corroborated the evidence regarding the condition in which she returned home. Her mother said that when she returned her face was so inflamed that she at first thought she had the hives. Mr. Joseph Jones, a millhand who had previously worked with the defendant, testified that he told him about July 1st all about the sordid affair and boasted of his success. The defendant did not deny his presence with the girls on the highway and in the cherry orchard on that occasion. Indeed, he could not consistently refute those facts. But, naturally, he did deny that he carried her away by force, and he denied having intercourse with her. There is absolutely no question regarding his identity with respect to the last two offenses charged in the information.

There is ample evidence to support the verdicts and judgment of conviction on the kidnaping charges. The identity of the defendant was sufficiently established on both counts. The defendant does not deny that he was present at the time of the last offense. The first prosecuting witness recognized him as the man who kidnaped her on November 10th. It was then dusk, but she said that she plainly saw him. The defendant conforms to the description of the man she said attacked her on that occasion. She testified that he was a tall, dark-complexioned young man who wore a dark hat and a plaid jacket. She identified the defendant's jacket which was produced in court as the one he then wore. The method followed by the assailants of the two girls in seizing them by force and carrying them away with their hands held over the mouths of their victims, is similar. The defendant was in Ukiah the very day of the first offense. Both offenses were committed in the same vicinity and within a comparatively brief period of time. We have no doubt of the identity of the defendant as the perpetrator of both offenses.

[2, 3] The question of the identity of a defendant who is charged with a crime is ordinarily a problem for the determination of the jury. The credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given the evidence in that regard are peculiarly within the province of the jury. Where there is substantial evidence to support the finding of a jury with respect to the identity of a defendant, the verdict and judgment will not be disturbed on appeal. People v. Waller, 14 Cal.2d 693, 700, 96 P.2d 344; People v. Farrington, 213 Cal. 459, 2 P.2d 814; People v. Deal, 42 Cal.App.2d 33, 108 P.2d 103; People v. Denton, 22 Cal.App.2d 673, 72 P. 2d 191. Quoting with approval from the Farrington case, supra, it is said in that regard in People v. Waller, supra [14 Cal. 2d 693, 96 P.2d 348]: " 'The strength or weakness of the identification, the incompatibility of and discrepancies in the testimony, if there were any, and the uncertainties of witnesses in giving their testimony were matters solely for the observation and consideration of the jurors in the first instance, and for the consideration of the trial court on motion for a new trial.' "

[4] We may not say, under the circumstances of this case, that the testimony of the prosecuting witnesses is inherently improbable. Indeed, their testimony appears to be inherently probable, when it is viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. An appellate court may not interfere with the province of the jury and the trial court by reversing a judgment on the ground that the testimony of a prosecuting witness is inherently improbable, unless it is so clearly false and unbelievable as to leave no reasonable doubt in that regard. People v. Jefferson, 31 Cal.App.2d 562, 566, 88 P.2d 238.

[5, 6] It is true that the prosecuting witness testified to circumstances applicable to the third count which constitute rape. It is a fact that the jury nevertheless acquitted the defendant of that charge. The appellant argues that the verdict of acquittal on that charge indicates that the jury did not believe her story with respect to the alleged crime of rape, and that it is therefore inconsistent to hold that the jury could nevertheless believe her story insofar as it applies only to the charge of kidnaping the girl as a part of the same affair. This conclusion does not necessarily follow. The jury may have doubted whether one necessary element of the crime of rape, such as actual penetration occurred. We are not called upon to speculate on the reason or motive which prompted the jury to acquit the defendant of the crime of rape. For the purpose of this appeal it is our province, only, to determine whether there is sufficient evidence to support the alleged crimes of kidnaping. We are of the opinion the record contains ample evidence to support the verdicts and judgment of conviction of the crimes of kidnaping. It was not necessary to allege or prove the intent or purpose with which the defendant kidnaped the girls under the circumstances of this case. People v. Bruno, 49 Cal.App. 372, 193 P. 511; People v. Fernandes, 127 Cal.App. 45, 15 P.2d 172. It is true that section 207 of the Penal Code defines several different crimes of kidnaping, some of which do require allegations and proof of the intent or purpose with which a person is taken and transported from one state or county to another. But there is no contention that this case falls within those classes of kidnaping.

[7] The district attorney was not guilty of prejudicial misconduct in asking the defendant on cross-examination whether he was in the sheriff's office in Mendocino County in November, 1940. The defendant had denied that he was guilty of the crime of kidnaping at Ukiah on November 10, 1940. He denied that he had ever seen the girl. He evidently tried to create the impression that he was not in Ukiah on that date. It was an effort to establish an alibi. He had testified that he "might have been in Sacramento or some other place" on that date. It therefore constituted proper cross-examination to ask him, "Do you know whether or not you were in the sheriff's office in Mendocino County during the month of November, 1940?" We assume the question was asked in good faith, and that he might have been impeached if he falsely swore that he was not in that office during November, 1940.

[8, 9] Nor was it prejudicial misconduct for the district attorney to argue, in his closing address to the jury, that the defendant was "shown to be a person of a vicious personality," or that he was like a vulture, except that he was preying upon the bodies of young girls. No objection to those statements was made at the trial, and the court was not asked to instruct the jury to disregard them. The defendant waived his objection to the prejudicial nature of the challenged statements by failing to assign them as error and by neglecting to ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard them. People v. Swenson, 28 Cal.App.2d 636, 641, 83 P.2d 70; Rogers v. Foppiano, 23 Cal.App. 2d 87, 95, 72 P.2d 239. We do not approve of extravagant and opprobrious language in arguments to juries, especially in criminal cases. They frequently indicate the presence of passion and prejudice, or at least an excess of zeal. There should be an effort to confine arguments to the realm of sobriety, logic and reason. In the present case the comparison of the defendant to a vulture was inappropriate and we think improper, but it did not constitute prejudicial misconduct for the reason heretofore mentioned.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by S. H. Squire, as Superintendent of Banks of the State of Ohio, against Cliffe U. Merriam to recover alleged stockholders' liability. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, of Los Angeles and Charles O. Parker, of Chicago, Ill., for appellant.

DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff brings this action, as Superintendent of Banks of the State of Ohio, to recover alleged stockholders' liability of the defendants. This is the familiar double liability of bank stockholders included in the National Bank Act, 12 U.S.C.A. § 21 et seq., and many state statutes patterned after it. No testimony was taken in the superior court, and the case was decided on an agreed statement of facts. Respondent concedes that these facts are substantially correct as set forth in appellant's opening brief. The defendant, Merriam, and a decedent, now represented by an administrator, were stockholders in a bank corporation existing under Ohio law. Judgment was for the plaintiff and against the defendant Merriam, and against the plaintiff and for the defendant administrator.

February 27, 1933, this bank failed and became insolvent. On that date the bank refused to pay on demand any greater amount than one per centum of any demand deposit or other matured obligation. No general deposits were received and no obligations which affected the liability of its stockholders were incurred after that date.

April 8, 1933, the Ohio superintendent of banks appointed a conservator for the bank.

June 15, 1933, the bank superintendent took possession of the bank for the purpose of liquidation.

July 11, 1933, the bank superintendent formally declared the bank to be insolvent, and determined to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders in the amount of one hundred per centum of the par value of the bank's stock.

July 30, 1934, the superintendent of banks determined it was necessary to levy a one hundred per cent assessment on all stockholders.

August 1, 1934, the superintendent of banks notified stockholders thereof and demanded payment.

July 28, 1937, the bank superintendent filed his complaint in California.

This case has been consolidated for appeal with S. H. Squire, etc., v. Merriam et al., 121 P.2d 538. It is stated in respondent's brief, and not challenged by appellant, that the facts are parallel and the questions of law are identical. We have examined the agreed statement of facts in both cases and do not find mentioned therein the 1934 dates just referred to. The agreed facts recite also an agreement between the parties, which tolled the statute of limitations, so that, if it were essential, the date of filing the complaint would have to be deemed to have been June 15, 1936. Not being essential, we will in this opinion refer to the date the complaint was actually filed, July 28, 1937.

[1] The sole question presented to the lower court for determination, and to this court for review, is whether or not the plaintiff's cause of action is barred by section 359 of our Code of Civil Procedure.

This action having been brought in California, section 359 of our Code of Civil Procedure is the controlling section.

"* * * limitation runs in three years after 'the liability was created'." 6a Cal. Jur. 1026, and note 17, cases cited.

"It should be noted that the statute of limitations here involved is different from the ordinary statute of limitations in that it runs from the date 'upon which * * * the liability was created' instead of from the date upon which a cause of action to enforce that liability accrued to the appellant. Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 P. 335, 37 Am.St.Rep. 87. The Supreme Court in that case held that the statute had run, even though the plaintiff's cause of action to enforce the liability had accrued within three years, since the liability itself had been created more than three years before suit was filed. To the same effect are Wells v. Black, 117 Cal. 157, 163, 48 P. 1090, 37 L.R.A. 619, 59 Am.St.Rep. 162; Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co., 103 Cal. 594, 596, 37 P. 499; Chambers v. Farnham, 182 Cal. 191, 194 [196], 187 P. 732; Gardiner v. Royer, 167 Cal. 238, 139 P. 75; Coombes v. Getz, 217 Cal. 320, 18 P. 2d 939; Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean [168 Cal. 642, 144 P. 139], supra; Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth, 171 Cal. 500, 153 P. 939.

"We then must look to the laws of Maryland to determine the nature of respondent's obligation and the time when the stockholder's liability was created. People v. Goddard, 84 Cal.App. 382, 386, 258 P. 447. The rule is that the construction given by the courts of a foreign state to its statutes will be recognized and given full effect in the courts of the forum. Smith v. Shepler, 8 Cal.App.2d 717, 720, 48 P.2d 999; McManus v. Red Salmon Canning Co., 37 Cal.App. 133, 137, 173 P. 1112; 5 Cal.Jur., pp. 429, 430." Hospelhorn v. Van Dusen, 40 Cal.App.2d 257, 258, 104 P.2d 888, 889.

In the Hospelhorn case just cited, the superior court applied the law of the State of Maryland to the law of California as to limitation of the action, and held the cause of action was barred by section 359, Code of Civil Procedure. This judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal.

In Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean, 168 Cal. 642, 144 P. 139, our Supreme Court determined the nature of the obligation by reference to the law of Canada, then applied our California statute of limitations and found that the cause of action was barred by the same Code section.

In Richardson v. Craig, 11 Cal.2d 131, 77 P.2d 1077, the provisions of the California Bank Act were applied by our Supreme Court to the same section, and the court again determined that the cause of action was barred by the statute.

In Broderick v. Kunde, 23 Cal.App.2d 587, 74 P.2d 333, the bank law of the State of New York was applied; the superior court determined that the cause of action was not barred, which was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal.

Therefore, in order to solve the problem now presented to us, we must look to the law of the State of Ohio to see whether or not the cause of action is barred by our statute of limitations. This determination must rest upon when the liability was created, using the word "created" in the technical sense defined in the California cases to which we have referred. And in so doing, we must take into consideration the statutes and the construction thereof which the courts of Ohio have given to them. Hospelhorn v. Van Dusen, supra, and cases there cited.

The law of the State of Ohio is as follows: "* * * stockholders of corporations authorized to receive money on deposit shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporations, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." Constitution of Ohio, Art. XIII, Sec. 3, Page's Ohio General Code, Vol. 11, p. 299.

"Stockholders of banks shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such bank, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." Page's Ohio General Code, Sec. 710-75, Vol. 1, p. 421.

By amendment, effective March 31, 1933, of the so-called Banking Code of Ohio, the superintendent of banks was given exclusive authority to bring and maintain the action. Fulton v. Wetzel, 47 Ohio App. 72, 190 N.E. 776. This amendment became effective after the failure of the bank in which the defendant in this case was a stockholder.

It is apparent that the essential inquiry which we must now make is whether or not, at the time of the failure of the bank, the law of the State of Ohio gave to its superintendent of banks exclusive power to collect the liability imposed upon bank stockholders by the Constitution and general laws of that state. And it is apparent that the answer to this inquiry is determinative of this case.

If, at the time in question, the power to sue for the double liability of bank stockholders was lodged exclusively in the Ohio Superintendent of Banks, as it is lodged in the California Superintendent of Banks by the California Bank Act, St.1931, p. 338, then the rule established by our Supreme Court in the case of Richardson v. Craig, supra, would apply. In that event, the liability was created when the Ohio Bank Superintendent levied the assessment. The date of the levy being July 30, 1934, and the date of filing the complaint in this action being July 28, 1937, there was an elapsed period of less than three years, and the cause of action is not barred.

But if, under the law of Ohio, creditors had the right to bring the action when the bank failed, then the liability was created at that time. See Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean, supra, 168 Cal. 642, 144 P. 139.

These critical dates are July 28, 1937, when the complaint was filed, and February 27, 1933, when the bank failed; an elapsed period of more than three years, and the cause of action is barred.

Applicable to this determinative point, we are cited the case of Snider v. United Banking & Trust Co., 124 Ohio St. 375, 178 N.E. 840, decided by the Ohio Supreme Court, December 9, 1931.

In this Ohio case a creditor brought suit against a stockholder of a defunct Ohio bank to enforce the double liability we are here considering. A demurrer was filed to the complaint on the ground that Ohio general laws gave to the superintendent of banks the exclusive right to maintain an action to enforce this double liability. The demurrer was overruled by the trial court and judgment entered against the defendant. This judgment was sustained by the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio.

"Syllabus by the Court.

"1. Section 3 of article XIII of the Ohio Constitution creates an additional liability against stockholders of corporations authorized to receive money on deposit, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporations. The liability thus created is complete and self-executing.

"2. The provisions of sections 710-75, 710-89, and 710-95, General Code, are regulatory and procedural, and neither augment nor diminish the constitutional rights of creditors.

"3. The right of the superintendent of banks to enforce such individual liability only applies where he has taken charge of the property and business of the corporation for the purposes of liquidation." Snider v. United Banking & Trust Co., supra.

In the course of that opinion the court says: "It is sufficient to say, in the present state of legislation, that the right of the superintendent of banks has not been made absolutely, and in terms, exclusive."

In an endeavor to avoid the rule in the Snider case, counsel for respondent have cited and have argued at length, from Feldman v. Standard Trust Bank of Cleveland, 1933, 46 Ohio App. 67, 187 N.E. 743, and Fulton v. Wetzel, 1934, 47 Ohio App. 72, 190 N.E. 776.

In analyzing these authorities, we must bear in mind that we are not now trying to determine what the present law of the State of Ohio may or may not be. What we are concerned to determine is what it was when this liability was created, having in view our California statute of limitations, and what we must remember is that if anyone had a right to sue on the liability when the bank failed, the liability was created at that time.

[2] With this criterion in mind, we have examined these cases, and we think it may fairly be said that they do not necessarily overrule or reverse the decision in the Snider case. Both cases hold that the Ohio Superintendent of Banks has the right to bring the action to enforce the double liability of bank stockholders as against a creditor, both parties appealing to the court for authority so to do. Neither case holds that at the time we now have under consideration, i. e., when the bank failed, a creditor did not have the right to sue in the Ohio courts to enforce his stockholders' liability. And if either case held the bank superintendent at the precise time here under review had the exclusive right to bring the action, being a decision of the Ohio District Court of Appeal, we think it would not change the law of Ohio as stated in the Snider case by the Supreme Court, the court of last resort of that state.

[3] We are convinced that at the time this liability was created the law of Ohio was that an action therefor might be brought by a creditor; that this liability of necessity became fixed, or "created," as our Code and our courts say, on the date when the bank failed and refused to pay its depositors. This date being February 27, 1933, and the action in California having been filed July 28, 1937, a period of more than three years elapsed before the commencement of the action. Therefore, under the terms of section 359 of our Code of Civil Procedure, the cause of action was barred, and the judgment of the lower court should have been for the defendant.

[4] Some part of the briefs on appeal has been devoted to a contention on the part of respondent that to hold this cause of action barred by the California statute of limitations would be to deny rights secured to him by the full faith and credit clause of our Federal Constitution, art 4, § 1. There is no merit to this contention. It has been too well settled in every jurisdiction in which the matter has come before the courts to require any citation of authority to the effect that the law as to limitations of actions of the state in which the action is brought applies in cases of this kind. This is the effect of the California cases to which we have referred in this opinion; and we do not think the cases cited by respondent change the rule in any respect.

This is a companion case to S. H. Squire, as Superintendent of Banks of the State of Ohio, in Charge of the Liquidation of Business and Property of Guardian Trust Company, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Cliffe U. Merriam, Defendant and Appellant, 121 P.2d 534, and S. H. Squire, as Superintendent of Banks of the State of Ohio, in Charge of Liquidation of Business and Property of Union Trust Company, Plaintiff and Respondent v. Cliffe U. Merriam, 121 P.2d 538, this day decided. What we have said in our main opinion applies with like effect to this case, because the bank failed February 27, 1933, and the complaint was filed May 29, 1936.

Also, what we have said relative to the application of the full faith and credit clause of our Federal Constitution, art. 4, § 1, applies to this case. In this case the parties have argued this latter proposition at greater length than in the companion cases referred to, and evidently the trial court in its decision felt it was bound under the terms of the full faith and credit rule to render judgment for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the fact that the bank failed on the date above mentioned.

For this reason, we will amplify somewhat what we have heretofore said in respect to the full faith and credit rule as applied to these cases.

To state the cases here under review, is to demonstrate that the constitutional provision does not apply. The controlling factor is the date when the obligation was created. Having determined when the obligation was created, then we apply the time factor of our section 359, Code of Civil Procedure. In other words, the plaintiff in these cases brings with him his cause of action from the State of Ohio, and in the State of California we apply to that cause of action our statute of limitations.

[1] It cannot be seriously contended that the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution denies the right to any state to enact and enforce a reasonable statute of limitations as to causes of action presented to the courts of that state. This is elementary law.

[2] It is equally elementary that the law of the place where an action is brought governs as to the remedy, regardless of the law where the obligation arose.

"It is a universal principle that the forum governs the limitation of actions within its borders and that laws controlling limitations are part of the law of every forum. Such laws, subject to exceptions which are discussed hereinafter, are universally held to affect the remedy; and therefore, in the absence of a statute of the forum changing the rule, the statutes of limitation of the place where the action is brought and the remedy is sought to be enforced, and not those of the place where the contract was made, the right in tort arose, or the plaintiff resides, or of the domicile of one or the other of the persons affected by the litigation, control in the event of a conflict of laws. In short, the lex fori determines the time within which a cause of action shall be enforced." 11 Am.Jur., p. 505. (Italics ours.)

[3] There is nothing in the full faith and credit clause which gives to judgments or laws of sister states greater force than our own laws and judgments. In applying the full faith and credit clause to judgments of sister states, we are not required to give greater faith and credit to said judgments than to those of the courts of this state. Hammell v. Britton, 19 Cal.2d 72, 119 P.2d 333.

[4, 5] Respondent argues at length that, under the full faith and credit clause, our California courts must enforce the finding of the Ohio superintendent of banks in which he assessed the liability of the defendant stockholder. If the statute law of Ohio giving to the superintendent of banks this exclusive power had been in effect on the date this bank failed, we would then have to meet this question. This is not necessary because, under the facts in this case, the bank failed February 27, 1933, and the statute was amended March 31, 1933, for the first time giving the Ohio superintendent of banks this power.

Some decisions of the Ohio Court of Appeals state that before the statute was amended there was an exclusive power implied in the superintendent of banks to levy the assessment. As we have heretofore stated, the case of Snider v. United Banking & Trust Co., 124 Ohio St. 375, 178 N.E. 840, formulated the Ohio rule which it is our duty to follow in this case. In so following that rule of the Supreme Court of Ohio, we do not violate the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution of the United States.

The judgment is reversed.

WARD, Justice.

An appeal from portions of a decree of settlement of final account and of final distribution in the matter of the estate of Mollie Carter, deceased, distributing to her daughter Agnes Carter all of her estate except that assigned by the daughter to other parties, including appellant, during probate.

Mollie Carter died April 6, 1940, leaving a holographic will dated January 2, 1933. Her heirs at law included Agnes Carter, two sons, Thomas O. Carter and John J. Carter, and a grandson, William Arthur Carter, Jr., appellant, the minor son of William Arthur Carter, Sr., a predeceased son of the testatrix who died after the making of her will.

The will designated by name the daughter and the three sons, but contained no direct reference to appellant grandchild. It contained specific devises and bequests to the daughter and provided: "My other property I possess I give and bequeath to my three sons." Thereafter appear bequests of three hundred dollars each to two clergymen for religious purposes. Finally, one hundred dollars was directed to be paid to any member of the family who might contest the will. The record does not disclose what "other property I possess" may have existed at the time of the execution of the will. At the time of the testatrix's death, however, some seven years later, the estate comprised only the real and personal property devised and bequeathed to the daughter. The court found "that there is no other property in said estate." Nevertheless, the two surviving sons and the grandson, appellant herein, received under the decree of distribution certain real property assigned them by the daughter; likewise each clergyman received the specific sum designated in the will.

It is the contention of appellant that the portions of the decree of distribution appealed from deny to him the share of his grandmother's estate to which, under the provisions of section 90 of the Probate Code, he was entitled as a pretermitted heir. This section provides: "When a testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, whether born before or after the making of the will or before or after the death of the testator, and such child or issue are unprovided for by any settlement, and have not had an equal proportion of the testator's property bestowed on them by way of advancement, unless it appears from the will that such omission was intentional, such child or such issue succeeds to the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate." Section 91 of the Probate Code sets forth the manner and means by which a pretermitted heir may obtain an apportionment of the estate. Section 92 provides: "If a devisee or legatee dies during the lifetime of the testator, the testamentary disposition to him fails, unless an intention appears to substitute another in his place; except that when any estate is devised or bequeathed to any kindred of the testator, and the devisee or legatee dies before the testator, leaving lineal descendants, or is dead at the time the will is executed, but leaves lineal descendants surviving the testator, such descendants take the estate so given by the will in the same manner as the devisee or legatee would have done had he survived the testator."

The historical background of the above sections will be found in Re Estate of Todd, 17 Cal.2d 270, 109 P.2d 913, where all of the property was bequeathed to the wife and the son of the testator, share and share alike, "or to the survivor of them." The son predeceased the testator; no settlement or advancement was made the grandchild; he was not mentioned in the will and it did not appear that the failure to mention him was intentional. The court there said (pages 275, 276 of 17 Cal.2d, page 916 of 109 P.2d): "In our opinion it was the testator's intention to substitute respondent Inez Todd as sole legatee under his will in the event of the death of his son, Addison Todd. This would preclude appellant from taking any portion of the estate under section 92 of the Probate Code. However, if appellant could under the terms of the will have succeeded to the share of the estate devised or bequeathed to his father under the provisions of said section 92, he would be barred from sharing in the estate as a pretermitted heir under the provisions of section 90 of said code." The case at bar presents a problem not present in the Todd case. The father herein was mentioned and "provided for" and under section 92 his son would "take the estate so given by the will in the same manner" as the father would have done had he survived the testator.

[1-4] In the Todd case the court determined the intention of the testator from the terms of the will. On the question of such interpretation, the document "speaks" and takes effect from the date of the death of the testator (In re Estate of Babb, 200 Cal. 252, 252 P. 1039), whose intent may be determined only as of the date of the execution of the instrument. In re Estate of Painter, 150 Cal. 498, 89 P. 98, 11 Ann.Cas. 760; In re Estate of McCurdy, 197 Cal. 276, 240 P. 498; In re Estate of Lawrence, 17 Cal.2d 1, 108 P.2d 893; Page on Wills, Lifetime Ed., vol. 2, p. 816. Ordinarily extrinsic facts are not admissible to explain provisions in a will, but if surrounding facts and circumstances may be considered, then it is not the conditions existing at the time of probate proceedings but rather those at the time of the execution of the will that may throw light upon the intent of the testator, unless it is made plain by the terms of the instrument that such testator considered circumstances which in the ordinary course of events would probably occur.

[5] On the day the will was made the sons were living. Testatrix was not required to provide for appellant grandson at that time. It may be conceded that she fulfilled all the requirements of section 90 when she referred to her children in her will. The question arises: When the father of appellant died, was testatrix required to provide for the latter, or specifically disinherit him if she did not care to have him receive a pretermitted heir's share? In the Todd case, the court said, page 273 of 17 Cal.2d, page 915 of 109 P.2d: "We believe it is quite obvious that the legislature intended to change the law and the rule announced in the Barter case [In re Barter's Estate, 86 Cal. 441, 25 P. 15] to provide that if the issue of a testator's child is not provided for by the will, such issue shall succeed to a share of the estate by intestate succession the same as if no will had been made * * *." This language may not be construed to mean that it is absolutely necessary to rewrite a will in case of the death of a testator's child in order to provide for the child's lineal descendants if the latter are provided for under section 92. If the testatrix provided for the son without limitation, in the event he predeceased her his child would occupy the position of the parent and take under section 92. In re Estate of Walker, 196 Cal. 323, 237 P. 1070. It becomes important therefore in the present case to examine the provisions of the will, and if uncertainty appears therein to determine the intent of the testatrix.

[6] From the terms of the instrument it is clear that the testatrix desired primarily that "my dear and only daughter Agnes" be protected to the extent that if any member of the family should contest "against my wishes * * * I bequeath them One Hundred Dollars only." That the estate was in fact, or that testatrix believed at the time of the execution of the will that it was, in excess of the amount devised to her daughter, is apparent from the bequests to the clergyman and to any contestant of the will, which give color to the conclusion that the value of other property "I possess" was in fact something substantial, but assuming it to be only slight, in the sense that it may have been personal effects, etc., still it was a bequest to the father of appellant, to which the son would be entitled under section 92. If there was a possibility of inheritance under that section, appellant would be barred as a pretermitted heir from sharing in the estate under the provisions of section 90. In re Estate of Todd, supra.

[7] In view of the terms of the will bequeathing "other property I possess" to his father, it does not appear that the omission to include the grandson was intentional. There was no provision, as in the Estate of Todd, that the predeceased child's share should go to a specific survivor. Under the circumstances here, whatever inheritance was devised or bequeathed to the son of the testator descended to her grandson upon the death of his father, which precludes appellant's claim as a pretermitted heir under section 90. In re Estate of Todd, supra.

The difficulty in the present case is that on the closing of the estate there was nothing to distribute to the grandson, save what he received under assignment from testator's daughter, which he did not receive as a lineal descendant of a predeceased legatee. The test is not the value, nominal or otherwise, that one may receive, but rather whether, under the terms of the will, it would be proper to decree to appellant any right or interest, present or future. The decree provides: "To Thomas O. Carter, John J. Carter and William Arthur Carter, Jr., in equal shares, all property not now known or discovered which may belong to said estate, or in which said estate may have an interest."

[8] Under the provisions of section 90, unless a testator omits to provide for a child or for the issue of any deceased child, such person may not inherit as a pretermitted heir. "The words 'omits to provide' * * * mean simply an omission to make a provision in the will, and have no reference to the pecuniary value of such provision." In re Estate of Callaghan, 119 Cal. 571, 574, 51 P. 860, 861, 39 L.R.A. 689.

In view of the above conclusions, it is not necessary to consider other points raised by respondent. The portions of the decree of settlement of final account and of final distribution appealed from are affirmed.

Defendant, a woman who was neither an on-sale licensee nor the wife of a man who held an on-sale license, was charged with mixing alcoholic beverages at an on-sale licensee's place of business, in violation of section 56.4 of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act. Act 3796, Deering's General Laws 1937. The pertinent portions of that section are as follows: "Every person who uses the services of a female in mixing alcoholic beverages * * * on any premises used for the sale of alcoholic beverages for consumption on the premises, or any female who renders such services on such premises, is guilty of a misdemeanor * * *.

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to the mixing of alcoholic beverages * * * by any on-sale licensee nor to the mixing of such beverages by the wife of any licensee on the premises for which her husband holds an on-sale license."

Defendant challenged the constitutionality of the section on the ground that it violates section 18 of Article XX, of the State Constitution, which provides that "No person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation, or profession." She further contends the section is unconstitutional in that it abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens and denies to those whose employment is prohibited equal protection of the laws; and, finally, that it is unreasonable and arbitrary to impose a penalty upon the "mixing" only of alcoholic beverages. Defendant's position was sustained and the complaint dismissed. The People have appealed from that ruling. In our opinion the Court was in error and the order must be reversed.

[1-4] It has long been uniformly held that there is no inherent right in a citizen to engage in the business of selling alcoholic beverages (Ritz v. Lightston, 1909, 10 Cal.App. 685, 689, 103 P. 363; State Board of Equalization v. Superior Court, 1935, 5 Cal.App.2d 374, 377, 42 P.2d 1076; Irvine v. State Board of Equalization, 1940, 40 Cal.App.2d 280, 284, 104 P.2d 847; Crowley v. Christensen, 1890, 137 U.S. 86, 11 S.Ct. 13, 34 L.Ed. 620), and that "The regulation of that business is governed by legal principles different from those which apply to what may be termed inherently lawful avocations." Martin v. Board of Supervisors, 1933, 135 Cal.App. 96, 101, 26 P.2d 843, 845. The governing authority may, therefore, in the exercise of the police power for the protection of the public morals, health and safety, grant the privilege of selling alcoholic beverages upon such terms and conditions as it may determine. See Ritz v. Lightston, supra, at page 688, of 10 Cal.App., 103 P. 363, quoting from Crowley v. Christensen, supra. In recognition of these principles our Supreme Court has held in Ex parte Hayes, 1893, 98 Cal. 555, 33 P. 337, 338, 20 L.R.A. 701, that the above quoted constitutional provision (§ 18 of Art. XX) "does not * * * operate as a limitation upon the power of the state * * * to prescribe the conditions upon which the business of retailing intoxicating liquors shall be permitted to be carried on, or in regulating the manner in which such business shall be conducted." The ordinance under attack in this case and which was sustained by the Court provided, among other things, that no license should be granted to sell intoxicating liquors in any place where women were employed to wait on the patrons. That one who formerly employed women to wait on the trade was thereby shown to be unfit to have a liquor license was held in Foster v. Police Commissioners, 1894, 102 Cal. 483, 37 P. 763, 41 Am.St.Rep. 194. The only case out of line with these decisions is that of In re Maguire, 1881, 57 Cal. 604, 40 Am.Rep. 125. But that case cannot now, in view of these subsequent decisions, be regarded as representing the law of this state. See Adams v. Cronin, 1902, 29 Colo. 488, 69 P. 590, 63 L.R.A. 61 for discussion to the effect that the Maguire case was overruled by the Hayes and Foster cases. The decision in the Hayes case is supported by the further reason that this constitutional provision, like all other constitutional guaranties, "is subject to such reasonable regulations as may be imposed in the exercise of police powers." Matter of Application of Miller, 1912, 162 Cal. 687, 692, 124 P. 427, 428.

[5] The argument that the section forbidding women employees to mix drinks abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens and denies equal protection of the laws to those whose employment is prohibited, overlooks two fundamental propositions: (1) that the business here involved is one of privilege and not of right; and (2) that the classification of women with respect to mixing drinks is reasonable. When these two propositions are established, as we believe they are in this case, the force of the argument vanishes. See In re Considine, C.C., 1897, 83 F. 157; People v. Case, 1908, 153 Mich. 98, 116 N.W. 558, 18 L.R.A.,N.S., 657; City of

[6] Furthermore, a particular class of women has no constitutional right to be employed in a particular business when the effect of such employment would be detrimental to society. The section of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act under consideration divides women into three different classes with respect to the privilege of mixing drinks in a place having an on-sale license, and gives the privilege to two of these groups while denying it to the third. It seems to us that there is a fair and substantial basis for the classification. As to the group of women who are licensees, the Board of Equalization has direct supervision over them with the power to revoke or suspend their licenses, so it is not reasonable to assume that such a licensee is going to do anything improper and thus lose her license and business. As to the wife of a licensee, she is more nearly in the position of a licensee than in that of an employee and her presence may fairly be considered to be a restraint upon impropriety. A mere employee would not have the same incentive to prevent improprieties that either a licensee or the wife of a licensee would naturally have. Furthermore, the legislature may well have concluded that it would be an unwholesome influence upon the women themselves, the general public, and upon our young people, to permit women generally to act as bartenders. The precise classification here involved was approved in City of Hoboken v. Goodman, supra.

[7] The final argument that the section is invalid on the ground that it is unreasonable and arbitrary to impose a penalty upon the "mixing" only of alcoholic beverages is without merit. The fact that the section might have gone further and prohibited women employees from serving as well as mixing drinks does not render it invalid. It is not necessary for a penal statute to cover the entire legally permissible field in order to be valid. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Federal Reserve Bank, 1922, 262 U.S. 649, 43 S.Ct. 651, 67 L.Ed. 1157, 1164, 30 A.L.R. 635; James-Dickinson Farm Mortg. Co. v. Harry, 1927, 273 U.S. 119, 47 S.Ct. 308, 71 L.Ed. 569, 574; Matter of Application of Miller, supra, 162 Cal. pages 697, 698, 124 P. 427.

The order is reversed, with directions to the trial court to vacate its order dismissing the complaint and to overrule the motion to dismiss the same.

Affirmative relief will only be granted a bona fide purchaser where there has been fraud, or what equity regards as fraud, on the part of the person holding prior title or interest, and against whom the affirmative relief is granted.

Belli & Leahy, by M. Leahy, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

W. F. Kiessig and Edmund D. Buckley, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

McWILLIAMS, Judge.

The court granted a re-hearing in this case for the purpose of giving further consideration to the doctrine laid down in Smith v. Yule, 31 Cal. 180, 89 Am.Dec. 167, and the other cases, which under varying circumstances, have followed and applied the principle of that case.[1] The consideration that we have given to the subject following the re-hearing has led us to the conclusion that our original judgment of reversal was correct. The doctrine of the Yule case, supra, and of the cases that have followed it, has been stated as follows: "In order that possession by one other than the vendor of real property may constitute or establish notice to subsequent purchasers it must be hostile to and inconsistent with the record title. If the apparent possession is consistent with the record title, it is presumed to be referable thereto, and the purchaser need make no further inquiry, but may rely on the record title." 25 Cal.Jur. p. 840.

On the basis of this doctrine respondents argue that, as bona fide purchasers, they were not bound by the supplemental agreement between appellant and its lessor. Of that supplemental agreement which modified the lease in the matter of the rent to be paid, respondents concededly knew nothing at the time they purchased the property. Hence, they argue, they may enforce the provisions of the original lease and exact the rent provided for therein. In considering the situation it must be borne in mind that respondents do not contend that they are seeking to enforce the terms of the actual agreement that existed between appellant and its lessor at the time that respondents bought the property. They, impliedly at least, consider that the supplemental agreement would prevail as between the parties to it. Nor do they claim that any estoppel exists against appellant which will preclude appellant from invoking the terms of the supplemental agreement. Instead they contend in effect that since they were bona fide purchasers, having bought the property without notice of the supplemental agreement they are in a position to enforce the terms of the original lease regardless of the fact of its subsequent modification. That contention, in our opinion, overlooks the true nature of the doctrines of notice and of bona fide purchaser.

[1-3] The absence of notice is an essential requirement in order that one may be regarded as a bona fide purchaser. As a bona fide purchaser one who buys property is protected against the claims and interests of third persons. Boone v. Chiles, 35 U.S. 177, 210, 10 Pet. 177, 9 L.Ed. 388, cited and followed in Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 167, 3 P. 641. As stated in the Idaho case of Ewald v. Hufton, 31 Idaho 373, 173 P. 247, 248: "The doctrine of bona fide purchaser is peculiarly available for purposes of defense. * * * This defense can be maintained only in favor of a title, though it may be defective, which a bona fide purchaser has, and it is not available for the purpose of creating a title." To the same effect, see Manistique Lumber Co. v. Lovejoy, 55 Mich. 189, 20 N.W. 899, and cases therein cited. Also see 66 Cor.Jur. pp. 1189, 1190. As has at times been said by the courts the doctrine constitutes a shield and not a sword.

It is upon this theory, namely, that the doctrine constitutes a defense to a bona fide purchaser of property, that most of our California cases have been decided. Thus in the Yule case, supra, it was held that the plaintiff who sued to quiet title could not prevail and judgment in her favor was reversed because the defendant had been shown to be a bona fide purchaser. Although the plaintiff was in possession of the property purchased by the defendant at the time of such purchase the court held that since her possession was consistent with the record title, defendant was not put on inquiry and hence he was to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser with all the rights pertaining to such purchaser. To the same effect were the holdings of the Supreme Court in the cases of Schumacher v. Truman, 134 Cal. 430, 66 P. 591; and Aden v. City of Vallejo, 139 Cal. 165, 72 P. 905.

[4] It is true that in certain of our California cases the plaintiff has prevailed in actions in which he sought affirmative relief. But those cases come within recognized exceptions to the general rule. As stated by Mr. Pomeroy (Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed., Sec. 779): "The peculiar theory upon which equity acts towards a bona fide purchaser seems of necessity to imply that he should be a defendant. There are a few special circumstances, however, in which the theory, consistently followed out, requires that he should be aided by affirmative relief. When these circumstances are carefully examined, it will be found that the fraud, or what equity regards as fraud, of the party holding the prior title or interest, and against whom the affirmative relief is granted, is usually, if not always, the ground upon which the court interposes on behalf of the subsequent bona fide purchaser."

Thus in the case of Garber v. Gianella, 98 Cal. 527, 33 P. 458, the plaintiff prevailed as a bona fide purchaser over the defendant who claimed a leasehold interest in the property involved. The circumstances shown, said the court, estopped the defendant from asserting his interest since he had had every opportunity to give the plaintiff notice of his lease and had failed so to do. Affirmative relief has also, at times, been extended to a bona fide purchaser in a suit to remove a cloud from his title in a situation where the cloud constituted an apparent lien, which in reality was inoperative against the purchaser. See Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed., Sec. 783.

Respondents do not bring themselves within any of the exceptions to the general rule. In the absence of any contractual liability resting on appellant to pay the rent sued for, and in the absence of other circumstances justifying the granting to respondents the relief they ask against appellant we remain of the opinion that the lower court erred in rendering judgment in favor of respondents. Of course, it does not follow from our holding in this case that if respondents were defrauded in the transaction through misrepresentation or failure to disclose the true state of the property sold they are without remedy. But the question as to the rights that respondents might have against their vendor is not before us.

Our former opinion will stand except for the closing paragraph which is ordered stricken therefrom.

That civil service employee, who was hospitalized during probationary period, received disability compensation while in hospital, was insufficient to show that employee did not perform such services while in hospital, so that time spent in hospital would not be included in determining termination of probationary period, where record was not clear whether compensation was for partial or total disability.

5. Officers ⇐11

The acceptance of compensation by civil service employee during period that he was hospitalized did not "estop" employee from asserting that while in hospital he performed such services that period of hospitalization did not extend his probationary period.

CURTIS, Justice.

Petitioner has appealed from a judgment of the trial court refusing to grant a writ of mandamus to require respondents to reinstate him to the permanent position of Personnel Record Officer of the California National Guard, with full and permanent civil service status therein, and to pay his fixed salary of $140 per month from March 4, 1939.

On March 1, 1938, petitioner received a temporary appointment to the position in question. On August 13, 1938, after qualifying by examination, he was appointed to the permanent position. This appointment was subject to a probationary period of six months under rule nine, section 1, of the Rules and Regulations of the State Personnel Board. On September 11, 1938, while engaged in the performance of the duties of his position, petitioner sustained a back injury, which cause his hospitalization from that date to October 24, 1938. Upon the advice and at the direction of his superiors, petitioner continued to perform a part of his official duties while he was confined in the hospital. During this period petitioner did not receive his salary but was paid disability compensation from the State Compensation Insurance Fund. After dismissal from the hospital petitioner continued to perform the duties of his position until February 10, 1939. On that date the new Adjutant General, who had taken office on January 4, 1939, served petitioner with a letter dated February 9, 1939, advising him that his services would be terminated on March 4, 1939. This letter contained the reasons for rejection, as required by section 122 of the State Civil Service Act, St.1937, p. 2100, and a copy was sent to the Personnel Board and received by it on February 11, 1939. A Report of Separation and a Report of Performance were filed with the Personnel Board on February 20, 1939. Neither of these reports was served on petitioner. Petitioner was paid up to and including the 3rd day of March, 1939, although he was prohibited from performing the duties of his position from February 10, 1939.

On this appeal it is contended that there was no rejection of the services of petitioner within the probationary period, and further, that the appointing authority did not comply with the statutory method of dismissal.

The probationary period began on August 13, 1938. Without interruption that period of probationary service normally would have been terminated on February 12, 1939. There was, however, a six-week period in which petitioner was hospitalized. Therefore, the first question to be determined is whether the date of termination of the probationary period was extended to March 20, 1939, because of the period of hospitalization.

[1, 2] The object and purpose of a probationary period is to supplement the work of the civil service examiners in passing on the qualifications and eligibility of the probationer. During such period the appointive power is given the opportunity to observe the conduct and capacity of the probationer, and if, in the opinion of that power, the probationer is not fitted to discharge the duties of the position, then he may be discharged by the summary method provided for in the Civil Service Act before he acquires permanent civil service status. See Neuwald v. Brock, 12 Cal.2d 662, 670, 86 P.2d 1047; Note, 131 A.L.R. 383.

In the instant case the record discloses that petitioner's superiors, General Morehead, who was at that time the Adjutant General, and Colonel Arndt, the executive officer of the National Guard, came to visit petitioner in the hospital soon after the accident and made arrangements whereby he was to carry on the duties of his office. During the period petitioner kept in daily contact with his office by telephone and in this way continued to supervise the work being done in the office. Office correspondence was brought out to petitioner by messenger service. Some dictation was given by petitioner at the hospital relative to office matters, and other work was written out in longhand by petitioner, sent to the office, typed and returned to petitioner for his signature. An electric adding machine was furnished petitioner so that he could continue to audit current accounts. General Morehead and Colonel Arndt came to the hospital frequently and General Morehead testified that petitioner performed the duties of his office satisfactorily. The trial court found "that it is true that during the period of said confinement at said hospital petitioner as said Personnel Record Officer and as ordered and directed by and acting under the supervision of the adjutant general of the State of California, performed part but not all of his duties."

[3] From these facts it is clear that the purposes and objects of the probationary period were fulfilled during the time petitioner was in the hospital. Under such circumstances that time should not be deducted from the probationary service. This conclusion should not be interpreted to mean that in every case the probationary period terminates after six months' elapsed time from the date of appointment. It is possible, as urged by respondents, that a situation might arise in which a probationer because of illness would be forced to sever all relations with his office and duties a few days after his appointment. If such absence continued for a period of six months, the purpose of the probationary period would be defeated if that period were held to be terminated after six months' actual elapsed time from the date of appointment. In such a situation the time spent away from the position should not be included in determining the termination of the probationary period. However, as previously shown, petitioner here continued to do his work under direct supervision of the appointive power during his absence from the office. His work while in the hospital met the approval of General Morehead, the adjutant general, who immediately upon petitioner's recovery from his injury continued him in the position to which he had been appointed. It thus appears that full opportunity to observe petitioner's conduct during his entire probationary period was afforded his superiors.

[4] The fact that petitioner did not receive his salary but received disability compensation during the period of hospitalization is not necessarily determinative of the question of whether he performed services during that period. The record is not entirely clear on the question of compensation. There is evidence and, in fact, the attorney for petitioner stipulated that "he [petitioner] received compensation," but the attorney stated that he didn't know whether it was for total disability. Petitioner himself, in answer to a question as to whether he received compensation for total disability, stated that he didn't know. Respondents didn't introduce any documentary evidence of a rating or an award by the Industrial Accident Commission. There being no evidence that the commission had determined after a hearing that petitioner was totally disabled, the trial court was free to find that petitioner had performed some of the duties of his position while he was in the hospital. The court did so find, and this finding is supported by undisputed evidence.

[5] Respondents also contend that petitioner, having accepted compensation, is estopped from asserting that he performed the duties of his position during the period of hospitalization. Here again, the contention is based on the assumption that petitioner knowingly accepted compensation for total disability. As previously stated, this assumption is not supported by the evidence. If a claim were now being made for salary for the time spent in the hospital, respondents might properly plead estoppel, but here petitioner is simply asserting that he performed sufficient of the duties of his position while in the hospital to include that time as a part of his probationary service. Under such circumstances and keeping in mind the purpose of the probationary period, there appears to be no place for an estoppel argument.

Our conclusion that the time spent in the hospital should not be deducted from the period of probationary service in no way conflicts with any statements made in the case of Ballf v. Civil Service Commission, 43 Cal.App.2d 211, 110 P.2d 478, cited by respondents. The principal statement in that case relied on by respondents is the following, at page 216, of 43 Cal. App.2d, at page 480 of 110 P.2d: "The unequivocal language used in section 148 [a section of the Charter of the City of San Francisco similar to Section 118 of the State Civil Service Act and the rules adopted thereunder] shows, however, that actual service, rather than constructive, is required." Such statement has no application to the instant situation, for here there is no question of constructive service, but, as previously discussed, petitioner performed the actual duties of his position during the period of hospitalization.

[6] Having concluded that the period of probationary service terminated on February 12, 1939, the question remains whether petitioner was properly rejected on or before that date. The letter of rejection dated February 9, 1939, and served on petitioner on February 10, 1939, opened with the sentence "Effective March 4, 1939, your services as Personnel Officer, California National Guard, will be terminated." [Italics added.] The reasons for termination were then stated and the letter concluded with the following sentence: "You will be allowed your accumulated vacation from February 10th to March 3, 1939, inclusive." Petitioner argues that this notice of rejection, although given before the termination of the probationary service on February 12, 1939, was not made effective until after that date or on March 4, 1939, and that therefore he became a permanent employee, subject to dismissal only by the procedure provided for under section 173 of the Civil Service Act, which procedure was admittedly not followed.

In view of the italicized portion of the opening sentence, there would seem to be little that could be said in opposition to petitioner's contention. However, respondents contend and the trial court concluded that petitioner was rejected on February 9, 1939. In support of this contention and conclusion respondents refer to rule thirteen, section 1, of the Rules and Regulations of the State Personnel Board, which provides, in part, that after six months of continuous service a civil service employee is entitled to a vacation on the basis of one and one-quarter working days for each month or major portion of a month of service up to the first of January next following the completion of such six months of service, and thereafter a vacation of fifteen working days per year. Under this rule it is claimed that petitioner, having commenced work on a temporary basis on March 1, 1938, was entitled to fifteen days' vacation time. Reference is then made to the last sentence of the letter of rejection, which stated: "You will be allowed your accumulated vacation from February 10th to March 3, 1939, inclusive." It is then argued that the rejection was effective immediately, i. e., on February 9, 1939, but that it, of necessity, had to be phrased in the future tense because of the accumulated vacation period. Petitioner challenges the number of days' vacation to which respondents assert he was entitled; however, that issue need not be decided here. Regardless of the accumulated vacation time, the fact is that petitioner's services were not terminated until after February 12, 1939, the final day of the probationary period. The notice of rejection on February 9, 1939, did not state: "Your services are terminated." It stated: "Effective March 4, 1939, your services * * * will be terminated." The roster card listed the date of dismissal as March 4, 1939. The Report of Separation stated March 4, 1939, as the date of separation from service. Petitioner was paid salary upon pay rolls on which he was certified as holding his position under civil service until March 4, 1939. No amount of argument can change the future tense to the present tense so that the rejection may be deemed to have been made prior to the termination of the probationary period. If notice of a future dismissal within the six months' probationary period were all that was required under section 122 of the Civil Service Act, then the probationary status could be extended indefinitely.

[7] Assuming that petitioner did have some vacation time coming, such fact would not have prevented a present rejection on February 10, 1939. The question of a probationer's right to accumulated vacation time on dismissal is not directly before us on this appeal because petitioner is not claiming that he was deprived of any vacation time. However, it might be observed in this regard that there seems to be no reason why a state employee at the time of his dismissal could not properly claim a sum equivalent to the accumulated vacation time due him. Section 150 of the Civil Service Act and the rules of the Personnel Board established thereunder become a part of the contract of employment, and after the time of service required, the vacation period or the money equivalent thereof becomes a right under the terms of his employment.

[8, 9] It may be true that respondent Farrell intended an immediate rejection on February 9, 1939, but, as previously pointed out, there was no such rejection accomplished by the notice given. A civil service probationer is entitled to have the statutory procedure for dismissal strictly followed. Brown v. State Personnel Board, 43 Cal.App.2d 70, 110 P.2d 497; Nilsson v. State Personnel Board, 25 Cal. App.2d 699, 78 P.2d 467. The procedure here required rejection within the six months' probationary period. This procedure was not followed and the mere intent to dismiss within the period was not sufficient. A rejection not having been accomplished within the probationary period, no dismissal was effected. Brown v. State Personnel Board, supra; Kelly v. State Personnel Board, 31 Cal.App.2d 443, 88 P.2d 264. Therefore, the trial court erred in refusing to issue the writ of mandate ordering petitioner's reinstatement.

[10] Petitioner has asked for his accrued salary from March 4, 1939. The record fails to disclose what other employment, if any, petitioner has engaged in subsequent to that date. If he has had some gainful employment, it is only equitable and just that any remuneration received from such employment be deducted from the accrued salary due him. See Kelly v. State Personnel Board, supra.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order appealed from are reversed and the trial court is ordered to issue its writ of mandate requiring the reinstatement of petitioner with accrued salary from March 4, 1939, less any sums received by petitioner as salary from employment subsequent to that date. What sums, if any, petitioner has received should be determined by further appropriate proceedings in the trial court.

EDMONDS, Justice (dissenting).

I agree that the petitioner's period of probationary service terminated on February 12, 1939, but, as I read the record, legally effective action was taken before that date to dismiss him from the civil service.

The letter of rejection is dated February 9, 1939, and was served on him the following day. At that time there had accumulated to the petitioner's credit a vacation of 15 working days. Sec. 150, Civil Service Act. In dismissing him, the adjutant general recognized his right to these days under the terms of the statute and a rule of the State Personnel Board, based upon it, which provides: "When an employee is separated from the service and has not been granted his vacation, he shall be entitled to unused portions of vacation accumulated from the previous year and to vacation on the basis of one and one-quarter days for each month or portion of a month of service from the first of the calendar year until the date of his separation, but not to exceed thirty working days." Sec. 4, rule 13.

The petitioner relies entirely upon the fact that the letter of dismissal fixes March 4th as the effective date of the termination of his services. But the letter, read in its entirety, clearly evidences the adjutant general's present intention on February 9th, within the probationary period, to discharge the petitioner. He stated that during the probationary period the petitioner "failed to carry the responsibilities and duties prescribed for this position" and that he found it necessary to take action "for the good of the service." But as the petitioner was then entitled to some vacation days, the termination date, so far as the petitioner's right to salary is concerned, was placed at the expiration of that vacation allowance. Under these circumstances, in my opinion, the adjutant general rejected the petitioner as an employee within the probationary period by notice, which included the reasons therefor, served and filed within that time.

The statute provides that a probationer may be rejected during the probationary period. It does not require that, in the event of a rejection, all relations between the probationer and the State are at that moment ended. There are certain incidents to his employment which may carry over. For example, there is no requirement that the employee be paid his accrued salary to the date of the rejection as a condition precedent to the rejection becoming effective. Failure to hand him his salary warrant with the notice of rejection would not invalidate the rejection. Similarly, accumulated vacation time is one of those incidents, which like unpaid salary, carries over, and the fact that a probationer may have accumulated vacation time to his credit at the end of the probationary period should not be held to affect the rejection if made during the statutory period and in accordance with the requirements laid down.

For these reasons, I believe the judgment should be affirmed.

In re BOGGS' ESTATE.

KING et al. v. BOGGS.

L. A. 17567.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 2, 1942.

1. Appeal and error ⇐989

The Supreme Court cannot make further inquiry with respect to findings of the trial court than to ascertain if there is any evidence of a substantial character which supports the findings, and if such is found, the findings must stand regardless of what evidence there may be opposed to findings.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

As against positive and direct evidence of a fact found by trial court, a mere conclusion or general statement is not sufficient to meet the definition of "substantial evidence" so as to justify an appellate court in disturbing the finding.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Substantial Evidence".

3. Executors and administrators ⇐59

Where executors of estate of decedent's judgment creditor filed objections to first account current of decedent's executrix, evidence did not support finding that decedent was solvent at the time of transferring property to his daughter.

4. Insolvency ⇐24

"Insolvency", in its popular and general sense, is used to denominate the insufficiency of the entire property and assets of an individual to pay his debts.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Insolvency".

5. Fraudulent conveyances ⇐298(1)

Under statute providing that any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, is fraudulent and void as to existing creditors, the concurrence of insolvency and a want of consideration furnish conclusive evidence of an intent to defraud existing creditors. Civ. Code, § 3442.

6. Executors and administrators ⇐59

Where executors of estate of decedent's judgment creditor filed objections to first account current of decedent's executrix, evidence did not support finding that there was consideration for transfers of property by decedent to his daughter, which transfers were made while decedent was insolvent, on theory that an agreement existed between decedent and daughter whereby decedent was to convey to daughter all property coming into his hands in consideration of daughter's acts in pledging shares of stock as security for decedent's loans from a bank.

7. Executors and administrators ⇐59

Evidence justified conclusion that transfers of property by insolvent judgment debtor to his daughter subsequent to a certain date were without consideration and that transfers were fraudulent and void as to existing creditors, and hence such property should have been included in accounting by debtor's executrix, who was the daughter, of assets of debtor's estate. Civ.Code § 3442.

8. Executors and administrators ⇐131

An assignee to which an insolvent judgment debtor assigned a lease as security for an indebtedness had no right to rent collected after expiration of lease from tenant who held over upon same terms as were in lease, and assignee was without authority to enter into an agreement with debtor's executrix respecting a division of such rent.

9. Executors and administrators ⇐115

Where monthly rental received from leased property covered property, part of which belonged to decedent's estate and part to decedent's executrix, individually, and rental was for the property as a whole, a division of the rent as between executrix, individually, and estate could only be made by executrix and estate, provided it was competent for such parties to enter into an agreement of apportionment.

10. Executors and administrators ⇐91

An executrix holds the property of her testator's estate as a "trustee".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Trustee".

11. Executors and administrators ⇐115

An executrix will not be permitted to deal with herself as an individual in any transaction concerning the property of her testator's estate. Civ.Code § 2230.

12. Trusts ⇐231(1)

Courts will not permit any investigation into the fairness of a transaction whereby a trustee deals with trust property in his individual capacity, or allow the trustee to show that the dealing was for best interest of beneficiary.

13. Executors and administrators ⇐115

The fairness of an executrix' apportionment between herself, individually, and decedent's estate of rent received from property, part of which belonged to estate and part to executrix, individually, could not be inquired into in proceedings wherein executors of estate of decedent's judgment creditor filed objections to executrix' first account current.

14. Executors and administrators ⇐115

An apportionment between executrix, individually, and decedent's estate of rent received from property, part of which belonged to estate and part to executrix, individually, could not be sustained, where apportionment was made by executrix, and it was beyond the power of a court to approve such a contract or transaction. Civ. Code § 2230.

15. Executors and administrators ⇐115

The illegality of an agreement between an executrix and the assignee of a lease, which had been assigned by decedent as security for an indebtedness, respecting division of income derived from leased property after tenant, upon expiration of lease, held over upon same terms as were in lease did not deprive executrix of the right to a reasonable rental for furniture, which was owned by executrix, individually, and which was in leased house, but executrix was bound to account for entire income derived from leased premises since date of expiration of lease, less reasonable rental value of furniture during such period.

16. Executors and administrators ⇐66

Realty owned by decedent and which was subject to a deed of trust executed by decedent as security for an indebtedness was properly included in inventory of decedent's estate and in executrix' first account current as an "asset" of estate, notwithstanding that realty was encumbered, and it was immaterial whether realty was ever in actual possession of executrix, where there was no contention that executrix did not have knowledge of it. Probate Code § 600.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Asset".

17. Executors and administrators ⇐111(6), 496(1)

The mere inclusion of encumbered property either in inventory of decedent's estate or in executrix' first account current, or in both, did not control probate court's action in fixing fees of executrix and her attorney.

18. Executors and administrators ⇐111(6), 496(1)

Whether the fees of an executrix and her attorney as fixed by probate court should be based upon actual value of decedent's property or upon value of property less encumbrances thereon depends upon other considerations than the mere listing of property in executrix' first account current.

19. Executors and administrators ⇐510(8)

The question of fees of an executrix and her attorney was not before Supreme Court on appeal from order settling executrix' first account current where probate court had made no order allowing fees to either executrix or attorney.

20. Courts ⇐99(1)

A refusal by probate court to strike out from executrix' first account current encumbered realty belonging to decedent's estate would have no effect upon the court's future action when the matter of fixing fees of executrix and her attorney came before the court.

CURTIS, Justice.

This is an appeal from an order of the superior court sitting in probate settling the first account current of the executrix of the last will and testament of Paul N. Boggs, deceased.

The facts essential to a clear understanding of the points presented here for determination are briefly as follows:

With money borrowed from the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles Paul N. Boggs, on August 21, 1928, purchased through the bank 254 shares of National Supply Company preferred stock. By direction of Mr. Boggs these certificates were transferred to the name of his daughter, Elizabeth B. Boggs, and she signed a collateral agreement pledging this stock with the bank as security for the loan to her father. On March 7, 1929, the same bank bought 500 shares of Union Oil Associates stock for the account of Mr. Boggs, who gave the bank his note for $24,362.50 to cover the purchase price. On March 31, 1929, 200 shares of the National Supply Company preferred stock held by the bank and standing in the name of Elizabeth B. Boggs were called, and Mr. Boggs requested the bank to apply the proceeds against the purchase of the 500 shares of Union Oil Associates stock and to have the certificates for the latter stock transferred to the name of his daughter. This was done, and Miss Boggs again signed a collateral pledge agreement covering the stock so transferred to her name.

About February 15, 1933, Paul N. Boggs resigned his position as vice-president of the Union Oil Company of California. On February 17, 1933, he transferred to his daughter $7,283.24, and a few months later he transferred to her 460 shares of stock of the Union Oil Company of California and an additional $3,700 in cash. Thereafter he transferred to her his equity in a piece of real property located at 1010 Selby Avenue, Los Angeles, and he permitted her to receive and retain as her own the rents from a piece of property located at 674 South New Hampshire Street, Los Angeles, and also from premises at 1015 North Roxbury Drive, Beverly Hills. On October 1, 1936, and just prior to his death, Paul N. Boggs leased this last-named piece of property for the term of one year at a monthly rental of $320, and he assigned the lease to the Farmers and Merchants National Bank as security for its loans to him. The bank also held a trust deed covering this property. As it undoubtedly had the right to do under the assignment of the one-year lease, the bank collected the rent, $125 of which it applied in reduction of Mr. Boggs' indebtedness and the balance, or $195, it paid to respondent for furniture she owned at the premises so leased.

Among Paul N. Boggs' creditors was Sarah Louise Clark, appellants' testatrix, to whom Mr. Boggs owed $35,000 on a note secured by a mortgage on the property located at 674 South New Hampshire Street, and also $8,500 on an unsecured promissory note. In April, 1934, Mrs. Clark accepted a deed to this mortgaged property in satisfaction of the $35,000 note, but Mr. Boggs still owed her $8,500, plus interest from August 5, 1933, on the unsecured promissory note. Mrs. Clark died on September 8, 1934. In February, 1935, the executors of her will brought an action against Paul N. Boggs on the unsecured promissory note, and on June 18, 1936, they obtained a judgment against him for $10,180.25, plus interest. Prior to the rendition of this judgment said executors commenced an action against Paul N. Boggs and his daughter, Elizabeth B. Boggs, attacking the aforementioned transfers made by him to his daughter after February 15, 1933, as fraudulent and void, all of such transfers having been made, so the executors claimed, at a time when Mr. Boggs was insolvent. Mr. Boggs died on October 20, 1936, a few days before this latter action was scheduled to go to trial. Elizabeth B. Boggs qualified as executrix of her father's will, and thereafter she filed her first account current, to which the executors of Mrs. Clark's will, appellants herein, filed objections.

In ordering the account approved the probate judge made the following findings: That Paul N. Boggs was solvent at all times at which the questioned transfers were made by him to his daughter, Elizabeth B. Boggs; that there was an agreement between Elizabeth B. Boggs and her father to the effect that he should transfer to her such property as might come into his hands in consideration of her signing the collateral agreements with the Farmers and Merchants National Bank, pledging the National Supply Company preferred stock and the Union Oil Associates stock as security for his loans from the bank; and that the transfers of property to her by him subsequent to February 15, 1933, were made on account of this agreement.

Appellants' objections to the settlement of the account involve the following matters:

1. The failure of respondent Elizabeth B. Boggs to list as assets of her father's estate the property transferred to her by him subsequent to February 15, 1933.

2. The retention by respondent of the sum of $195 per month as rental for the furniture which she owned and which was located in the house at 1015 North Roxbury Drive, for which property the monthly rental of $320 was collected.

3. The inclusion by respondent in her account as an asset of the estate real property which was subject to a deed of trust in favor of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles.

[1, 2] Appellants' first objection is predicated upon their claim that the transfers in question were fraudulent and void because they were made at a time when Paul N. Boggs was insolvent and they were not supported by a valuable consideration. In this connection appellants attack the aforementioned findings, and each of them, as being unsupported by the evidence. Fundamental in our consideration of the merits of this contention of appellants are the following well established legal principles relating to the question of conclusiveness of the findings of the trial court: The rule of law governing appellate procedure precludes this court from making further inquiry than to ascertain if there is any evidence of a substantial character which supports the finding, and if such be found, the finding should stand regardless of what evidence there might be opposed to the finding. However, there still remains the necessity that there be some support in the record for the finding, and that as against the positive and direct evidence of a fact a mere conclusion or general statement will not be sufficient to meet the definition of substantial or any evidence. 2 Cal.Jur. 918, et seq.

[3, 4] The finding that Paul N. Boggs was solvent at the time of the questioned transfers to his daughter, respondent herein, is wholly unsupported by the evidence. The record indisputably shows that during this entire period his liabilities exceeded the fair market value of his assets, and respondent so admits. It discloses that all of these transfers were made by Paul N. Boggs to his daughter after his income from the Union Oil Company had stopped by reason of his resignation therefrom on February 15, 1933; that he had then no present prospect of ever satisfying his obligations in full; that in December, 1933, a few months after Paul N. Boggs had transferred to his daughter the aforementioned cash and 460 shares of stock of the Union Oil Company of California, he wrote to appellants' testatrix suggesting that since he was without income and was unable to make any payments due her on the $35,000 promissory note she held against him, she take in satisfaction of this indebtedness the property located at 674 South New Hampshire Street, mortgaged as security for this obligation and valued at that time at $18,000; that because of these admitted financial difficulties of Paul N. Boggs, Mrs. Clark in April, 1934, accepted this offer and the property was accordingly deeded to her; that in January, 1935, Paul N. Boggs stated in a written memorandum that all collateral of any value owned by him was held by the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Los Angeles; that all of Paul N. Boggs' assets, consisting principally of realty and stocks and having an accurately determinable though fluctuating value, were at all times between February 15, 1933, and the time of his death, October 20, 1936, substantially less than the total amount of his liabilities; and that the deficiency as of the last-mentioned date, appearing in the first account current filed by the respondent as executrix, was approximately $70,000. Insolvency, in its popular and general sense, is used to denominate the insufficiency of the entire property and assets of an individual to pay his debts. Cain v. Richmond, 126 Cal.App. 254, 259, 14 P.2d 546. Measured by this definition, the uncontradicted evidence above recited relative to Paul N. Boggs' financial status demonstrates clearly that he was not solvent during the period under consideration.

[5] At the time the transfers in question were made the law provided that any transfer or encumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, was fraudulent and void as to existing creditors. Civil Code, § 3442. By virtue of this enactment the concurrence of insolvency and a want of consideration furnished conclusive evidence of an intent to defraud existing creditors. 12 Cal.Jur. pp. 1018-1019, § 60, and cases there cited. Accordingly, if the questioned transfers were made by way of gift, they are subject to attack as fraudulent, but if they were made for a valuable consideration and in partial satisfaction of Paul N. Boggs' obligation to respondent, as the probate court found, they are valid and must be sustained.

[6, 7] Examination of the record reveals that there is a total lack of evidence therein to support the finding of the court that an agreement existed between Paul N. Boggs and his daughter, Elizabeth B. Boggs, to the effect that he would convey to her all property coming into his hands in consideration of her pledging the shares of the National Supply Company preferred stock and the shares of the Union Oil Associates stock as security for his loans from the Farmers and Merchants National Bank. This finding of consideration presumably was based upon the theory that Paul N. Boggs' transfer of the 254 shares of National Supply Company stock to his daughter on August 21, 1928, was a valid completed gift, subject to the bank's lien by virtue of the pledge agreement executed by respondent; that respondent's act in allowing Paul N. Boggs to have the proceeds realized from the sale of 200 shares of this National Supply Company stock, called as of March 31, 1929, applied against the 500 shares of Union Oil Associates stock he had purchased through the bank on March 7, 1929, constituted consideration for the transfer of this latter stock to respondent's name on March 31, 1929, and in pursuance of this arrangement respondent signed the collateral pledge agreement covering this Union Oil Associates stock; and that all further transfers by Paul N. Boggs to his daughter, respondent herein, were made in consideration of her having pledged her stock, originally the gift of her father, as security for his indebtedness to the bank. This theory, however, is not sustained by the evidence. The record shows no more than that Paul N. Boggs, wishing on each of these occasions to give his daughter the stock purchased by him with money borrowed from the bank, had the stock transferred to her name on the aforementioned dates, and she, in recognition of the terms on which these gifts to her were made, executed the two collateral agreements necessary to secure her father's loans. The argument now advanced by respondent, that at the time she signed these agreements Paul N. Boggs, in consideration therefor, promised to transfer to her either the original pledged shares of stock, free of any lien, or other property of equal value, is not even substantiated by the most favorable interpretation possible of her own testimony at the hearing before the probate court. On direct examination of respondent, her counsel, apparently for the purpose of showing the connection between the transactions of 1928 and 1929 and the transfers made subsequent to February 15, 1933, asked respondent what, if anything, was ever said between her father and herself about the pledged stock, and she answered that "daddy regretted that because of his not having yet shaped his affairs to the point where he wished, that he could not have secured both my mother and me more than he had." This response does indicate that Paul N. Boggs was naturally concerned over his inability to provide for his family in the way he desired, but it certainly does not permit the inference that Paul N. Boggs promised at the time his daughter executed the pledge agreements in 1928 and 1929, that he in return would make to her future transfers of all property coming into his hands. The record clearly shows that when the 200 shares of National Supply Company stock were called, the bank had a prior right to all of the proceeds and, in fact, applied them on Paul N. Boggs' indebtedness to it. Then Paul N. Boggs, under the same conditions as governed the prior transfer to his daughter, made to respondent a substitute gift, namely, the 500 shares of Union Oil Associates stock, and as part of the terms of that gift she signed the pledge agreement to the bank to secure her father's loans. Under these circumstances the conclusion is inescapable that all of the transfers made by Paul N. Boggs to his daughter subsequent to February 15, 1933, were without consideration, and since the undisputed evidence discloses that at all times from this last-mentioned date to the day of his death Paul N. Boggs, the donor, was insolvent, the transfers in question must be declared fraudulent and void as to his existing creditors, of whom appellants' testatrix was one. Accordingly, such property must be included in the respondent's accounting of the assets of Paul N. Boggs' estate.

Appellants' second objection is directed against the probate court's approval of that part of respondent's account dealing with the apportionment of the monthly rental received for the property located at 1015 North Roxbury Drive. As above stated, Paul N. Boggs on October 1, 1936, a few weeks prior to his death, leased these premises for the period of one year for the sum of $320 per month, and as further security for his indebtedness, he assigned this lease to the Farmers and Merchants

National Bank, already the holder of a deed of trust on the real property at this location. The lease contained no provision relative to the division of the rental received for the dwelling house and the furniture subject to its terms. During this year the bank collected the monthly rental of $320, of which sum it retained $125 and the balance, or $195, it paid to respondent, who owned the furniture at the leased premises. As the rent for these premises for this year had all been assigned to the bank, the estate of Paul N. Boggs had no claim to any of it. It is therefore not involved in the present controversy. However, at the expiration of this lease and after September 30, 1937, the tenant continued to hold over upon the same terms as were contained in his prior lease of this property. As under the previous arrangement relative to the handling of the income derived from these premises and during the entire time covered by respondent's first account now before this court, the bank continued to collect the rent of $320 per month, of which amount it paid to respondent $195 and it kept $125. With reference to these monthly rental collections, respondent's account as executrix shows that she charged herself only with the sum of $125, the portion retained by the bank, and that she gave herself a credit in like amount. The remaining $195 received from the bank each month respondent appropriated to her own use. It is appellants' contention that even though respondent did own the furniture in the house at 1015 North Roxbury Drive, it was, nevertheless, her duty to account for the full amount of the rent collected from the tenant of this property since September 30, 1937, the day the lease assigned to the bank expired.

[8, 9] From these facts it is plain that the bank had no right to any of the rent it collected subsequent to this last-mentioned date, and that it likewise was without authority to enter into any agreement with respondent respecting a division or apportionment of such amount. As the monthly rental covered property part of which belonged to the estate and part to respondent individually, and as it was for the property as a whole, the division of that sum as between the two several owners of the rented property could only be made by the owners, provided it was legal and competent for such parties to enter into such an agreement of apportionment.

[10-12] It is well settled that an executrix holds the property of her testator's estate as a trustee. In re Heydenfeldt's Estate, 117 Cal. 551, 49 P. 713; Firebaugh v. Burbank, 121 Cal. 186, 53 P. 560. It is equally well settled that an executrix will not be permitted to deal with herself as an individual in any transaction concerning the trust property. Civil Code, § 2230. In Davis v. Rock Creek L., F. & M. Co., 55 Cal. 359, at page 364, 36 Am.Rep. 40, it is said: "The law, for wise reasons, will not permit one who acts in a fiduciary capacity thus to deal with himself in his individual capacity." The following cases are to the same effect: Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 29, 28 P. 788; Sims v. Petaluma Gas Light Co., 131 Cal. 656, 659, 63 P. 1011; Western States Life Ins. Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 191, 135 P. 496; In re Estate of Parker, 200 Cal. 132, 139, 251 P. 907, 49 A.L.R. 1025. In Wickersham v. Crittenden, supra, 93 Cal. at page 29, 28 P. at page 790, it is further stated in respect to a transaction wherein a trustee sought to deal with trust property: "Courts will not permit any investigation into the fairness or unfairness of the transaction, or allow the trustee to show that the dealing was for the best interest of the beneficiary." This language is quoted with approval in the case of Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 365, 78 P. 550, 104 Am. St.Rep. 42.

[13] While under these authorities the fairness of the apportionment here in controversy cannot be made the subject of inquiry in this action, it might not be amiss to mention the fact that the assessed value of the real property at 1015 North Roxbury Drive was $17,260 and that of the furniture at the same location was $3,000. Furthermore, the statement of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank as contained in the record shows that for some months prior to October 1, 1936, the bank collected $280 per month as rental for these premises and during this time paid to Elizabeth B. Boggs the sum of $80 per month, but after October 1, 1936, the bank received $320 per month as rent for the same property and paid to Elizabeth B. Boggs the sum of $195 per month.

[14] Under the above line of decision the apportionment of the rent by respondent between herself individually and the estate of her father, she being the executrix of his will, cannot be sustained. It is beyond the power of the court to approve such a contract or transaction. 6 Cal.Jur. 150; Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 P. 708, 9 L.R.A.,N.S., 568, 119 Am.St.Rep. 164, 11 Ann.Cas. 609; Eymann v. Wright, 177 Cal. 144, 169 P. 1037; Haley v. Bloomquist, 204 Cal. 253, 268 P. 365; Takeuchi v. Schmuck, 206 Cal. 782, 276 P. 345.

[15] However, while the challenged agreement or understanding between respondent and the bank respecting the division of the income derived from this property is illegal for the foregoing reasons, it does not follow that respondent should be deprived of a reasonable rental for her furniture during the period of time since September 30, 1937, the expiration date of the aforementioned assignment of the rentals to the bank. Accordingly, respondent should account for the entire income derived from these premises since September 30, 1937, less the reasonable rental value of her furniture during this period. It appears from the record that no claim was made before the probate court that the sum of $195 or any other amount was a reasonable rental for this furniture, and the court's approval of respondent's right to retain the amount of $195 per month as rental for her furniture was based entirely and solely upon the agreement made by respondent ostensibly with the bank but actually with herself. As this agreement was illegal, respondent, as above stated, is not entitled to take advantage of its terms. However, the illegality of the agreement in no way affects her right to receive a reasonable rental for her property, and a further hearing of this matter should be had in the probate court for the purpose of determining the reasonable rental value of her furniture for the period mentioned.

[16] Appellants' third and final objection, charging that the probate court erred in permitting the respondent as executrix to include in her account as an asset of the estate certain encumbered real property, is without merit. The fact that the premises known as 1015 North Roxbury Drive, Beverly Hills, and two parcels of land are subject to a deed of trust placed thereon by the decedent Paul N. Boggs in favor of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank as security for his indebtedness to the bank and for which debt the bank has filed its claim against the estate, does not preclude this property from being an asset of the estate. This property subject to said encumbrance was the property of Paul N. Boggs at the date of his death, at which time it became a part of "the estate of the decedent." It was properly included in the inventory of his estate returned by the executrix in compliance with section 600 of the Probate Code, which requires an executor or administrator to file an inventory and appraisement of the estate of his decedent which has come to his possession or knowledge. Whether or not this property was ever in the actual possession of the executrix is immaterial here, for there is no contention that she did not have knowledge of it. Assuming it was the duty of the executrix in rendering her correct account, to list therein all property of the estate undisposed of at the date thereof, the encumbered, as well as the unencumbered, property of the estate was rightly included in the list of property then in her hands.

[17, 18] Appellants' objection to the inclusion of this encumbered property in the executrix' first account no doubt was made upon the theory that for the purpose of fixing the fees of the executrix and those of her attorney, the probate court should not include this property in its determination of the value of the estate. The mere inclusion of encumbered property, however, either in the inventory or in the account, or in both, would not control the action of the probate court in fixing such fees. Whether the fees thus fixed should be based upon the actual value of the property or its value less encumbrances thereon would depend upon other considerations than the mere listing of the property in the account. In re Estate of Lampman, 15 Cal.2d 212, 100 P.2d 488.

[19, 20] The first account current in this estate was filed on November 24, 1937. An appeal from the order of settlement was taken by the present appellants, and the order, with one exception not necessary to mention at this time, was reversed on the ground [among others] that the probate court erred in allowing the sum of $1,000 to each the executrix and her attorney on account of their fees in said estate. The court held that said allowances were excessive. In re Estate of Boggs, 33 Cal.App. 2d 30, 90 P.2d 814. After the decision in that appeal became final, said first account current again came before the probate court for settlement, and the present appeal was taken from the order settling the same at the second hearing. The probate court made no order allowing fees to either the executrix or her attorney at this second hearing, so the question of their fees is not before this court on this appeal. The probate court, however, refused to strike from the account the encumbered real property belonging to the estate. But this action of the court can have no effect upon its future action when the matter of fixing the fees of the executrix and those of her attorney comes before it. Appellants' last contention cannot be sustained.

For the foregoing reasons the order approving the first account current is reversed, with directions to the probate court to settle the account in accordance with the views herein expressed.

MEYBERG v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY (four cases).

L. A. 18010–18013.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 2, 1942.

Rehearing Denied March 2, 1942.

1. Contempt ⇐67

The payment under protest of fines imposed for contempt did not preclude consideration, on certiorari, of question whether court had exceeded its jurisdiction in making orders holding petitioners in contempt and imposing fines. Code Civ.Proc. § 1074.

2. Corporations ⇐201

Where election of officers of corporation had not taken place when stockholder commenced suit to enjoin unwarranted interference with right to vote stock at election, stockholder was not confined to remedy under statute relating to contested elections of officers of corporation, but could maintain injunction suit. Civ.Code, §§ 315, 316.

3. Corporations ⇐201

Courts of equity have power to protect voting rights of stockholders as incident of property ownership, and may restrain unlawful interference with stockholder's right to vote stock owned by him. Civ.Code, § 316.

4. Injunction ⇐230(1), 231

Where it was not shown that court had not acquired jurisdiction of subject matter of injunction suit and of parties thereto, any defensive matter interposed to create factual issues was not a subject for investigation in proceedings for contempt for violation of restraining order, or in certiorari proceeding to review contempt orders. Code Civ.Proc. § 1222.

5. Contempt ⇐67

In absence of any showing that court has exceeded its jurisdiction, orders in contempt proceedings are conclusive on certiorari. Code Civ.Proc. § 1222.

6. Corporations ⇐665(3)

An order restraining interference with stockholder's right to vote certain stock pending hearing on his right to injunction was not an unwarranted interference with internal affairs of a foreign corporation, but was proper as an exercise of court's power to protect an asserted property right. Civ. Code, §§ 316, 320a.

7. Injunction ⇐219

Where contempt proceedings were instituted because of violation of order restraining interference with stockholder's right to vote certain stock, any question of stock ownership was a matter for adjudication in injunction suit, rather than in contempt proceeding or in certiorari proceeding to review contempt orders.

8. Injunction ⇐230(4)

A charging affidavit showing that stockholder was permitted to vote only 2475 shares of stock in election of directors of corporation, whereas restraining order forbade interference with his alleged right to vote 2500 shares, was sufficient to support judgment in contempt.

9. Injunction ⇐219

A restraining order forbidding certain parties, "pending the ownership by plaintiff" of certain stock of corporation, from preventing plaintiff from voting such stock was not so uncertain that prevention of right to vote such stock could not be punished as contempt, where parties who were charged with contempt conceded that plaintiff was record owner of stock.

10. Injunction ⇐231

In contempt proceeding for violation of order restraining interference with stockholder's right to vote stock, whether certain other stockholders, who voted by proxy at meeting at which restraining order was allegedly violated, should be purged of contempt charge by reason of their asserted attempt to comply with restraining order in instructions to their proxies was for trial court.

11. Injunction ⇐225

Where court enjoined interference with voting of 2500 shares of stock by certain stockholder, such stockholder elected to vote 2475 shares himself at election of directors and 25 by proxy, and no objection had previously been made to votes cast by proxy, persons charged with violating injunction by counting only 2475 shares could not defend on ground that stockholder in fact voted only 2475 shares, notwithstanding statute providing that proxy shall be suspended if stockholder elects to be present and vote stock in person. Civ.Code, § 321.

In Bank.

Leonard J. Meyberg, Mitchell S. Meyberg, Lorraine K. Meyberg and James Meyberg were found guilty of contempt, and they bring certiorari.

Affirmed.

Prior opinions, 113 P.2d 473, 474.

Mitchell S. Meyberg, in pro. per., of Los Angeles, R. K. Gandy, of Santa Monica, and R. B. Turnbull and P. M. Joseph, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

J. H. O'Connor, County Counsel, and Douglas DeCoster, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, Justice.

Mitchell S. Meyberg, Leonard J. Meyberg, Lorraine K. Meyberg, and James Meyberg separately petitioned for the writ of certiorari to review orders of the respondent court holding them in contempt of court. Fines imposed by the orders were paid under protest.

[1] The payment of the fines under protest does not preclude a consideration of the question whether the respondent court has committed an excess of jurisdiction in making the orders presented for review. Hume v. Superior Court, 17 Cal.2d 506, 110 P.2d 669. The several petitions are consolidated for determination of the questions involved.

Leonard J. Meyberg and Lorraine K. Meyberg are husband and wife. Mitchell S. Meyberg is the father of Leonard and James.

One Lazare M. Kauffman and Lorraine K. Meyberg are brother and sister. Their father, Leon Kauffman, procured the organization of a family corporation known as Leon, Inc. Upon the death of their parents, Lazare and Lorraine each received by decree of distribution 2250 shares of the corporate stock. Each also claimed a gift of 250 shares from the father in his lifetime. Lorraine transferred to her husband, Leonard, 250 of her shares. A controversy arose as to the validity of the issue to Lazare Kauffman of the entire 250 shares claimed to have been given to him by his father, the contention of the Meybergs being that Kauffman owned 2475 shares and the Meybergs 2525 shares. A list of stockholders was prepared by Secretary Lorraine K. Meyberg in anticipation of the annual stockholders' meeting of January 15, 1941, showing stockholdings in accordance with the Meyberg claims. Kauffman did not attend that meeting. The meeting showed attendance by Mitchell S. Meyberg and James Meyberg as proxies for Lorraine and Leonard Meyberg. The by-laws of the corporation required the representation of fifty-one per cent of the issued and outstanding stock to constitute a quorum. Because of the asserted absence of a quorum the meeting was adjourned to January 27, 1941.

On January 24, 1941, Lazare Kauffman commenced an action against Lorraine and Leonard Meyberg to obtain a declaration of his right to vote 2500 shares of the stock of Leon, Inc. In that action the respondent court issued an order requiring the defendants to appear on February 3, 1941, and show cause why they should not be restrained during the pendency of the action (1) from permitting more than 5000 shares of stock to be voted in person or by proxy at any meeting of the stockholders of the corporation; (2) from voting in person or by proxy more than 2500 shares; and (3) from directly or indirectly interfering or in any way obstructing the plaintiff from voting in person or by proxy 2500 shares of the stock; and enjoining any of said acts pending the hearing on the order to show cause. The order was dated January 24, 1941, and was duly served upon the defendants prior to the time of the adjourned meeting.

At the adjourned meeting on January 27, 1941, Kauffman was present in person, and Mitchell and James Meyberg were present as proxies of Lorraine and Leonard Meyberg. The temporary restraining order was read at the meeting. Kauffman was president of the corporation, but James Meyberg presided under a claimed appointment as chairman made at the January 15th meeting. Three questions were voted on prior to the election of directors. A motion to adjourn the meeting indefinitely was defeated by the Kauffman vote of 2500 shares in its favor and the Meybergs' vote of 2500 shares in opposition. The chairman's announcement was that the motion "not having received a majority vote of the shares present is defeated." A motion to adjourn to February 5, 1941, a date subsequent to the return date of the order to show cause in the Kauffman action likewise resulted in a tie vote. The chairman announced that the motion "having received 2500 shares, which is not a majority of the shares present, is defeated." A motion that the voting on the election of directors be conducted on a non-cumulative basis was "unanimously carried by 5000 shares," 2500 of those shares having been voted by Kauffman and 2500 by the Meybergs.

The board of directors consisted of three members. Kauffman cast 1250 votes for himself and 1250 for one David Pokross. The Meybergs cast 1250 for Leonard and 1250 for Lorraine. The inspector of election (Mitchell S. Meyberg, so appointed at the January 15th meeting) declared however that inasmuch as it had been discovered that 50 shares had not been authoritatively issued to Kauffman, only 1225 votes would be counted in favor of David Pokross. A meeting of the newly elected directors immediately followed, attended by Lorraine and Leonard Meyberg, at which Leonard was elected president of the corporation and Lorraine secretary-treasurer.

The failure to permit Kauffman to vote the full 2500 shares in the election of directors was the basis for holding the petitioners in contempt of the court's temporary restraining order and for the imposition of the fines paid under protest. Any merit in the differences between Kauffman and the Meybergs is not a matter for investigation and consideration in this proceeding. The only question presented here is whether the respondent court regularly pursued its authority in the contempt proceeding, which is the proceeding here under review. Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 1074.

The record in the contempt proceeding shows that the contempt order was based on the charging affidavit of Kauffman and the answering affidavit of each of the four defendants in the contempt proceeding, and that all the defendants were present at the hearing.

It is obvious that the only portion of the restraining order which could be said to have been violated was that portion which enjoined defendants from "directly or indirectly interfering or in any way obstructing plaintiff from voting in person or by proxy 2500 shares of said stock at any meeting of the stockholders of said corporation."

[2-5] The first contention of the petitioners is that the complaint in the action for an injunction does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the restraining order issued is for that reason a nullity, and that the contempt order based on a violation of the alleged void restraining order was in excess of the respondent court's jurisdiction. In other words, the petitioners contend that the complaint in the Kauffman action shows that no justiciable controversy exists between the parties and that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, is pursuant to the provisions of section 315 of the Civil Code relating to contested elections of officers of a corporation citing Fritz v. Superior Court, 18 Cal.App.2d 232, 63 P.2d 872. However, no election had taken place which was the subject of contest at the time the action was commenced by the plaintiff Kauffman. In that action Kauffman sought to enjoin an alleged unwarranted interference with his right to vote certain shares of stock. Involved in the issues in that action was the question of the plaintiff's ownership of the shares. Courts of equity have power to protect the voting rights of shareholders as an incident of property ownership. Lord v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 194 N. Y. 212, 87 N.E. 443, 22 L.R.A.,N.S., 420; Harvey v. Harvey, 7 Cir., 290 F. 653; 14 Cor.Jur. pp. 898, 903; 18 C.J.S., Corporations, § 548, and cases cited. Section 316

of the Civil Code by implication recognizes this equitable remedy by providing that "Shares, the voting of which at said meeting has been enjoined * * * shall not be counted to make up a quorum for said meeting." If a court of equity has the power to enjoin the voting of stock it also has the power to restrain unlawful interference with a stockholder's right to vote stock owned by him. There was no showing in the contempt proceeding that the court in the Kauffman action did not acquire jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties, and any defensive matter interposed to create factual issues is not a subject for investigation in the contempt proceeding, or in this proceeding. In the absence of any showing that the court exceeded its jurisdiction the orders in contempt proceedings are conclusive. Sec. 1222, Code Civ.Proc.; People v. Latimer, 160 Cal. 716, 117 P. 1051; Paddon v. Superior Court, 65 Cal.App. 34, 223 P. 91.

[6, 7] It is also contended that the restraining order was an unwarranted interference with the internal affairs of a foreign corporation and an attempt to direct or control the election of directors thereof. As noted, the court in fact did not attempt to remove any officer or director or suspend the exercise of any corporate function or official privilege of any officer of the corporation. The order restraining any interference with the plaintiff's right to vote certain shares of stock pending a hearing on his right to an injunction is an exercise of the court's power to protect an asserted property right of the plaintiff and is not an unwarranted interference with the internal affairs of Leon, Inc. The case of Southern Sierras Power Co. v. Railroad Commission, 205 Cal. 479, 271 P. 747, affords no support for the petitioners' contention. In that case it was held under the facts there involved, that a direction to permit the issuance of certain stock would be an unwarranted interference with the internal affairs of the corporation. The petitioners also rely on Royal Consolidated Mining Co. v. Royal Consolidated Mines Co., Ltd., 157 Cal. 737, 757, 110 P. 123, 132, 137 Am.St.Rep. 165, and the general rule therein stated "that the test of the right to vote as a stockholder at corporate meetings is the ownership of shares, as disclosed by the proper record books of the corporation," and the provisions of section 320a of the Civil Code to the effect that "only persons in whose names shares entitled to vote stand on the stock records of the corporation" on the day specified therein are entitled to vote at meetings of stockholders. The application of that rule and code provision does not call for annulment of the contempt orders, here under review. Any question of stock ownership is a matter for adjudication in the action for the injunction. The petitioners have not shown any invalidity in the restraining order.

[8-10] There is no merit in the contention that the plaintiff's charging affidavit did not allege sufficient facts to support a judgment in contempt. The facts there averred clearly showed that the plaintiff was permitted to vote only 2475 shares for the directors of the corporation when the restraining order forbade any interference with his alleged right to vote 2500 shares, until the issues in the action were adjudicated. In that connection the petitioners also claim that an uncertainty existed in the language of the restraining order pursuant to which it is contended that the conduct of the defendants could not be said to have been contumacious. The petitioners refer to certain language in the order which we have italicized in the following quotation: "Pending the hearing on this order to show cause, you and each of you are, pending any increase in the authorized capital of said corporation, and pending the ownership by plaintiff, Lazare M. Kauffman of 2500 shares of the stock of said corporation, restrained and enjoined as follows, * * * (3) From directly or indirectly interfering or in any way obstructing plaintiff from voting in person or by proxy 2500 shares of said stock at any meeting of the stockholders of said corporation." The petitioners state that they construed this language "to mean that if the records of the corporation showed that plaintiff was entitled to vote 2500 shares, such right must not be interfered with." There is no such ambiguity in the language as would make the order void as a matter of law. The language imposing the restraint, namely, the paragraph numbered "(3)", clearly required that the defendants refrain from interfering with the voting of 2500 shares by the plaintiff. The evidence before the court in the contempt proceeding showed that the petitioners so understood the order and that they by their conduct conceded that the plaintiff was the record owner of 2500 shares of stock, (1) when it was declared, at the meeting of January 15, 1941, that a quorum was not represented at the meeting; (2) when the plaintiff was permitted to vote 2500 shares on the question of postponement, first indefinitely and then to a specified date; and (3) when he was permitted to vote 2500 shares on the question whether the voting for directors would be on a cumulative or non-cumulative basis. Consistent with the petitioners' contention that the stockholders' meeting was conducted on the theory that the plaintiff was entitled to vote only in accordance with his stock ownership as shown by the stock records, then, for the purposes of the contempt proceeding at least, they must be deemed by such conduct to have conceded that the stock records showed ownership in the plaintiff to the extent of the 2500 shares specified in the order. This conceded ownership would not cease or change at the moment the matter of election of directors was announced. Furthermore there was no evidence that the petitioners misunderstood the language of the restraining order. The petitioners Lorraine and Leonard Meyberg now assert, and they also alleged in their return to the order to show cause in the contempt proceeding, that they instructed their proxies to obey the order and, specifically, to permit the plaintiff to vote 2500 shares at the postponed stockholders' meeting. The proxies obeyed their instructions and the temporary restraining order only in so far as the restraint on voting the Meyberg stock was concerned. The respondent court was the judge of whether Leonard and Lorraine Meyberg should be purged of the charge by reason of their asserted attempt to comply with the court's order in their instructions to their proxies. The fact that they accepted the election of directors as participated in by their proxies and thereupon, as such directors, elected themselves sole officers of the corporation indicates an intentional disregard of the court's order.

[11] The petitioners also urge that Kauffman in fact voted only 2475 shares in the election of the directors because his proxy voted the remaining 25 shares. They refer to section 321 of the Civil Code providing that the powers of the proxy shall be suspended "if the person or persons executing such proxy shall be present at the meeting and elect to vote in person." A complete answer to the contention is that Kauffman, although present at the meeting, did not elect to vote in person the shares represented by his proxy. His proxy had voted on previous questions submitted to the meeting as well as on the matter of election of directors, and without any objection raised to the counting of the votes on the previously submitted questions.

The petitioners have failed to show that the respondent court exceeded its authority in the contempt proceeding or that they are otherwise entitled to an annulment of the orders complained of.

The orders are affirmed.

ERRECA v. WESTERN STATES LIFE INS. CO. et al.

Sac. 5473.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 3, 1942.

1. Insurance ⇐516

Under a policy providing benefits for occupational disability, the coverage is limited to duties of a particular occupation and insured is protected as a particular workman, and, notwithstanding his ability to perform the work of other occupations, insured is entitled to disability benefits upon proof that he is totally and permanently disabled from transacting duties pertaining to a defined occupation, generally the employment in which he is engaged at time the policy is written.

2. Insurance ⇐516

A "nonoccupational" or "general disability policy" of insurance indemnifies against total and permanent disability which prevents insured from performing the work of any occupation, and he is insured as a man, not as a particular workman, and may recover only upon proof that he is disabled from engaging in any gainful occupation or work.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Nonoccupational Policy" and "General Disability Policy".

3. Insurance ⇐516

"Total disability" exists within the meaning of the term "any occupation" as contained in a general disability clause in a policy providing for disability benefits, whenever insured is incapacitated from following any substantial or remunerative occupation for which he is fitted or qualified, mentally or physically, and by which he is able to earn a livelihood.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Any Occupation" and "Total Disability".

4. Insurance ⇐516

Where life policy providing for benefits in case of total and permanent disability defined total disability as meaning whenever insured became wholly disabled by bodily injury or disease so that he was prevented thereby from engaging in any occupation or performing any work for remuneration or profit, the policy was a "nonoccupational policy", and where insured who was injured by accident, although a farm executive, had had little formal education and was not qualified for any other occupation and probably could not prepare himself for other remunerative employment because of age and experience, insured was "totally disabled" within policy if no longer able to pursue occupation of farmer or farm supervisor.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Totally Disabled".

5. Insurance ⇐516

The term "total disability" in a policy providing for disability benefits does not signify an absolute state of helplessness but means such a disability as renders insured unable to perform substantial and material acts necessary to prosecution of a business or occupation in customary way, and recovery is not precluded because insured is able to perform sporadic tasks or give attention to simple or inconsequential details incident to conduct of business.

6. Insurance ⇐516

An insured is not "totally disabled" within meaning of a policy providing for benefits in event of total disability if insured is physically and mentally capable of performing a substantial portion of work connected with his employment, and insured is not entitled to benefits because he is rendered unable to transact one or more of the duties incidental to his business.

7. Insurance ⇐665(5)

Evidence that insured, a farmer who had taken active part in management of his farms, could no longer perform manual labor after sustaining injuries and was unable to supervise indispensable farm operations warranted finding that insured was "totally and permanently disabled" within life policy, notwithstanding that insured made automobile trips to his farms and carried on business negotiations respecting farm operations.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Totally and Permanently Disabled".

8. Insurance ⇐516

The magnitude of insured's enterprise and his income therefrom were not to be considered in determining whether insured was totally disabled from performing remunerative work within meaning of life policy providing for benefits in case of total and permanent disability and defining total disability.

9. Insurance ⇐516

"Disability insurance" is designed to provide a substitute for earnings when, because of bodily injury or disease, the insured is deprived of capacity to earn his living, and such insurance does not insure against loss of income.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Disability Insurance".

10. Insurance ⇐668(11)

The question of what amounts to total disability within an insurance policy providing for benefits in case of total and permanent disability is a "question of fact".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Question of Fact".

11. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)

Where the trial court's finding is supported by substantial evidence, it will not be disturbed upon appeal.

12. Insurance ⇐549

The statutory provision that an insurer shall have the right and opportunity to examine insured's person when and so often as insurer may reasonably require is a reasonable requirement, and the right to periodically examine insured for proof of continued disability under a policy providing for disability benefits is a condition to future liability of insurer, providing the policy so recites. St.1935, p. 647, § 10339.

13. Insurance ⇐549

A denial of liability by insurer on a disability benefit policy is not a "waiver" of insurer's right to a physical examination of insured where it is based upon a report of insured's physician submitted in connection with claim for benefits, and insurer's right to examination survives insurer's denial of liability regardless of basis thereof.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waiver".

14. Insurance ⇐516

A "disability insurance" policy constitutes a "continuing contract" for periodic installment payments depending upon insured's continued disability, and insured has no cause of action, nor insurer any liability, except for benefits which have accrued.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Continuing Contract".

15. Insurance ⇐237, 549, 666

Since insurer's liability for future benefits under a disability policy is contingent upon existence of total disability at that time, insurer's refusal to pay benefits for any reason does not entitle insured to treat entire contract as repudiated and ask for future benefits upon a theory of "anticipatory breach", and hence, irrespective of the position it has taken concerning its liability for accrued benefits, an insurer may request a physical examination of insured under policy provision to determine its accruing and future liability.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Anticipatory Breach".

That insurer under life policy containing disability benefit provisions and providing that insured's disability should be presumed to be permanent when it had continued for three months had paid disability benefits to insured for five months did not entitle insured to further benefits after insured refused to submit to physical examination as provided by policy.

17. Insurance ⇐516

Under a clause in a disability benefit policy giving a presumption of permanence to a disability which has continued for a specified length of time, such as three months, the presumption relates only to permanency and not to totality of disability, and the conclusive presumption of permanency applies only so long as total disability exists, and the clause is not to be construed as meaning that a three months' disability is forever presumed to be a permanent and total one.

18. Insurance ⇐516

Under life policy providing for disability benefits, a clause providing that insured's disability should be presumed to be permanent when it had continued for three months did not prevent insurer from disputing totality of disability after expiration of three months.

19. Insurance ⇐549

Where insured had refused to comply with insurer's demands for a physical examination in accordance with provisions of life policy from June 22, 1939, to time of trial of action to recover disability benefits under policy, and evidence supported finding that insured was totally disabled within policy from September 2, 1938, which was date when insurer made last payment of benefits, to June 22, 1939, insured could recover only benefits accruing between September 2, 1938, and date of refusal of examination.

CARTER and CURTIS, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; J. D. Garibaldi, Judge.

Action by Martin Erreca against the Western States Life Insurance Company and another to recover disability benefits under an insurance policy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed with directions.

Prior opinion, 112 P.2d 344.

C. Ray Robinson, of Merced, Downey, Brand & Seymour and Frederic R. Pierce, all of Sacramento, and M. M. Doyle, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, Marshall P. Madison, Eugene M. Prince, M. D. L. Fuller, James W. Archer, F. Eldred Boland, Knight, Boland & Riordan, Livingston & Livingston, McCutchen, Olney, Mannon

& Greene, F. V. Keesling, and Keesling, Wayland & Eliot, all of San Francisco, as amici curiae, on behalf of appellants.

D. Oliver Germino, of Los Banos, George G. Murry, of Gustine, and F. M. Ostrander, of Merced, for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

Martin Erreca, the respondent, holds a policy of life insurance, which includes provisions for disability benefits, issued to him by Western States Life Insurance Company, the obligations of which have been assumed by California-Western States Life Insurance Company. These companies have appealed from a judgment against them for $2,300, asserting that he has not been disabled within the meaning of the contract.

Under the terms of the policy the respondent, in the event of his total and permanent disability prior to his sixtieth birthday, is entitled to the sum of $200 a month for one year, and the sum of $100 a month thereafter during the continuance of such disability. Total disability is defined to mean "whenever the insured becomes wholly disabled by bodily injury or disease so that he is prevented thereby from engaging in any occupation, or performing any work whatsoever for remuneration or profit. * * *" In his application for insurance, respondent stated that his occupation is "farmer engaged in grain and stock."

The policy was written in 1923. On February 2, 1938, respondent was thrown from a horse and sustained a multiple fracture of his right leg. Several ligaments of the knee were also torn. He was taken to the hospital where he was required to remain for almost two months. During his stay there he suffered a pulmonary embolism, better known as a blood clot in the lung. Upon his release from the hospital, he returned to his home where he remained in bed for several weeks. Thereafter, he required crutches for several weeks. During this period, varicose veins appeared in his leg. Open lesions and ruptured varicose ulcers developed, requiring him to keep his legs constantly bandaged. At the time of the trial, his fracture had completely healed, but there was a permanent instability in his knee. He is able to walk with the use of a cane, but, according to his testimony, only to a limited extent. He testified that, because of the varicose veins and ulcers, any extended walking brings about a swelling in his legs, causing him extreme pain. There is evidence that as a result of this forced inactivity, his weight has increased from 200 to 240 pounds, and he suffers a shortness of breath and quick heart action.

Upon his discharge from the hospital, the respondent filed with the California-Western States Life Insurance Company, which will be referred to as the insurer, proofs of his disability upon which payments were made for five months. On October 26, 1938, the company notified him that, according to the report of his physician his disability was partial only and not such as "wholly prevents you from carrying on any work whatsoever for remuneration or profit," and that it would make no further payments to him. The respondent then commenced this suit, seeking to recover disability benefits from October 2, 1938, to and including January 2, 1940. His right to them depends upon whether or not he has sustained injuries which bring him within the terms of the policy and has complied with its terms.

Resolving all of the conflicting testimony in favor of the respondent, the facts concerning his business affairs and his physical condition, as of the time of the trial, may be fairly summarized as follows: when the accident occurred, he was a man 58 years of age, who during his entire active lifetime has engaged in grain and stock farming. He owns, leases and personally operates grain ranches in Merced County containing an aggregate area of 7,000 acres. He also owns a dairy ranch which is managed by a partner and from which he derives an income of $150 a week. Prior to the accident, he enjoyed good health and was in excellent physical condition.

In his "Preliminary Notice of Disability" he stated that his principal duties, before his injury, were "supervisory." However, that is a very general classification of activities which covered a wide range.

As a ranch executive, he negotiated and made leases of land. In connection with his farm operations he made annual arrangements for crop financing, signed notes and mortgages, and bought livestock and supplies. Requiring even more experience and judgment, he determined the time for the planting, harvesting and selling of his crops.

He also acted as a ranch superintendent and personally managed and supervised the farm work. He directed the plowing of his land and the planting, cultivating, irrigating and harvesting of the crops. To properly supervise these operations, he was compelled to engage in activities requiring physical exertion. For example, in order to determine whether the land was ready for planting, he would walk over it and by means of a digging instrument, test the ground for moisture. He followed behind the plows on foot to see that the proper depth was attained. During planting, he directed the even distribution of seed by walking over the land and inspecting it behind the seeder. He would then dig in the land to see how deep the seed was penetrating. To ascertain whether the grain was ready for harvesting, he would make an examination of the land; and after harvesting commenced, he walked behind the harvester to see that the grain was being properly threshed. In directing the performance of the work, he rode horseback; at times he traveled to the more remote ranches in an automobile.

But he did manual labor also. He operated plows, drove tractors, repaired fences, buildings and farm machinery. The evidence shows that, at times, he aided in the construction of levees and ditches. Unquestionably he has been a farmer who not only overlooked no detail in the conduct of his operations but also worked with his men when the occasion required.

Since his injury, he can stand upon his feet for brief periods only. Although he can take short walks around the yard, he must use a cane. The circulation in his leg has been so obstructed that his leg is "half-dead," and he has frequently been confined to bed. He can no longer ride a horse.

In his present condition, he can perform no manual labor whatsoever. He is unable to walk over plowed ground, or to bend down upon his hands and knees and examine the soil. He cannot direct the plowing, planting, cultivating or harvesting of his land as he did before. He is able to drive an automobile and frequently rides to his farms, but he cannot approach the scene of the farm work, inspect the land, and directly superintend the conduct of the farming. In short, he can engage in no activity requiring any form of physical exertion. However, the accident has in no way impaired his mental faculties. He is able to negotiate leases, arrange finances for crops, buy supplies, and participate in the selling of his grain. Respondent's physician, Dr. Hillyer, testified that in his opinion respondent "could perform all the secretarial work connected with the farm."

As a result of his disability, respondent has abandoned his management and control of his ranches to his son who is now acting as the sole overseer. Occasionally, he has conferred with his son regarding certain transactions incident to the operation of the farms, such as the kind of crops to be planted and the time and price for the selling of such crops. He has participated in the negotiation of certain leases, has signed notes, negotiated loans, talked to grain buyers, and has attended to the buying of hogs. The actual conduct and control of farm operations, however, has been completely left in the hands of his son.

Upon this evidence, the trial court found that the respondent, as of the date of trial, was totally and permanently disabled within the meaning of the policy. Both insurance companies challenge that finding as unsupported by the evidence. They also contend that respondent waived any right to disability payments by refusing to submit to a medical examination as required by the policy.

[1] Much confusion exists among the authorities because of the failure of courts to distinguish between policies which insure against general or non-occupational disability and those which provide benefits for occupational disability. Under the latter type of policy, the coverage is limited to the duties of a particular occupation, and the insured is protected as a particular workman. Notwithstanding his ability to perform the work of other occupations, he is entitled to disability benefits upon proof that he is totally and permanently disabled from transacting the duties pertaining to a defined occupation generally the employment in which he is engaged at the time the policy is written. Typical of the phraseology used in this type of policy are the words "total disability exists where the injuries disable the insured from performing any and every kind of duty pertaining to his occupation." Because the risk insured against by the occupational disability policy is specific, the premium is ordinarily high.

[2] On the other hand, a non-occupational or general disability policy of insurance indemnifies against total and permanent disability which prevents the insured from performing the work of any occupation. He is insured as a man, not as a particular workman, and may recover only upon proof that he is disabled from engaging in any gainful occupation or work. This type of coverage is usually included as an adjunct to life insurance entitling the insured to waiver of premiums and to benefit payments in the event of his total disability. Since the risk is incidental to the life policy and is comparatively remote, the premium is ordinarily low. As contrasted with the wording of an occupational clause, a general disability clause defines total disability to mean "whenever the insured is wholly incapacitated from performing any work whatsoever for remuneration or profit."

Courts have not been in entire agreement as to the construction to be accorded the general disability clause. Some have refused to differentiate such insurance from the occupational type and permit the insured to recover disability benefits whenever he becomes wholly disabled from engaging in the vocation which he was following at the time of the accident even though there be other lines of employment in which he is qualified to engage unhampered by his disability. Foglesong v. Modern Brotherhood, 121 Mo.App. 548, 97 S.W. 240; Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Merlock, 253 Ky. 189, 69 S.W.2d 12; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Blue, 222 Ala. 665, 133 So. 707, 79 A.L.R. 852; Neill v. Order of United Friends, 149 N.Y. 430, 44 N.E. 145, 52 Am.St.Rep. 738; 24 A.L.R. 203, 206–209; 79 A.L.R. 857, 862–865; 98 A.L.R. 789, 798–803. The effect of these decisions is to enlarge the insurer's liability to that which it assumes under a non-occupational policy.

[3] Other decisions are based upon a strict and literal construction of the policy in which little regard is had for the capabilities and qualifications of the insured, and he is permitted to recover only upon proof that he is physically disabled from engaging in any employment for wage or profit. Garms v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 242 App.Div. 230, 273 N.Y.S. 39; Cooper v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 317 Pa. 405, 177 A. 43; see cases collected in A.L.R. notes cited above. But some courts, including those of California, recognizing the harshness of this rule, have chosen a qualified or intermediate position. They have held that total disability exists, within the meaning of the term "any occupation" as contained in a general disability clause, whenever the insured is incapacitated from following any substantial or remunerative occupation for which he is fitted or qualified, mentally or physically, and by which he is able to earn a livelihood. Wright v. Prudential Ins. Co., 27 Cal.App. 2d 195, 80 P.2d 752; Hill v. New York Life Ins. Co., 38 Cal.App.2d 627, 101 P.2d 752; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Harris, 254 Ky. 23, 70 S.W.2d 949; Prudential Ins. Co. v. South, 179 Ga. 653, 177 S.E. 499, 98 A.L.R. 781; Nickolopulos v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc., 113 N.J.L. 450, 174 A. 759; Waldman v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 252 App.Div. 448, 299 N.Y.S. 490; 98 A.L.R. 789, 798–803. "The authorities supporting this rule define total disability which prevents the insured from engaging in any occupation or performing any work for compensation as a disability which prevents his working with reasonable continuity in his customary occupation or in any other occupation in which he might reasonably be expected to engage in view of his station and physical and mental capacity." Hurwit v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 45 Cal.App.2d 74, 113 P.2d 691, 695.

This construction of the words "any occupation" is based upon the theory that it is unreasonable to deprive an uneducated laborer, disabled from performing any manual work, of the benefits of his policy, because he might notwithstanding those disabilities, with training and study, pursue a profession at some future date, or become an accountant or a banker. And it would be equally unreasonable to hold that a doctor, lawyer, or business executive is not totally disabled from engaging in "any occupation" or from performing "any work" because he is able to run a news stand or work as a day laborer.

Moreover, unlike the liberal interpretation which arbitrarily and unqualifiedly defines the term "any occupation" to mean the usual employment of the insured, this intermediate view does not impose upon the insurer a liability which it did not agree to assume. The insurer may reasonably be said to have contemplated that the insured would be totally disabled within the meaning of the policy if he were wholly incapacitated from conducting his ordinary employment, or such other employment as he might fairly be expected to follow in view of his station in life and his circumstances and capabilities. Under this construction, "any occupation" may mean the insured's usual occupation only if he is for any reason unfit to perform the duties pertaining to any other type of business or employment.

[4] The policy of insurance issued to respondent is clearly a non-occupational policy. He is not insured as a farmer or farm operator, for the disability clause explicitly conditions appellants' liability upon a total disability which prevents him "from engaging in any occupation, or performing any work whatsoever for remuneration or profit. * * *" Nevertheless, and although respondent is a shrewd farm executive and a successful grain operator, the testimony discloses that he has had little formal education and is neither trained nor qualified for any other occupation. And because of his age and experience in life, he probably could not prepare himself for other remunerative employment. Accordingly, the respondent must be deemed to be totally disabled if he is no longer able to pursue the occupation of farmer or farm supervisor. The insurer has in fact treated the issue as such in its briefs.

[5, 6] According to overwhelming authority, the term "total disability" does not signify an absolute state of helplessness but means such a disability as renders the insured unable to perform the substantial and material acts necessary to the prosecution of a business or occupation in the usual or customary way. Recovery is not precluded under a total disability provision because the insured is able to perform sporadic tasks, or give attention to simple or inconsequential details incident to the conduct of business. Fitzgerald v. Globe Indemnity Co., 84 Cal.App. 689, 258 P. 458; Wright v. Prudential Ins. Co., supra; Hill v. New York Life Ins. Co., 38 Cal.App.2d 627, 101 P.2d 752; Hurwit v. Prudential Ins. Co., supra; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Phifer, 160 Ark. 98, 254 S.W. 335; Sherman v. Continental Casualty Co., 103 Cal. App. 518, 284 P. 946; Lobdill v. Laboring Men's Mut. Aid Ass'n, 69 Minn. 14, 71 N.W. 696, 38 L.R.A. 537, 65 Am.St.Rep. 542; Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 80 Me. 244, 13 A. 896; Prudential Life Ins. Co. v. South, supra; 24 A.L.R. 203; 79 A.L.R. 857; 98 A.L.R. 789; Couch, Cyclopedia of Insurance Law, vol. 7, sec. 1670. Conversely, the insured is not totally disabled if he is physically and mentally capable of performing a substantial portion of the work connected with his employment. He is not entitled to benefits because he is rendered unable to transact one or more of the duties incidental to his business. Dietlin v. Missouri State Life Ins. Co., 126 Cal. App. 15, 14 P.2d 331, 15 P.2d 188; Dietlin v. General American Life Ins. Co., 4 Cal. 2d 336, 49 P.2d 590; Martin v. Postal Union Life Ins. Co., 31 Cal.App.2d 329, 87 P.2d 897.

[7] Applying these principles to the case at bar, the evidence amply supports the finding of the trial court that the respondent, as of the time of trial, is totally and permanently disabled. Admittedly, he can no longer do manual labor of any sort. Nor can he supervise and manage farm operations as he did before. There is evidence, consisting of the testimony of another farm operator, that successful grain farming cannot be properly conducted by the farmer from the doorstep of his home or from his automobile, but on the contrary, requires his personal direction at the scene of the farm work. Because of respondent's inability to walk over plowed or wet ground, or to bend down upon his hands and knees, he can no longer inspect his land nor supervise the many indispensable farm operations in progress, such as the plowing, planting, cultivating and harvesting. The insurer lays great emphasis upon the respondent's frequent trips to his ranches in his automobile, but the record does not show any accomplishments by these visits other than the satisfaction of his curiosity as owner or lessor. Furthermore, the evidence shows that the fields are not accessible to an automobile and the respondent therefore cannot approach the scene of farm operations and properly supervise the work in the required manner as above described. Secretarial work in connection with farm operations is unimportant.

[8, 9] The insurer also stresses the magnitude of the respondent's enterprise and his income therefrom. Such matters have no proper place in the determination of whether respondent is totally disabled from performing remunerative work. Disability insurance is designed to provide a substitute for earnings when, because of bodily injury or disease, the insured is deprived of the capacity to earn his living. Martin v. Postal Union Life Ins. Co., supra. It does not insure against loss of income. The respondent receives his income from his ranches as an owner or lessor; his labor contributes nothing toward it. The contention of the insurer would lead to the strange conclusion that a bedridden merchant is not totally disabled from performing gainful work because he receives a substantial income from a business, the management of which he has been forced to abandon to others.

[10, 11] True, since his injury, the respondent has negotiated loans and leases, signed notes and mortgages, talked with grain buyers, participated in the buying of supplies, and occasionally talked with his son concerning farm operations. Although such activities are neither trivial nor inconsequential, they are the type of duties that are infrequently and intermittently performed and cannot be said to constitute the substantial and material acts of the occupation of farming. In its final analysis, the question of what amounts to total disability is one of fact (Sherman v. Continental Casualty Co., supra; Ives v. Prudential Ins. Co., 12 Cal.App.2d 306, 55 P.2d 273), and where, as here, the finding of the trial court is supported by substantial evidence, it will not be disturbed upon appeal.

The authorities relied upon by appellants are factually distinguishable from the instant case. In Dietlin v. Missouri State Life Ins. Co., supra, the insured, a plastering contractor, fell from a scaffolding and permanently injured his foot. After the accident, the insured was able to perform every duty pertaining to his occupation except that he was unable to climb scaffolds and ladders. The principal duties of his occupation, as described in his application for insurance, consisted of "Office, Estimating and Supervising Duties." [126 Cal.App. 15, 14 P.2d 333.] In denying recovery of benefits for total disability, the court reasoned that the climbing of scaffolds did not constitute a substantial portion of his duties. Unlike respondent, he was still able to perform the managerial and supervisorial activities connected with his business.

In Missouri State Life Ins. Co. v. Snow, 185 Ark. 335, 47 S.W.2d 600, the insured was a farm operator who suffered a hip injury which disabled him from performing manual labor. He farmed through tenants, however, and his injury in no way prevented him from supervising farm operations. Moreover, he conducted a country store, waited upon customers, purchased goods and attended to all material acts essential to the prosecution of a mercantile business. The insured in Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Person, 188 Ark. 864, 67 S.W.2d 1007, was a farm operator, who contracted an arrested case of tuberculosis. Despite his ailment, he was able to manage his various farms in his usual and customary manner. Furthermore, the evidence showed him to be a highly educated man who, during the period in which he was assertedly disabled, secured a license to practice law and actually participated in the handling of litigation. In each of the cited cases, benefits for total dsiability were refused. The facts of those cases and the present one compel entirely different determinations.

The cases of Azevedo v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 308 Mass. 216, 31 N.E.2d 559, 561; Fricke v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 152 Kan. 525, 106 P.2d 677; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Stoner, 8 Cir., 109 F.2d 874; and Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. King,[1] Tenn. App., decided December 10, 1940, are also factually different from the present one. In each of them, recovery for total disability benefits was denied a farm operator who, although incapacitated from engaging in manual tasks, was able to, and did, manage, supervise and direct the operation of his farms and attend to all the business in connection with them. The evidence in this case shows that the respondent is unable to inspect his lands, direct the labor in progress or perform any other essential supervisory functions.

A case strikingly similar to the one at bar is Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Dowdle, 189 Ark. 296, 71 S.W.2d 691, 693. There, the insured was a manager of three ranches, one of which he owned. Prior to the accident, he gave these farms active and efficient management, riding horseback to them and walking over the land. He sustained a fractured coccyx, a bad case of fallen arches, and like respondent, suffered from varicose veins. After these injuries, he was no longer able to give any detailed attention to farm management, although he performed certain of his former duties such as preparing mortgages, signing contracts, and attending to his banking. He could not stand for any length of time or walk any considerable distance. Again, like respondent, he drove to the farms but he did not leave his car as "[he could] not walk about the farm as its proper supervision required that he do." The court, distinguishing Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Person, supra, affirmed a judgment based upon a verdict finding him totally and permanently disabled.

To the same effect is Manuel v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., La.App., 139 So. 548. There the insured was a farmer who owned and personally supervised a farm of some 300 acres. He was afflicted with pulmonary tuberculosis, affecting both lungs and requiring him to remain in bed a part of the time. As a result, he abandoned the management of his farm to tenants. Occasionally, he rode horseback over his fields to examine his crops. He consulted with officers at the bank about his business matters and held conferences with his tenants concerning the crops grown on his place. In affirming a judgment for the insured, the court held that he was totally disabled from performing any work or engaging in any business for profit. In other cases, the insured farmer recovered benefits for total and permanent disability under a policy having a clause similar to that now under consideration, although the evidence showed that he was able to perform unimportant work incidental to his occupation. Fitzgerald v. Globe Indemnity Co. of New York supra; Fogleson v. Modern Brotherhood, supra; National Life & Acc. Ins. Co. v. Bradley, 245 Ky. 311, 53 S.W.2d 701; Davis v. Midland Casualty Co., 190 Ill.App. 338.

The second question for decision concerns the insurer's contention that the respondent is not entitled to disability benefits because he refused to submit to a medical examination. This defense is based upon the following provision of the policy: "The Company may from time to time demand due proof of such continued disability, and any medical adviser of the Company shall be allowed to examine the person of the Insured in respect to any alleged permanent total disability, in the manner and at such times as the medical adviser may require but not oftener than once a year after such disability has continued for two full years. Upon failure to furnish such proof, or if it appears that the Insured is no longer wholly disabled as aforesaid, no further premiums shall be waived nor income payments made."

Following the presentation of proofs of disability, which included reports made by the insured's physicians, the company commenced payments on May 2, 1938, and made five consecutive monthly payments of $200. Because of information received by it in September, to the effect that respondent was actually engaged in supervising his farms, no payment was made on October 2d. Shortly after, the insured submitted to the company a report made by one of his physicians under date of October 20th stating that he was "permanently partially disabled"; able to "partially supervise" but unable to perform actual labor. The company then wrote him: "Since your total disability actually ceased some time ago, we must now advise you that the income payment of $200, made to you as of September 2, 1938, on the assumption that your total disability was then continuing must be the last on account of your present claim for totally disabling benefits in accordance with the terms of your policy."

The insured made no reply to this letter until March 31, 1939, when his attorney wrote to the insurer claiming disability benefits for him and threatening legal action. The insurer's answer was that, in its opinion, his disability was partial only but it would be "most pleased to receive proof thereof." Forms for submitting proof of disability were enclosed. Other correspondence followed, and on May 24th, the respondent submitted a medical report by Dr. Hillyer to the effect that he was totally disabled. The respondent also indicated his willingness to submit to an examination by the insurer's physicians.

Accepting this offer, the insurer wrote to the respondent on June 5th, requesting him to report to three named doctors in San Francisco one week later. On June 7th, respondent's attorney by telegraph informed the insurer that it was "impossible for Erreca to keep appointments, letter follows." On June 21st, the insurer acknowledged the receipt of the telegram and stated that it had not received the letter referred to. It also requested him to arrange an appointment for a physical examination by their physicians in San Francisco. In reply to this letter, the respondent flatly refused to submit to any examination. The insurer's answer is dated June 23d. It requested the respondent to furnish a sworn statement as to his disability and reaffirmed the demand for a physical examination.

[12] "The insurer shall have the right and opportunity to examine the person of the insured when and so often as it may reasonably require * * *". Sec. 10339, Ins. Code, St. 1935, p. 647. Such a requirement is a reasonable one and the right periodically to examine the insured for proof of continued disability is a condition to the future liability of the insurer provided the policy so recites. Mobley v. New York Life Ins. Co., 295 U.S. 632, 55 S.Ct. 876, 79 L.Ed. 1621, 99 A.L.R. 1166; Wood v. Industrial Life & Health Ins. Co., 223 Ala. 345, 135 So. 583; Daste v. First National Life, Health & Acc. Ins. Co., 14 La. App. 565, 130 So. 572; Rocci v. Massachusetts Acc. Co., 226 Mass. 545, 116 N.E. 477; Tompkins v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 53 W.Va. 479, 44 S.E. 439, 62 L.R.A. 489, 97 Am.St.Rep. 1006; 33 C.J.20. An analogous provision of a fire insurance policy concerning an examination of the insured under oath has also been upheld. Hickman v. London Assur. Corp., 184 Cal. 524, 195 P. 45, 18 A.L.R. 742; Bergeron v. Employers' Fire Ins. Co., 115 Cal.App. 672, 2 P.2d 453.

[13] The respondent takes the position that the right of the insurer to a physical examination does not exist, or is waived, where it has previously denied liability under the policy. But denial of liability, however, is not a waiver of the right to a physical examination where it is based upon a report of the insured's physician submitted in connection with the claim for benefits. Moreover, the right of the insurer survives its denial of liability regardless of the basis thereof.

[14, 15] To hold otherwise would mean that once an insurer has refused to pay disability benefits, the insured is forever relieved of all future obligation to furnish proof of continued disability or to submit to reasonable requests for physical examination, notwithstanding the fact that the liability of the company under the express terms of the policy depends upon the insured's continued disability. A contrary conclusion is compelled by the very nature of disability insurance. Such a policy constitutes a continuing contract for periodic installment payments depending upon the insured's continued disability, and he has no cause of action, nor the insurer any liability, except for benefits which have accrued. Because the insurer's liability for future benefits is contingent upon the existence of total disability at that time, its refusal to pay benefits for any reason does not entitle the insured to treat the entire contract as repudiated and ask for future benefits upon a theory of anticipatory breach. Brix v. People's Mutual Life Ins. Co., 2 Cal.2d 446, 41 P.2d 537; Cobb v. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co., 4 Cal.2d 565, 51 P.2d 84; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Viglas, 297 U.S. 672, 56 S.Ct. 615, 80 L.Ed. 971. As the refusal to pay is not a breach of the contract as to future unmatured benefits, the policy, including the provision for continued proof of disability and physical examination, remains in force as to all such accruing or future benefits. Accordingly, irrespective of the position it has taken concerning its liability for accrued benefits, an insurance company may nevertheless request a physical examination under the policy provision to determine its accruing and future liability. Eller v. Guthrie, 226 Iowa 467, 284 N.W. 412.

[16] In attempting to avoid the effect of his refusal to submit to examination, the insured argues that the provision of the policy in that regard is inconsistent with the preceding paragraph of the policy which provides: "Under this contract disability shall be presumed to be permanent when it is present and after the insured has been continuously so disabled for not less than three months." According to the respondent, this provision of the policy creates a conclusive presumption that a three months' disability is total and permanent, and where, as here, the insurer has paid disability compensation for five consecutive months, the presumption comes into play, making it wholly immaterial whether or not he refused to submit to a physical examination. He invokes the principle that conflicting and uncertain provisions must be resolved most strongly against the insurer and in favor of the insured. This contention is wholly unsound.

In a literal sense no one knows whether disability is permanent until the death of the insured, and a disability which at the outset appears to be of lasting and indefinite duration may be in fact otherwise. Accordingly, in many cases it was held that the insured's probable physical recovery from a totally disabling illness defeated his claim for total and permanent disability benefits, and in others it was held that the recovery of the insured disentitled him to benefits for the period in which he was totally disabled. Ginell v. Prudential Ins. Co., 237 N.Y. 554, 143 N.E. 740. See, also, many authorities cited in Job v. Equitable Life Ins. Co., 133 Cal.App.Supp. 791, 22 P. 2d 607.

[17] To obviate the difficulties of proving "permanence," and to prevent the insurer from recovering amounts previously paid upon the ground that a total disability was not permanent, as well as to give additional protection to the insured by according him benefits for a stipulated period of total disability despite a subsequent recovery, insurance companies commonly insert a provision in the policy giving a presumption of permanence to a disability which has continued for a specified length of time. This presumption relates only to the permanency and not to the totality, of the disability.

[18] In Dietlin v. Missouri State Life Ins. Co., supra, the presumption was held to be conclusive, and the court refused to accept evidence for the purpose of showing that a total disability of three months' duration had terminated so as to deprive the insured of benefits for such period and any further period during which the disability continued to be total. And as stated in 110 A.L.R. 631, "* * * a disability which has lasted for the requisite period of time to render it presumably permanent within the meaning of the policy is nonetheless permanent, although it has since terminated; and that consequently an insured who has suffered such disability may, even after the termination thereof, recover benefits therefor as for permanent disability, for the period during which it actually lasted." In other words, the conclusive presumption of permanency applies only so long as total disability exists; the clause is not to be construed as meaning that a three months' disability is forever presumed a permanent and total one. The respondent's interpretation would require that a disability which was total for three months must be conclusively presumed to continue to be total and the insured entitled to benefits for the remainder of his life, even though in fact he completely recovered from his ailment. Under that interpretation an insured, upon proof of three months' total disability, would have a life annuity. Since the clause providing for the presumption of permanency does not prevent the insurer from disputing the totality of the disability, it is entirely consistent with the provision reserving to the insurer the right to insist upon periodic physical examination of the insured.

[19] The finding of the trial court that the respondent did not refuse to submit to a physical examination was unquestionably based upon an erroneous construction of the terms of the policy, for the uncontradicted evidence is directly to the contrary. The record shows that, continuously from June 22, 1939, to the time of trial the insured refused to comply with the company's demands, made in accordance with the provisions of the policy, and he is therefore not entitled to judgment in this action for disability benefits subsequent to June 2, 1939. But as the evidence supports the finding that he was totally disabled from September 2, 1938, when the company made its last payment, to the date of refusal of a physical examination, the respondent is entitled to judgment for benefits during this period.

The judgment is therefore reversed with directions to enter judgment for the respondent for the sum of $1,600 as the amount of disability benefits to which he is entitled under the provisions of the policy to June 2, 1939. This judgment shall not be a bar to an action to recover any amounts which may be due on account of disability payments accruing under the policy subsequent to June 2, 1939.

CARTER, Justice.

I dissent. I concur in that portion of the majority opinion which holds that plaintiff is totally and permanently disabled and therefore entitled to disability payments under the policy, but I dissent from that portion of said opinion determining that the insured was not entitled to disability payments after the insured's refusal of the insurer's demand that he submit to a medical examination. As set forth in the opinion, the clause in the policy on that subject reads: "The Company may from time to time demand due proof of such continued disability, and any medical adviser of the Company shall be allowed to examine the person of the Insured in respect to any alleged permanent total disability, in the manner and at such times as the medical adviser may require but not oftener than once a year after such disability has continued for two full years. Upon failure to furnish such proof, or if it appears that the Insured is no longer wholly disabled as aforesaid, no further premiums shall be waived nor income payments made."

There are several reasons why that clause should not debar plaintiff from obtaining payments during the period following his refusal to submit to a medical examination by the insurer's physician. In the first place, it will be noted that the clause provides for two things the insurer may do with respect to demanding evidence of disability, to-wit: (1) The company may demand due proof of continued disability; (2) have the insured examined by the insurer's medical adviser. These two things are separate and distinct. They are divided by a comma, and are not the same. "Due proof" might well consist of a medical report by the insured's own physician. While the second provision is for a specific kind of proof, that is, examination by the insurer's physician. Turning then to the latter part of the provision here in question which specifies what the penalty is for a violation thereof, we find it states that upon failure to furnish such proof, no further payments shall be made. The word "such," manifestly refers to "due proof" rather than an examination by the insurer's physician. This is apparent when we consider that the penalty arises for failure to "furnish" the proof. It could hardly be said that the insured was furnishing the proof by submitting to an examination. Here the insured did furnish proofs consisting of his physician's report. The payments could not therefore be stopped for any failure in that respect. There is no clause authorizing the discontinuance of payments for failure to submit to a medical examination, therefore the insurer had no authority to discontinue the payments. This interpretation of the clause in the policy is entirely appropriate when we give heed to two fundamental rules, namely, that a policy of insurance is to be construed most strongly against the insurer and in favor of the insured and that an interpretation which will avoid a forfeiture is to be adopted when possible.

Secondly, the insurer had breached the contract at the time of the refusal to submit to an examination. Under those circumstances the insurer should not be permitted to assert nonliability for the failure to so submit. Its right to insist upon an examination should be confined to those instances where it is performing the contract, making the payments. The case is not dissimilar from a clause in fire insurance policies which provides that the insured must submit to an examination under oath before he may recover for a loss. It is held that that provision is waived by the insurer when he denies all liability under the policy. State v. Becker, 336 Mo. 59, 77 S.W.2d 100.

Third, it should be remembered that the insurer was not prejudiced or injured in any way by the failure of the insured to submit to the examination. He was examined by the insurer prior to the trial and therefore the insurer was not prevented from obtaining evidence with respect to the insured's physical condition. Even after the insurer obtained a report from its own physician as to insured's physical condition, it still denied liability. The trial court found against the insurer on this point and this court has sustained the finding of the trial court on the issue of total disability. Therefore, even if the insured had submitted to the insurer's request for an examination by the latter's physician, the insurer would still have refused disability payments as it still contends that insured is not totally disabled.

In my opinion the judgment should be affirmed.

CURTIS, Justice (dissenting).

I am unable to agree with that portion of the majority opinion which holds that during the period of time just prior to the rendition of the judgment the plaintiff was totally disabled and therefore entitled to receive disability payments during said period of time. From the evidence in the record it must be assumed that this condition is permanent, and therefore the effect of the opinion, if permitted to become the final decision of this court, will entitle the plaintiff to receive total disability payments during the remainder of his life.

The majority opinion adopts the definition of total disability given in Hurwit v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 45 Cal. App.2d 74, 81, 113 P.2d 691, 695, which holds that total disability is "a disability which prevents his [the insured's] working with reasonable continuity in his customary occupation or in any other occupation in which he might reasonably be expected to engage in view of his station and physical and mental capacity." I am in accord with this definition of the term "total disability," but does the evidence in this case by any reasonable interpretation show that the condition of the insured during the time in question prevented his working with reasonable continuity in his customary occupation? It is conceded by the majority opinion that while in his then condition plaintiff could perform no manual labor, his mental faculties were unimpaired. He was able to drive an automobile and frequently drove to his farms. He was able to negotiate leases, arrange finances for crops, buy supplies, and participate in selling his grain. As stated by his physician, he "could perform all the secretarial work connected with the farm." Since his accident he has participated in the negotiation of leases, has signed notes, negotiated loans, talked to grain buyers, and has attended to the buying of crops. While the actual conduct and control of farm operations has been left in the hands of his son, he held conferences with his son regarding the transactions incident to the actual operation of the farms, such as the kind of crops to be planted and the time and price for the selling of such crops.

With this undisputed evidence before us, can it be said that the plaintiff was totally disabled? Total disability, as we have seen, is defined as a condition which prevents the insured from working with reasonable continuity in his customary occupation. The above evidence shows that during the entire period covered by his present claim, the plaintiff has worked continuously in his customary occupation. It is true that he has not performed all the duties required of that occupation, but it is equally true that he has performed at least some of said duties. Moreover, it cannot be disputed that he has performed not only a substantial part of such duties, but a most important part of those duties.

The present case cannot be distinguished from the case of Dietlin v. General American Life Ins. Co., 4 Cal.2d 336, 49 P.2d 590. That case holds that where the insured's duties are twofold, as were the duties of the plaintiff in this case, and the injury prevented him from performing one class of such duties but did not render him unable to perform another and substantial part of such duties, such injury is not total, and the insured is not entitled to recover under a policy of insurance providing for benefits in case of total disability. The conclusion of the court in that case is contained in the following paragraph of the decision, 4 Cal. 2d at page 345, 49 P.2d at page 595:

"There is no contention that it is necessary that appellant be helpless and unable to perform any of his daily duties, to constitute total disability. However, where he is disabled only from performing one or more of those duties, and is able to perform others, he is only partially disabled. It was so held on the former appeal * * *, where it was said: 'Although the evidence was sufficient to show that after November 22, 1929, he was disabled from performing "one or more important daily duties pertaining to his occupation," such disability was clearly a partial disability and not a total disability as defined in the policy as he was not disabled from performing "any and every duty pertaining to his occupation."'"

While I do not contend that the rule announced in the majority opinion requires that the disability, in order to be total, must render the insured incapable of performing "any and every duty pertaining to his occupation," it does seem both logical and reasonable to hold that when the insured is able to perform not only a substantial, but the most important part of his former duties, he is not and cannot be totally disabled. While as a result of his injury, the plaintiff was prevented from performing any physical duties required in carrying on his farm operations, his mental faculties were unimpaired, and with the assistance of his son, who after his father's injury performed the physical work, he operated his extensive farming ventures to the same extent as before his injury.

A recent case decided by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts is very much in point. In that case the policy of insurance was practically the same as that carried by the plaintiff in the present case at the time of the injury. The insured was a farmer and with the assistance of three employees, he performed all the work upon the farm. After his injury he employed a fourth. Due to his injury he was unable to perform any manual labor about his farm. The case was decided upon an agreed state of facts. The conclusion of the court was as follows: "Upon the agreed facts it is plain that the insured is unable to perform the manual labor he had previously done, and that the restriction of his activities in this respect is due to the impairment of his right arm and hand. The record does not disclose that this impairment is accompanied by any pain or suffering. His disability has not been shown to come within the terms of the policy. Indeed his disability has not prevented him from continuously supervising and managing the operations of his dairy and farm as a means of a livelihood. [Citing numerous authorities.]" Azevedo v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 308 Mass. 216, 219, 220, 31 N.E.2d 559, 561.

I think that both reason and the authorities impel a reversal of the judgment.

WRIGHT v. BEST.

Sac. 5393.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 3, 1942.

1. Waters and water courses ⇐77

In action to enjoin pollution of stream and for damages, allegation that plaintiff and her predecessors in interest owned a right in the waters of Rock Creek acquired in 1852 by diversion and continuous use upon a named ranch for irrigation and domestic purposes was sufficient averment of the ultimate fact of ownership of water right.

2. Waters and water courses ⇐77

In action to enjoin pollution of stream and for damages wherein plaintiff alleged ownership of water right in certain stream, quantity of water to which the water right attached was not material, since substantial pollution would destroy the usefulness of even a small amount of water.

3. Waters and water courses ⇐77

In action to enjoin pollution of stream and for damages, where plaintiff by records and corroborating testimony unopposed by contrary evidence proved ownership of a water right acquired by appropriation and preserved by beneficial use and which by successive conveyances had become appurtenant to a ranch, finding that plaintiff did not own water rights claimed by her was unsupported by evidence.

4. Waters and water courses ⇐77

In action to enjoin pollution of stream and for damages where defendant mine owner admittedly dumped great quantities of sand, clay, gravel and mill tailings into stream, varying from 16,000 tons to 40,000 tons annually, and there was evidence that water could not be used either for drinking or irrigation purposes and would clog up pipe lines and ditches and would cause percolation to cease, and only evidence to the contrary was that turbidity of stream was such that fish and plant life could exist in it, waters of stream were substantially polluted and rendered unfit for reasonable household and irrigation uses and finding to contrary was unsupported by evidence.

5. Waters and water courses ⇐75, 76

As against upper owners with inferior rights of user, an appropriator of waters of a stream is entitled to have the water at his point of diversion preserved in its natural state of purity, and any use which corrupts the water so as to essentially impair its usefulness for the purposes to which he originally devoted it is an invasion of his rights, and entitles him to both injunctive and legal relief.

6. Evidence ⇐230(2), 265(17)

Where water right owner's predecessor in title granted to mine owner's predecessor in title perpetual right to pollute stream if and when $3,000 was paid, testimony concerning declarations of water right owner's predecessor in title that he had received $3,000 from defendant's predecessor in title which declarations were made before he parted with his title to property were admissible and binding upon water right owner in action against mine owner for pollution of stream, either as "declarations against interest" or as in the nature of vicarious admissions. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 1849, 1853.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Declaration Against Interest".

7. Evidence ⇐265(18)

Where mine owner defendant based right to pollute stream on contract whereby water right owner's predecessor in title granted to mine owner's predecessor in title perpetual right to pollute stream if and when $3,000 was paid, testimony that some 50 years before water right owner's predecessor in interest declared to witnesses that he had received the $3,000, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, sustained finding that entire consideration of $3,000 was paid.

8. Appeal and error ⇐994(3), 1012(1) Witnesses ⇐311, 313

In action for pollution of stream, wherein mine owner claimed right to pollute stream under contract whereby water right owner's predecessor in title granted mine owner's predecessor in title perpetual right to pollute stream if $3,000 were paid, and witnesses testified that 50 years before, water right owner's predecessor told them that he received the consideration, that one of the witnesses was small boy at time of purported declaration and that the other witness' testimony contained inconsistencies indicating faulty memory, did not go to the admissibility or sufficiency of the evidence, but rather to weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses which was for trier of fact.

9. Appeal and error ⇐994(3), 1012(1)

The weight of testimony and the credibility of witnesses are matters wholly within the exclusive province of the trier of facts whose determination will not be disturbed by reviewing court.

10. Waters and water courses ⇐64

Where water appropriator granted to mining company the right to deposit tailings from any of its mines forever in stream from which appropriator diverted water, and it was provided that grant should be binding and available to the successors in interest of both parties, parties intended to create a "perpetual right", and did not intend to make a personal contract in the nature of a "covenant not to sue", the force of which would automatically cease upon conveyance by either of them of property to which contract related.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Covenant Not to Sue" and "Perpetual Right".

11. Waters and water courses ⇐64

A grant for a consideration of perpetual right to pollute a stream by appropriator of water from stream to mining company did not constitute a "sale of quality of water" where sale of quality was not contemplated and mining company acquired no interest in quality of water but was merely given right to corrupt the quality of water theretofore enjoyed by the appropriator and since quality of water unlike quantity is not subject of sale.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Sale of Quality of Water".

12. Waters and water courses ⇐153

The transferee of an appropriative water right becomes vested with the right as such.

13. Waters and water courses ⇐151

An appropriative water right is lost by nonbeneficial user for five consecutive years. Civ.Code, § 1411.

14. Waters and water courses ⇐151

Where appropriator of water from stream granted to mining company perpetual right to pollute stream, even if grant could be considered as sale of the element of quality of appropriated water, successor in interest of mining company lost right to element of quality by nonbeneficial user for five consecutive years. Civ.Code, § 1411.

15. Easements ⇐1

An "easement" involves primarily the privilege of doing a certain act on or to the detriment of another's property.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Easement".

16. Easements ⇐3(1)

To create an "appurtenant easement" two tenements are necessary, a dominant one in favor of which the obligation exists, and a servient one upon which the obligation rests.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Appurtenant Easement".

17. Waters and water courses ⇐154(1)

Where only right sought by mining company was the right to discharge mine tailings into stream, their ultimate place of deposit being of no interest to it, and it was not intended that a grant of perpetual right to pollute a stream by nonriparian appropriator of water from stream to mining company should be regarded as one to deposit mine tailings upon nonriparian lands of appropriator which would have prevented the appropriator from lawfully closing diversion ditch leading to his land, grant of perpetual right to pollute stream did not create an "easement" in the nonriparian lands of the appropriator, since the granted privilege involved no use of the land or restriction of its use.

18. Waters and water courses ⇐153

A water right owner was the owner of an appropriative right severable and alienable from the land to which it was appurtenant.

19. Waters and water courses ⇐153

A riparian right is inseparably annexed to the adjacent riparian land as part and parcel of it and any grant by the riparian owner which affects his water right necessarily burdens his land, and creates an "easement" in the land, but such result does not follow where a nonriparian owner makes a grant which affects an appropriative water right enjoyed by him.

20. Waters and water courses ⇐154(1)

Where nonriparian appropriator of water from stream for a consideration granted perpetual right to pollute stream to mining company, right intended by the agreement was an easement annexed to the appropriative water right enjoyed by appropriator which would permit the waters of the stream to be used as a conduit to carry off the debris therein deposited from the claims of the mining company.

21. Nuisance ⇐11

A prescriptive right to pollute a water course may be acquired as against lower riparian users and their successors in interest provided the deterioration in quality is not so great as to constitute a public nuisance.

22. Waters and water courses ⇐154(1)

The statute enumerating servitudes which may be attached to land does not purport to enumerate all the burdens which may be attached to land for the benefit of other property and does not prevent an easement of pollution from attaching to a water right. Civ.Code, § 801.

23. Waters and water courses ⇐127, 153

An appropriative water right is a "corporeal hereditament" and constitutes an "interest in realty" and it can therefore appropriately serve as a servient estate to which an easement may be annexed. Civ.Code, § 801.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Corporeal Hereditament" and "Interest in Realty".

24. Waters and water courses ⇐154(1)

The creation of an easement attached to appropriative water right by a grant for consideration of perpetual right to pollute a stream by appropriative water user to mining company was not violative of "public policy" in the absence of showing that pollution from mining operations was so extensive as to amount to a public nuisance.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Public Policy".

25. Waters and water courses ⇐154(1)

Where grant for valuable consideration of perpetual right to pollute a stream by appropriator of water from stream to mining company clearly expressed intention to create an easement attached to an appropriative water right binding upon assignees who acquired that right with notice actual or constructive, court would construe the grant accordingly.

26. Evidence ⇐460(4)

Where easement attached to appropriative water right was created by grant of perpetual right to pollute a stream by appropriator of water from stream to mining company but grant failed to describe specifically the property or claims intended to be benefited and stated only that the grant extended to "any of its mines" or "any mine owned or operated by it", evidence of claims owned and operated by mining company at time of execution of the agreement was properly admitted to establish dominant tenement.

27. Easements ⇐3(1)

An intended easement will never be construed as personal when it may fairly be construed as appurtenant to some other estate.

28. Easements ⇐36(2)

Where deed does not expressly declare easement to be appurtenant or the language of the deed is ambiguous and it does not clearly appear whether easement was intended to be in gross or appurtenant to land, evidence aliunde the document is admissible to determine the nature of the easement and to establish a dominant tenement.

29. Easements ⇐36(2)

Where it appears from grant that an appurtenant easement was clearly intended but dominant tenement is not specifically described, evidence aliunde the document is admissible to establish the dominant tenement.

30. Waters and water courses ⇐154(1)

Where grant of perpetual right to pollute a stream by appropriator of water from stream to mining company created an easement attached to an appropriative water right, but failed to describe specifically the property or claims intended to be benefited, stating only that the grant extended to "any of its mines" or "any mine owned or operated by it", easement was "appurtenant" to mining claims shown to have been owned and operated by the mining company at the time of the execution of the agreement but not to claims subsequently acquired by mining company or its successors in title where such intention did not clearly appear.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Appurtenant".

31. Easements ⇐12(3)

In order to create an easement appurtenant to property to be acquired in the future, parties must express their intention in such manner as to admit of no doubt.

32. Waters and water courses ⇐154(1)

Where easement attached to an appropriative water right was created by grant of perpetual right to pollute a stream by appropriator of water to mining company and property or claims intended to be benefited were not described and grant stated that it extended to "any of its mines" or "any mine owned or operated by it" agreement did not contemplate the creation of a right to pollute the stream from mining properties acquired by mining company's successor in interest through an independent chain of title. Civ. Code, § 806.

33. Waters and water courses ⇐77

In appropriative water right owner's action against mine owner for injunction and damages for pollution of stream, finding that water right owner had supply of water from another source sufficient for her needs was not supported by evidence disclosing that agreement under which she acquired water from another source expressly limited her use of it to domestic and culinary purposes, and she acquired no right to divert water for purposes of irrigation.

34. Waters and water courses ⇐75

In appropriative water right owner's action against mine owner for injunction and damages for pollution of stream, that water right owner enjoyed a supply of pure and wholesome water from another source could be urged in mitigation of damages but not as a complete bar to action for injunction and damages.

35. Waters and water courses ⇐75

In appropriative water right owner's action against mine owner for injunction and damages for pollution of stream, that plaintiff's predecessor in title conveyed to another mining company conducting operations on stream above plaintiff's ranch, the right to pollute the stream was not a bar to injunctive relief where evidence failed to show any pollution by such other company, and showed that defendant had discharged tremendous quantities of tailings into the stream.

36. Injunction ⇐23

Under the equitable doctrine of "balancing of the conveniences" a court of equity may deny injunctive relief and relegate plaintiff to his remedy at law if plaintiff is merely seeking to protect a technical and unsubstantial right and the issuance of the injunction will bring no actual advantage and would result in unusual hardship to the defendant or the public.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Balancing of the Conveniences".

37. Waters and water courses ⇐75

Where three-fourths of the land for which water was appropriated was productive and particularly suitable for raising of fruits and grains, and appropriator did not enjoy adequate supply of water from another source, and evidence failed to show that appropriator would not gain protection by an injunction restraining mine owner from polluting the stream, and failed to show that stream was the only place where mine owner could dispose of tailings, and the value of mine owner's properties, the number of persons employed by him, and that continuance of mining operations was of vital interest to the county was not shown, water appropriator would not be denied an injunction restraining mine owner from polluting the stream on equitable principle of "balancing of the conveniences".

38. Injunction ⇐23

The courts are reluctant in applying the doctrine of "balancing of the conveniences" where act complained of is in its incidents wilfully tortious, except where injunction to restrain nuisance will produce some great public mischief.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Raymond McIntosh, Judge.

Action to enjoin pollution of a stream and for damages by Marie A. Wright against C. L. Best. From a judgment for the defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Gilford G. Rowland, Wilson Craven, and Rowland & Craven, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

A. J. Just, of Downieville, and Louis V. Skinner and Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, all of Oakland, for respondent.

EDMONDS, Justice.

The appellant asserts that, as the owner of a water right by appropriation, she is entitled to enjoin C. L. Best from polluting Rock Creek in connection with certain mining operations, and also to recover from him damages for such pollution. The judgment from which she has appealed is based upon findings that she does not own the water right claimed by her, and also that any rights which she acquired from her predecessors in interest are subject to an agreement made by them and the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co.

After alleging ownership of the property known as the Kennedy Ranch and the right to take water from Rock Creek in Sierra County, the appellant's complaint charges that, in the spring of 1937, and upon occasions since that time, the respondent has dumped and is now discharging, mine tailings into the creek, rendering the water wholly unfit for domestic or agricultural purposes. By answer, the respondent denied these allegations, and as a separate defense, pleaded a contract made in 1883 by the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co., his predecessor in interest, and Henry H. Kennedy, the then owner of the land and water right to which the appellant claims title, granting it the right to run mining debris into Rock Creek. Upon these issues the court heard extensive evidence which may be summarized as follows:

The Kennedy Ranch comprises 47 acres of land located near the mouth of Rock Creek, but not riparian thereto. In 1852, its owner appropriated water from that stream by means of a small diversion dam located approximately one-half mile above the ranch. From that dam the water was carried through a flume and ditch to the ranch. These water works are now in use by the appellant.

In 1875, Kennedy bought the ranch, with the right to take water from the creek through the ditch and flume. He and his family lived upon the property from 1875 to 1915 and during that period used the water for domestic, culinary and household purposes and for the irrigation of crops of hay, fruit and vegetables.

About the time Kennedy became the owner of the ranch, the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co. owned and operated patented mining claims, known as the Guatamala and Guatamala Extension, located some five miles above it on Rock Creek and tributary streams. In 1883, and for some time before, the mining company had been polluting the waters of the creek with tailings and mining debris taken from these claims. Kennedy filed suit to enjoin the pollution. For the purpose of compromising and settling the litigation, Kennedy and the mining company entered into a written agreement which was recorded seven months later.

The material provisions of this agreement are as follows: Kennedy granted to the mining company the right to run gravel, dirt and mining debris from any of its mines into Rock Creek until April 1, 1884, and released the company from any and all damage caused to him or his properties thereby. If the company polluted the water after April 1, 1884, it agreed to pay Kennedy $680, upon the payment of which sum it would acquire the right to deposit gravel in the stream from any mine operated by it until April 1, 1885. If the company polluted the stream in any year after April 1, 1885, it agreed to pay Kennedy the sum of $600 for each year in which such pollution occurred, the payment of which sum or sums would release it from all damage done to Kennedy or his property on account of such pollution during the year for which payment was made. If and when $3,000 was paid to Kennedy, then and thereafter the company should have, in so far as Kennedy was concerned, a perpetual right to pollute the waters of Rock Creek. The contract further provided that, in the event of a sale or conveyance by either party of any property to which the agreement related, such sale or conveyance should be expressly made subject to its terms, and that it "shall be binding upon, and available to the successors in interest * * * of both parties. * * *" This agreement was never formally assigned or transferred to any of the successors in interest of the land then owned by the mining company.

One year later, 1884, the mining company acquired by purchase an adjoining property known as the Garnet Claim. Some time thereafter, the company abandoned its mining operations, and although other owners mined the claims in later years, the only evidence concerning the resumption of pollution of the stream is that this occurred at intermittent times. The record shows no substantial and continuous pollution by successors in interest of the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co. until shortly before the commencement of the present action. But for many years, Kennedy continued to farm the ranch, using the unpolluted waters of the creek for both household and irrigation purposes. In 1915, he sold the property, but until 1926, successive owners made similar use of the water, raising crops of hay, fruit and vegetables.

The appellant and others bought the ranch and the appurtenant water right in 1926. In the next 10 years these owners prospected the land for minerals and conducted no farming operations. However, the waters of Rock Creek were continuously used for household and domestic purposes and also for the irrigation of lawns, shrubs and some vegetables.

In 1933, the respondent acquired through mesne conveyances the mining property formerly owned by the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co., including the Guatamala, Guatamala Extension and Garnet claims. Thereafter, he purchased from others the Jade, Topaz, Irene and Opal claims, all of which are adjacent and contiguous to them. The entire group is commonly referred to as the "Ruby Mine."

The respondent's operations, which commenced in 1933, are dual in nature, consisting of quartz mining and underground placer mining. Upon the Garnet Claim, there is a stamp mill for quartz ore and a gravel washing plant through which gravel is run. The quartz is mined upon the Guatamala Claim; the gravel production comes principally from the Topaz Claim, although a small part of it is obtained from the Guatamala Extension.

It was not until 1936 that the pollution of Rock Creek from the Ruby Mine became noticeable. During the summer months of that year, however, great quantities of debris were discharged from the mine into the stream, and the pollution continued uninterruptedly until 1938, when the appellant, who was then the sole owner of the Kennedy Ranch, filed the present action.

In addition to the mining properties owned by the respondent, there are a number of other mines, located within the Rock Creek area above the Kennedy Ranch, which, when operating, also dispose of mine tailings in the creek. In addition to the appropriative right in Rock Creek, the appellant also owns and uses on the Kennedy Ranch a right to take water from Woodruff Creek, which, according to the respondent, furnishes an adequate supply of clear and unpolluted water for her domestic and irrigation needs.

From these facts, the trial court found that the appellant is the owner of the Kennedy Ranch, acquiring title to it with notice of the 1883 agreement; that the entire consideration ($3,000) called for by that agreement was paid; and that the respondent has succeeded to any rights created by that agreement. Other findings of the court are that the appellant's predecessors in interest were the owners of a water right in Rock Creek, which right is subject to the terms of and limitations imposed by the agreement; that she does not own the water right claimed by her; that the respondent is discharging, and threatens to continue to discharge into Rock Creek, quantities of clay, gravel and mill tailings, but that the water is not thereby polluted nor rendered totally unfit for domestic, household or agricultural purposes; and that appellant owns and is now using a supply of clear and unpolluted water from Woodruff Creek which is adequate for domestic and irrigating purposes. From these findings the court concluded that the respondent is the owner of a perpetual right to pollute the waters of Rock Creek and denied the appellant injunctive or other relief.

In attacking the judgment against her, the appellant contends that the findings are inconsistent and uncertain. One cannot determine, she says, whether the court decided that in the years between 1926 and 1937 she and her co-owners lost the right to take water from Rock Creek because of acts occurring during that time, or whether she now owns the water right claimed by her subject to the agreement made in 1883. But she takes the position that, under one theory of the case, she may recover without quieting her title to the water right, because one in possession may maintain an action to abate a muisance which injuriously affects his enjoyment of possession. The appellant also asserts that the findings concerning title to the water right, the nonpollution of the water of Rock Creek, and the payment of the consideration provided for in the 1883 contract are either contrary to, or not supported by, the evidence.

Other points presented challenge the trial court's conclusion of law that the respondent has succeeded to the rights of the mining company under the 1883 agreement. That contract, she argues, creates neither an easement appurtenant nor a covenant running with the land and, assuming that an easement was created, the trial court should have defined the parcel of land to which it is appurtenant and confined the respondent's rights to that land. Also, the fact that she has a right to take water from Woodruff Creek is not a defense to her action but may only be urged in diminution of damages.

In support of the judgment, the respondent asserts that the appellant has not established her ownership of the right which she seeks to protect by injunction; that she has not proved facts entitling her to injunctive relief and that the balance of convenience is against her position. He also maintains that the challenged findings are supported by the evidence and that the court drew correct conclusions of law from them.

[1] The finding upon the issue of the appellant's property rights is that, since the year 1926, she and her predecessors in title have not owned, possessed or used a water right such as is alleged in her complaint. But there is uncontradicted evidence to the contrary. In her complaint, she alleged that she and her predecessors in interest have owned a right in the waters of Rock Creek, acquired in 1852 by diversion and continuous use upon the Kennedy Ranch for irrigation and domestic purposes. This is a sufficient averment of the ultimate fact of ownership Gartlan v. C. A. Hooper & Co., 177 Cal. 414, 170 P. 1115; Chrisman v. Southern California Edison Co., 83 Cal. App. 249, 256 P. 618; 26 Cal.Jur. 519-520. In proof of that allegation, the appellant introduced in evidence a chain of title with respect to the water right showing that, through successive conveyances from the year 1856, the right was finally conveyed by deed to her as appurtenant to the Kennedy Ranch.

[2, 3] In addition to the record title, the appellant proved, by several witnesses, an uninterrupted beneficial use of the water by the successive owners of the ranch. Although the extent of the right, as originally acquired, is not specifically shown, several of the deeds in the chain of title describe the flume and ditch as having a capacity of 300 miner's inches, and a licensed engineer, called as a witness on behalf of the appellant, testified that the capacity of the flume is approximately 240 miner's inches. Moreover, inasmuch as this is a suit to enjoin the pollution of water beneficially used for more than 50 years, the quantity of water to which the right attaches is not material, for substantial pollution would destroy the usefulness of even a small amount of it. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the records offered in evidence and the corroborating testimony proved ownership of a water right acquired by appropriation and preserved by beneficial use, and which, by successive conveyances, has become appurtenant to the Kennedy Ranch.

[4] Equally unsupported by the evidence is the finding that the waters of Rock Creek were not polluted nor rendered wholly unfit for domestic, household and agricultural purposes. Admittedly, respondent has dumped, and is dumping, great quantities of sand, clay, gravel and mill tailings into the stream. According to the testimony of the respondent's mine superintendent, the quantity of debris deposited in the creek varied from 16,000 tons in 1937 to between 30 and 40,000 tons in 1938. Several witnesses, including persons who resided on the Kennedy Ranch, testified that in the years 1936 and 1937, the water was muddy and discolored by slickings from the mines and that it could not be used for either drinking or irrigation purposes. There is evidence that when the water was sprinkled on lawns, plants, and clothes or used on dishes, the debris would adhere to them and coat them, giving them the appearance of being painted grey. Other testimony shows that in 1938, when the water was used to generate power on the ranch, the debris would clog up pipe lines and ditches and wear out power machinery, and that during 1936 and 1937, the pollution was so great that the ditch would fill up twice a year, requiring a week for two men to clean it. These statements were further corroborated by the testimony of Walter Techow, a chemist, who made a chemical analysis of the waters of the creek and found that the deposited tailings would penetrate into the soil for a depth of a few inches, causing any percolation to entirely cease.

The only evidence to the contrary was given by a mining engineer, who testified that, according to a test made by him of the water in the creek, the turbidity of the stream was such that fish and plant life could exist in it. His test was conducted, however, at a time when the respondent's stamp mill was not operating. It is not directly contradictory of that offered by the appellant, which compels a finding that the waters of Rock Creek were substantially polluted and rendered unfit for the appellant's reasonable household and irrigating uses.

[5] Considering the respective rights of the parties under these circumstances, it is an established rule in this state that an appropriator of waters of a stream, as against upper owners with inferior rights of user, is entitled to have the water at his point of diversion preserved in its natural state of purity, and any use which corrupts the water so as to essentially impair its usefulness for the purposes to which he originally devoted it, is an invasion of his rights. Any material deterioration of the quality of the stream by subsequent appropriators or others without superior rights entitles him to both injunctive and legal relief Phœnix Water Co. v. Fletcher, 23 Cal. 481; Hill v. Smith, 27 Cal. 476; Antioch v. Williams Irrigation Dist., 188 Cal. 451, 205 P. 688; Joerger v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 207 Cal. 8, 276 P. 1017; 26 Cal.Jur. 188-189; Wiel, Water Rights, 3rd Ed., vol. 1, pp. 561–565. The respondent does not assert a right to pollute the waters of Rock Creek as a riparian owner, prior appropriator, or by way of prescriptive user. He bases his claim entirely upon the 1883 agreement, and his right therefore depends upon whether that agreement, under the law applying to interests in real property, is anything more than a personal covenant, binding only as between the original parties.

[6, 7] As a preliminary question concerning this contract, it is necessary to determine whether the evidence sustains the finding that the entire consideration of $3,000 was paid, for under the express terms of the writing, the existence of any perpetual right to pollute the stream is conditioned upon the payment of that amount. Upon that issue, the record includes the testimony of E. C. Kennedy, the son of H. H. Kennedy, who declared that his father told him he had received $3,000 from the mining company. This testimony was corroborated by that of Louis Fortier, an old-time resident of Sierra County, who declared Kennedy told him that "he [Kennedy] had received all his money from the settlement he had made with them." These declarations of a deceased predecessor in title, having been made in relation to the property before he parted with his interest therein, constitute admissible hearsay evidence and are binding upon his successors in title either as declarations against pecuniary interest or as in the nature of vicarious admissions. Code Civ.Proc. § 1853; Code Civ.Proc.1849. Although such evidence is not entirely satisfactory, it will support a finding, particularly in the absence of any showing to the contrary. Moreover, the transaction to which the evidence was directed, occurred over a half century ago, and other and better evidence was undoubtedly difficult, and perhaps impossible, to obtain.

[8, 9] The appellant objects to the testimony of E. C. Kennedy on the ground that the conversation with his father attested to by him occurred over 50 years before at a time when he was a small boy; she advances a similar objection to the testimony of Fortier, claiming that it contains certain inconsistencies and evidences a faulty memory on his part. Such objections do not go to the admissibility or sufficiency of the evidence, but rather to the weight of the testimony and the credibility of the witnesses, matters wholly within the exclusive province of the trier of fact, whose determination upon them will not be disturbed by an appellate court.

[10] Considering the express language of the agreement which the parties signed, it cannot be seriously argued that they intended to make a personal contract in the nature of a covenant not to sue, the force of which would automatically cease upon the conveyance by either of them of the property to which the contract related. The contract clearly and unambiguously grants to the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Company the right to deposit tailings in Rock Creek from any of its mines forever, the right thus granted to be available to, and binding upon successors in interest and their respective properties. Undoubtedly, a perpetual right was intended. The difficulty lies in determining the legal nature of that right and whether it is one recognized by the law.

Pointing out that a water right by appropriation is independent of ownership and possession of land and subject to sale separately from it (26 Cal.Jur. 103; Wiel, Water Rights, 3rd Ed., vol. 1, p. 582), the respondent contends that the agreement constituted a sale of the quality of the water in Rock Creek to the mining company. According to his argument, an appropriative water right includes both quantity and quality, either of which is separately alienable. Upon that premise, he asserts that the appellant's predecessor in interest, having conveyed his right to a flow of clear and unpolluted water, no such right descended to appellant.

[11-14] This argument must be rejected for several reasons. In the first place, the agreement itself does not contemplate a sale of quality. The mining company acquired no interest in the quality of the water under the contract; it was merely given the right to corrupt a quality enjoyed by the appellant's predecessor in interest. Moreover, quality, unlike quantity, which is a measurable element, is not a subject of sale. Finally, if respondent's contention were accepted, his right must be regarded as forfeited. The transferee of an appropriative right becomes vested with the right as such. An appropriative right is lost by a non-beneficial user for five consecutive years. Civ.Code, § 1411; Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122, 42 P. 453; Lindblom v. Round Valley Water Co., 178 Cal. 450, 173 P. 994; Bazet v. Nugget Bar Placers, Inc., 211 Cal. 607, 296 P. 616. Consequently, if the mining company obtained an appropriative right to quality under the agreement, any such right has now become lost by continuous non-user for several years as shown by the evidence.

Although the agreement does not constitute a sale of the quality of the water of the stream it may still be available as a defense to the respondent, if it may be legally construed as creating some right which, by reason of attachment to the claims owned by the mining company passed to him by the conveyance of those claims. The respondent contends that the effect of the agreement is to create an easement burdening the Kennedy Ranch for the benefit of the Ruby Mine which is binding upon the appellant by reason of the constructive notice afforded by the recordation of the grant.

[15-18] An easement involves primarily the privilege of doing a certain act on, or to the detriment of, another's property. To the creation of an appurtenant easement two tenements are necessary, a dominant one in favor of which the obligation exists, and a servient one upon which the obligation rests. Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, the grant to the Ruby Mining Company to pollute the waters of Rock Creek cannot be said to have created an easement in the non-riparian Kennedy Ranch, for the granted privilege involves no use of the land, or restriction of its use. If the grant is regarded as one to deposit tailings upon the ranch, Kennedy could not have lawfully closed the diversion ditch leading to his land under the rule that a servient owner may not interfere with the exercise or enjoyment of an easement. Certainly no such result was contemplated by the parties for the mining company desired only to discharge tailings into the stream; their ultimate place of deposit was of no interest to it. Moreover, the fact that Kennedy was the owner of an appropriative right, severable and alienable from the land to which it is appurtenant, is most significant. Under these circumstances, and considering the express language of the grant, it may not reasonably be construed as creating an easement upon the land.

[20-23] The right clearly intended by the agreement is an easement annexed to the appropriative water right enjoyed by appellant, the waters of the creek to be used as a conduit to carry off the debris therein deposited from the claims worked by the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co. Although no authority has been cited for or against the proposition that an easement may be attached to a water right, there is no legal or practical objection to the creation of such an incident. A prescriptive right to pollute a watercourse may be acquired as against lower riparian users and their successors in interest provided the deterioration in quality is not so great as to constitute a public nuisance. See cases cited in Tiffany, Real Property, 3rd Ed., vol. 3, § 764; 67 C.J. 776. Although an easement of pollution is not among the servitudes specified in section 801 of the Civil Code, that section does not purport to enumerate all the burdens which may be attached to land for the benefit of other property (Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta Realty Co., 164 Cal. 412, 129 P. 593), and the section does recognize as appurtenant easements rights similar to the one under discussion, such as the right of discharging water upon land. An appropriative right is a corporeal hereditament and constitutes an interest in realty. Hill v. Newman, 5 Cal. 445, 63 Am.Dec. 140; Mount Carmel Fruit Co. v. Webster, 140 Cal. 183, 73 P. 826; South Tule, etc., Ditch Co. v. King, 144 Cal. 450, 77 P. 1032; Wiel, Water Rights, 3rd Ed., vol. 1, § 283; 26 Cal.Jur. 50. It can therefore appropriately serve as a servient estate to which an easement may be annexed.

[24, 25] The novelty of the incident is no bar to its recognition as an easement if its creation violates no principle of public policy. There is no affirmative showing that the pollution from respondent's mining operations is so extensive as to amount to a public nuisance. A valuable consideration was paid for a privilege which is neither slight nor frivolous, and the agreement between the parties clearly expresses their intention to create an easement attached to an appropriative water right binding upon assignees who acquired that right with notice, actual or constructive. The court must therefore construe it accordingly.

It remains to define the dominant tenement intended to be benefited by the grant and to which the easement became appurtenant. Although the 1883 agreement undeniably purports to create an easement appurtenant to the mining property of the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co., it fails to describe specifically the property or claims intended to be benefited, stating only that the grant extended to "any of its mines" or "any mine owned or operated by it." Nor do the findings of the trial court define any specific property as a dominant tenement. The court did find, however, that respondent owned the "Ruby Mine," which, as has been stated, embraces all of the claims now owned by respondent, including those acquired after the execution of the contract. And as it concluded that the respondent obtained the right forever to run tailings into Rock Creek, the effect of the judgment is to give him a right to pollute from any and all of the claims now owned and operated by him.

[26-30] Unquestionably, the easement of pollution became appurtenant to the Guatamala and Guatamala Extension, the claims owned and operated by the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co. at the time of the execution of the agreement. True, those claims were not described in the agreement, but the trial court properly received evidence of their ownership. An intended easement will never be construed as personal when it may fairly be construed as appurtenant to some other estate. Accordingly, when the deed does not expressly declare the easement to be appurtenant, or when the language of the deed is ambiguous, and it does not clearly appear whether the easement was intended to be in gross or appurtenant to land, evidence aliunde the document is admissible to determine the nature of the easement and to establish a dominant tenement. Elliott v. McCombs, 17 Cal.2d 23, 109 P.2d 329; Hopper v. Barnes, 113 Cal. 636, 45 P. 874; Nay v. Bernard, 40 Cal.App. 364, 180 P. 827. This principle applies with even greater force where, as here, an appurtenant easement was clearly intended, but a dominant tenement was not specifically described. As the evidence shows the ownership and operation of the two Guatamala claims by the mining company at the time of the grant, the easement of pollution must be held appurtenant thereto, and exercisable by the respondent under the rules which have been stated.

An opposite conclusion, however, must be reached as to the Garnet, Topaz, Opal, Irene and Jade claims, all of which were acquired subsequent to the execution of the agreement. In the absence of a very clear intention to the contrary, a court should not assume that the grantor contracted with reference to any claims which were not then in operation. The agreement granting to the mining company the perpetual right to pollute the stream from "any of its mines" or "from any mine owned or operated by it," must therefore be construed as referring only to those claims which were owned and operated by the company at the time the agreement was made.

[31] Several cases cited by respondent hold that there may be an agreement to grant an easement appurtenant to property to be acquired in the future which as between the parties and their privies with notice is enforceable when the dominant tenement is acquired. Wells v. North East Coal Co., 255 Ky. 63, 72 S.W.2d 745; Kentucky West Virginia Gas Co. v. Crum, 258 Ky. 508, 80 S.W.2d 537; Kalinowski v. Jacobowski, 52 Wash, 359, 100 P. 852. In each of the cited cases, however, the controversy involved an agreement which expressly and unambiguously purported to grant an easement appurtenant to after-acquired property, and the court rested its decision upon the clear and unmistakable terms of the grant. In the present case, the agreement refers only to mines "operated by the company" and signicantly omits the words" now or hereafter owned or operated by the company" or words of similar import. Unattached rights in property suspended in abeyance are not favored in the law. In orde to validly create such rights which will benefit property to be later acquired, the parties must express their intention in such manner as to admit of no doubt.

[32] The Topaz, Opal, Irene and Jade claims were never owned by the Ruby Gold Gravel Mining Co. and were acquired by the respondent from third persons. It cannot be seriously contended that the agreement contemplated the creation of a right to pollute the creek from mining properties acquired by a successor in interest through an independent chain of title. The evidence shows that the greater amount of debris now being deposited in Rock Creek is derived from the Garnet and the Topaz claim purchased by respondent after 1933. To allow him to pollute the stream from mines operated upon these claims would permit the burden of an easement to be increased beyond the scope of the grant, contrary to the established principles of property law. Winslow v. City of Vallejo, 148 Cal. 723, 84 P. 191, 5 L.R.A.,N.S., 851, 113 Am.St.Rep. 349, 7 Ann.Cas. 851; Gurnsey v. Northern California Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 117 P. 906, 36 L.R.A.,N.S., 185; Cal.Civ.Code, § 806; 9 Cal.Jur. 950-951.

The respondent contends that the appellant has not shown any irreparable injury and has thus failed to make out a case for injunctive relief. According to him, the absence of irreparable injury is clearly demonstrated by the fact that the appellant has an adequate supply of water from an independent source, and by the additional fact that one Costa, appellant's predecessor in title, conveyed to the Wisconsin-North Fork Gravel Mines, another mining company conducting mining operations on Rock Creek above the Kennedy Ranch, the right to pollute the creek under a recorded agreement similar to the one now under consideration.

[33, 34] The finding that appellant has a supply of water from Woodruff Creek sufficient for her needs is directly contrary to the evidence, for the agreement under which she acquired the right to waters from that creek expressly limits her use of it to domestic and culinary purposes. She acquired no right thereunder to divert water for the purposes of irrigation. In any event, it is no defense to respondent's tortious act that appellant enjoys a supply of pure and wholesome water from another source. Durham v. Eno Cotton Mills, 141 N.C. 615, 54 S.E. 453, 7 L.R.A.,N.S, 321. The existence of the additional water right may only be urged in mitigation of damages and not as a complete bar to an action for injunction and damages.

[35] Nor is the Costa agreement a bar to injunctive relief against respondent. Although that agreement may be binding upon the appellant, the evidence fails to show any pollution of Rock Creek from the workings of the Wisconsin Company. On the other hand, the evidence does show that respondent has discharged tremendous quantities of tailings into the stream. Until it appears that the pollution caused by the Wisconsin mine is of such enormity as to render the waters of the stream wholly unfit for any purpose, apart from the pollution resulting from any other source, it may not be said that appellant is not irreparably injured by the respondent's operations.

[36] But the respondent asserts a right to pollute the creek from the entire Ruby Mine, relying upon the equitable doctrine of the "balancing of the conveniences." Under this doctrine, a court of equity may deny injunctive relief and relegate the plaintiff to his remedy at law, if the benefit resulting to him from the granting of the injunction will be slight as compared to the injury caused the defendant thereby. Frost v. City of Los Angeles, 181 Cal. 22, 183 P. 342, 6 A.L.R. 468; Peterson v. City of Santa Rosa, 119 Cal. 387, 51 P. 557; Clough

v. W. H. Healy Co., 53 Cal.App. 397, 200 P. 378. Despite a proper showing in other respects of a right to injunctive aid, if a plaintiff is merely seeking to protect a technical and unsubstantial right, and the issuance of the injunction will bring no actual advantage, it may be properly refused where to do otherwise would result in unusual hardship to the defendant or the public.

The respondent, however, has not proved facts sufficient to provide a basis for the application of that principle. In his briefs, he alleges that the Kennedy Ranch is of "doubtful value"; that plaintiff enjoys a right to unpolluted water from an independent source; and that the granting of an injunction would be an ineffective and useless act, as the appellant would receive no protection therefrom because of the right enjoyed by the Wisconsin Mine to pollute the stream to any extent at any time. On the other hand, he asserts that he will be greatly damaged by the issuance of the writ. He alleges that tailings from the Ruby Mine cannot be impounded or disposed of anywhere except in Rock Creek. To grant the injunction, he contends, will force the closing of a mine "valued at many hundreds of thousands of dollars," throw "thirty to fifty" persons employed by him out of work, and seriously injure the inhabitants of Sierra County.

None of these assertions is supported by the evidence. The appellant's property is not of doubtful value, for the evidence affirmatively shows that at least three-fourths of the Kennedy Ranch is productive and particularly suitable for the raising of fruits and grain. And as the appellant does not enjoy an adequate supply of water from Woodruff Creek for irrigation purposes and because the evidence fails to show any pollution of Rock Creek by the Wisconsin Mine, there is no foundation for the claim that the appellant will not gain any protection by an injunction.

[37, 38] Turning to the respondent's allegations of irremedial injury, there is no proof to support his assertion that Rock Creek is the only source of disposal of debris from the Ruby Mine. Furthermore, there is no evidence whatsoever in the record as to the value of the respondent's properties or operations. The record is also silent as to the number of persons employed by him at the mine. And there is no showing that the inhabitants of Sierra County have any vital interest in the continuance of his mining operations. The appellant seeks to protect a substantial right by injunction, and the remedy should not be denied her upon claims of unusual hardship to the respondent, wholly unsupported by proof. Moreover, the courts of this state have manifested a reluctance to apply the doctrine of balancing the conveniences to a situation where, as here, the act complained of is in its incidents wilfully tortious (Hulbert v. California, etc., Cement Co., 161 Cal. 239, 118 P. 928, 38 L.R.A.,N.S., 436; 14 Cal.Jur. 232), excepting cases where an injunction to restrain a nuisance will produce some great public mischief. Frost v. City of Los Angeles, supra.

Finally, the doctrine relied upon by the respondent presupposes a right in the appellant to an injunction but for the balance of convenience against her demand for it. The court's determination that the appellant's rights are barred by the 1883 agreement left no basis for the consideration of that principle, although it is mentioned in the order denying a new trial.

The judgment is reversed.

Proceeding by Morris Greenberg against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent court from proceeding with the trial of a criminal case.

Writ of prohibition granted

James C. Purcell and William E. Ferriter, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and John R. Golden, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

The grand jury of the City and County of San Francisco returned an indictment charging petitioner and four others with conspiracy to commit grand theft in violation of Penal Code section 182. The indictment charged that all of the persons named therein procured fro. the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company a policy of automobile insurance on an automobile that had already been wrecked, that they then reported to the company that the car was wrecked at a time after the date of issuance of the insurance, and that the company paid them for the asserted loss. After petitioner was arraigned, he moved to quash the indictment on the ground that it was void and that the court was without jurisdiction to proceed thereon because there was no evidence before the grand jury tending to support the charges made against him. His motion was denied and he demurred to the indictment. The court overruled the demurrer and set the case for trial. Petitioner has no appeal from either the order of the court refusing to quash the indictment or the overruling of the demurrer, and has therefore petitioned this court for a writ of prohibition to restrain the lower court from proceeding with the trial.

The transcript of the testimony upon which the indictment was based contains no evidence even remotely supporting the charges made against petitioner. Respondent contends, however, that in California prohibition will not lie to restrain a court from proceeding with the trial of a petitioner on the ground that there was no evidence presented to the grand jury of his guilt of the offense charged.

[1, 2] Prohibition will issue to restrain an inferior tribunal from acting in excess of its jurisdiction if there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Cal. Code Civ.Proc., §§ 1102, 1103. Public offenses against the State of California must with few exceptions be prosecuted by indictment or information, and a court has no jurisdiction to proceed with the trial of an offense unless a valid indictment or information has first been presented. Cal. Const., art. I, § 8; Cal.Pen.Code, §§ 682, 888. An information is a written accusation of crime made by a district attorney, without action by a grand jury, after a magistrate, at a preliminary hearing, has found sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty of a public offense and has ordered him committed. Cal.Const., art. 1, § 8; Cal.Pen.Code, section 809; see cases cited in 7 Cal.Jur. 967, note 15. If there is no reasonable or probable cause for the order of the magistrate the defendant may be discharged on habeas corpus. Pen.Code, section 1487; see cases cited in 13 Cal.Jur. 230. An indictment is "an accusation in writing, presented by the grand jury to a competent court, charging a person with a public offense" without the necessity of a preliminary examination by a magistrate. Pen. Code, § 917; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 P. 161.

[3] A grand jury's function is to return an indictment against a person only when the evidence presented to it indicates that he has committed a public offense. It is no Star Chamber tribunal empowered to return arbitrary indictments unsupported by any evidence. On the contrary the necessity of basing an indictment upon evidence is implicit in section 921 of the Penal Code which provides: "The grand jury ought to find an indictment when all the evidence before them, taken together, if unexplained or uncontradicted, would, in their judgment, warrant a conviction by a trial jury."

[4-6] A grand jury that indicts a person when no evidence has been presented to connect him with the commission of the crime charged, exceeds the authority conferred upon it by the Constitution and laws of the State of California and encroaches upon the right of a person to be free from prosecution for crime unless there is some rational ground for assuming the possibility that he is guilty. People v. Restenblatt, 1 Abb.Prac., N.Y., 268; People v. Glen, 173 N.Y. 395, 66 N.E. 112; People v. Buffalo Gravel Corp., Sup., 195 N.Y.S. 940; People v. Brickner, 15 N.Y.S. 528, 8 N.Y.Cr. R. 217; People v. Price, 2 N.Y.S. 414, 6 N. Y.Cr.R. 141; Gore v. State, 217 Ala. 68, 114 So. 794; Sparrenberger v. State, 53 Ala. 481, 25 Am.Rep. 643; People v. Sexton, 187 N.Y. 495, 80 N.E. 396, 116 Am.St. Rep. 621; see United States v. Silverthorne, D.C., 265 F. 853; see Brady v. United States, 8 Cir., 24 F.2d 405, 59 A.L.R. 567. Such an indictment is void and confers no jurisdiction upon a court to try a person for the offense charged. Ibid. It has long been settled in most jurisdictions that an indictment is invalid if it is unsupported by any evidence before the grand jury. See cases collected in 59 A.L.R. 567. If there is some evidence to support the indictment the courts will not inquire into its sufficiency (see cases collected in 59 A.L.R. 573), but the lack of any evidence conclusively establishes that the grand jury has exceeded its authority in returning an indictment.

[7] At common law an indictment returned by a grand jury was unimpeachable because the grand jury proceedings were clothed in secrecy and a court had no access to the evidence upon which the indictment was based. People v. Tinder, 19 Cal. 539, 81 Am.Dec. 77. There ceased to be any reason for the common law rule in this state, however, when section 925 of the Penal Code was amended to require that a transcript, available to both defendant and prosecutor, be kept of the testimony introduced before the grand jury in all criminal causes where an indictment is returned. In the case of In re Kennedy, 144 Cal. 634, 78 P. 34, 67 L.R.A. 406, 103 Am.St.Rep.

117, 1 Ann.Cas. 840, a defendant petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice which constituted the evidence presented to the grand jury, was insufficient to justify an indictment. The court properly refused the writ, holding, in accordance with the general rule, that it would not inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence. Brobeck v. Superior Court, 152 Cal. 289, 92 P. 646, in holding that a writ of prohibition did not lie to restrain a trial court from proceeding upon an indictment where there was no evidence presented to the grand jury to support the charges, relied solely upon the authority of In re Kennedy without noting the difference between the two cases. At the time each case was decided, section 925 of the Penal Code merely permitted the district attorney at his discretion to have testimony before the grand jury reported but did not make such reporting mandatory. The cases therefore do not control the present situation and the views expressed therein inconsistent with this opinion are disapproved.

[8, 9] Petitioner cannot appeal either from the order denying his motion to quash the indictment or from the overruling of his demurrer. He could not be required to stand trial and to appeal from a possible adverse judgment without being subjected to unreasonable expense, inconvenience, and delay. Bruner v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 239, 28 P. 341; Terrill v. Superior Court, 6 Cal.Unrep. 398, 60 P. 38; Evans v. Willis, 22 Okl. 310, 97 P. 1047, 19 L.R.A.,N.S., 1050, 18 Ann.Cas. 258; see Farraher v. Superior Court, 45 Cal.App. 4, 187 P. 72. The only adequate remedy he may seek, therefore, is a writ of prohibition. Ibid. Regardless of the fact that the grand jury is a judicial tribunal from whose decisions there is no appeal (In re Kennedy, supra), defendant has the statutory right to restrain the court by prohibition from proceeding in excess of its jurisdiction to try an offense based on a void indictment. Petitioner is therefore entitled to a peremptory writ of prohibition restraining the respondent court from proceeding with the trial.

Let a writ of prohibition issue as prayed.

In re KING'S ESTATE.

KING et al. v. KING.

Sac. 5356.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 3, 1942.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐497

Under will directing executors to care for testator's horses and cattle until they could be disposed of to good advantage, which might be within about a year from date of will, court properly awarded executrix $2,000 as extra compensation for carrying on cattle business, where, within a year after testator's death, executors were authorized by court order to continue stock business and stock appraised at $16,950 was eventually sold for $29,008.45. Probate Code, § 572.

2. Wills ⇐801

The fact that testator's widow elected to take under rules of succession rather than under provisions of will did not abrogate provision of will directing executors to care for testator's livestock until it could be disposed of to good advantage.

3. Executors and administrators ⇐91

An executor, with or without court order, has duty to take charge of property of estate and preserve it in as good condition as is reasonably possible pending administration.

4. Executors and administrators ⇐497

In determining whether executrix was entitled to reasonable compensation for caring for testator's horses and cattle pending administration of estate, court was required to presume that stock was properly cared for, that expense of doing so was necessarily incurred, and that stock was sold as promptly as necessary for best interests of estate.

5. Executors and administrators ⇐497

Under provisions of Probate Code prior to 1939 amendment authorizing allowances to executor or administrator for special services, court was authorized to allow executrix additional compensation for feeding and care of horses and cattle belonging to testator's estate. Probate Code, § 902.

6. Executors and administrators ⇐93(1)

Though ordinarily it is not duty of executor to carry on testator's business during administration of estate, executor may do so when authorized by will or where necessary for preservation of estate.

7. Executors and administrators ⇐497

The amount of extra compensation to executor for carrying on testator's business pending administration of estate is matter within sound discretion of probate judge. Probate Code, §§ 572, 902.

8. Executors and administrators ⇐501

The amount of extra compensation awarded to executor for carrying on testator's business pending administration of estate will not be disturbed on appeal unless it was improperly allowed or clearly appears to be excessive. Probate Code, §§ 572, 902.

9. Executors and administrators ⇐501, 510 (6)

The right of appeal from order settling first and final account and allowing executrix extra compensation for caring for livestock was "waived" by failure to give notice of appeal within 60 days from time of settlement of account. Probate Code, § 1240.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Waive".

10. Executors and administrators ⇐88

Where unpaid matured notes executed by one of testator's sons to testator did not outlaw until after son qualified as co-executor of estate, the notes became chargeable to co-executor as "cash on hand" and were properly charged, together with accumulated interest thereon, against his distributive share of estate. Probate Code, § 602.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Cash on Hand".

11. Executors and administrators ⇐88

An executor, by virtue of his fiduciary relationship, is not only chargeable with principal sum of note owing by him to deceased if it is not outlawed before he accepts that trust, but he is chargeable with interest due thereon as "cash in his hands". Probate Code, § 602.

12. Executors and administrators ⇐173

The right of a widow to receive a family allowance pending administration of estate is purely statutory. Probate Code, §§ 680, 750.

13. Wills ⇐801

Testator's widow, by her renunciation of will and according to rules of succession, succeeded to her half of entire community property over which husband had no right of testamentary disposition, and in addition she succeeded to entire community interest in a certain ranch because of her statutory one-half community ownership therein, and her right to succeed to the other half as community property over which her deceased husband's attempted testamentary disposition became ineffective because of widow's renunciation of will. Probate Code, § 201.

14. Executors and administrators ⇐181

The community property to which testator's widow succeeded because of her statutory one-half interest by operation of law on testator's death "belonged" to her as surviving wife, and testator's unsuccessful attempt to dispose of her community interest therein did not render such property "not disposed of by the will" so that it should be first resorted to for payment of family allowance and expenses of administration under statute. Probate Code, §§ 201, 750.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Belong" and "Not Disposed of by the Will".

15. Evidence ⇐65

A husband is charged with knowledge that if he makes testamentary disposition of wife's half of community property, the law gives her right of renunciation of will, with whatever attendant benefits may flow therefrom. Probate Code, § 201.

16. Wills ⇐801

A widow repudiating a will is entitled to benefit of statutes of succession as fully and completely as though there was no will. Probate Code, § 201.

17. Executors and administrators ⇐181

Where will devised certain ranch which was community property, to testator's widow, and widow made renunciation of will, contention that one-half of the ranch, which because of widow's renunciation became ineffective as devise, should be regarded as property "not disposed of by the will" so as to be subject at first to payment for family allowance or any other expenses of administration, could not be sustained, in view of statute providing that legacy should be paid first from property expressly appropriated therefor by will and secondly from property not disposed of by will. Probate Code, §§ 201, 750, 751.

18. Executors and administrators ⇐181

The family allowance granted widow pending administration of estate was not required to be paid from community interests of testator and his widow, but was properly charged against assets of estate without regard to whether it constituted community or separate property. Probate Code, §§ 202, 300, 680.

HOUSER, Justice.

The cause herein was transferred to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District. Upon examination of the record, we adopt as the decision of this court the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, with such omissions and additions as may hereinafter appear.

"Two sons of Frank J. King, deceased, have appealed from the order settling the final account and directing distribution of his estate. The appellants also seek to review a previous order settling the first annual account of the executor, from which no appeal was taken. * * *

"Frank J. King died testate, December 12, 1936, at San Francisco, leaving surviving him, his widow, Josephine King, two sons, Frank A. and William H. King, and a brother named George W. King. He left a will * * * by the terms of which he appointed his widow and his son Frank as coexecutors. The will purported to dispose of his entire separate property and of all the community property belonging to himself and wife. He willed specific real and personal property [which included farm lands and cattle] to each of his heirs. * * * Letters testamentary were issued to Josephine King and Frank A. King, February 16, 1937. The estate was appraised at $49,142.33. The inventory included two unpaid notes executed by Frank A. King and payable to his father, both of which were matured. One note was for $4,328.10, upon which unpaid interest was then due in the sum of $1,363.83. That note was appraised at $5,691.93. The other note was appraised at $600.00. * * *

"The widow renounced her right to inherit property from the estate of her husband according to the terms of his will, and upon the contrary elected to take her share of the property pursuant to the rules of succession. The executor's first annual account was settled and approved October 21, 1938. In that account the widow was allowed $2,000 extra compensation, to be paid from the assets of the estate. The order making that allowance and settling the account was entered October 21, 1938. No appeal was taken from that order and it became final. Upon application therefor the court also made an award of $100 per month to the widow for a family allowance during the process of administration.

"The final account was settled and distribution of the property of the estate was made and entered September 12, 1939. At that time the assets of the estate were marshaled and the expenses of administration were properly apportioned against the respective devisees, legatees and heirs in the proportions ascertained from the appraised valuations of the distributive shares received by each one. Besides the several ranches and other personal property on hand for distribution, there was $35,090.37 in cash, received from the sales of [several hundred] horses and cattle and from other sources. The costs of administration were $12,277.53. The portion of the costs assessed against the widow was the sum of $5,295.09.

"All of the cash on hand, the two notes and the three ranches which are involved on this appeal, are community property. Those farms were called respectively the 'Peterich Ranch,' the 'Edgewood Ranch,' and the 'Magoffey Ranch' [the community ownership in the last-mentioned ranch extending only to a two-thirds interest]. By the terms of the will the Peterich Ranch was devised to the widow, together with a legacy of $10,000, one-third of the proceeds from the sales of horses and cattle, and whatever residue remained after the debts and expenses of administration had been paid. The will gave to Frank A. King the Edgewood Ranch, the Magoffey Ranch, together with some other property, and a third of the proceeds from the sales of cattle and horses.

"Having elected to inherit her share of the estate according to the rules of succession, there was distributed to Josephine King the Peterich Ranch, consisting of 314 acres of land, an undivided one-half interest in the Edgewood Ranch, one-third interest in the Magoffey Ranch, one-half interest in two small notes and cash in the sum of $12,930.37, all of which properties distributed to her were her community share thereof, except that she took the entire Peterich Ranch under section 201 of the Probate Code, as community property which was not disposed of by will on account of her renunciation of that instrument.

"In the decree settling the final account and directing distribution to be made, the court charged Frank A. King with the appraised value of the two matured notes as cash in his hands as a coexecutor, aggregating the sum of $6,854.46, which he owed to the estate. From that decree settling the final account and directing distribution of the estate to be made, Frank A. King and his brother William have appealed."

"It is contended the court erred in allowing the executrix extra compensation for services in conducting a cattle business during administration [without a previous order of court therefor]; that the compensation was wrongfully charged against both separate and community property of the estate; that the expenses of administration were improperly apportioned; that the community interests of the deceased in certain real and personal property were illegally distributed to the widow, and that Frank A. King was wrongfully charged as a coexecutor with the appraised value as cash on hand, of [the] two matured notes which he owed the deceased. * * *

[1, 2] "We are of the opinion the allowance of $2,000 as extra compensation for carrying on the cattle business was properly awarded. The will specifically authorized the executors to retain the cattle and horses for a period of 'about one year from the date of the will,' and they were directed to sell them when it was most advantageous to do so. That provision necessarily infers that the business of carrying on the cattle enterprise for a period of at least one year was authorized by the testator. The fact that the widow elected to inherit her share of the estate in accordance with the rules of succession rather than under the provisions of the will, in no way abrogated the independent authorization of the testator to carry on the business until the cattle could be sold to advantage. That provision of the will is nevertheless valid and binding. * * * The will was dated September 26, 1936. On July 12, 1937, a portion of the cattle and horses was sold * * * for $16,776.20. On October 8, 1937, before the year had expired, the court made an order under section 572 of the Probate Code, authorizing the executors to continue the stock business. The following January the balance of the cattle was sold * * * for $12,232.25. There is no evidence the stock could have been sold to advantage before they were actually disposed of. Evidently the business was conducted at a profit, for the horses and cattle were appraised at $16,950. They were sold for the total sum of $29,008.45.

[3, 4] "It is the duty of an executor, with or without an order of court, to take charge of the property of an estate and to preserve it in as good condition as is reasonably possible pending administration. In re Estate of Fulmer, 203 Cal. 693, 265 P. 920, 58 A.L.R. 430; In re Estate of Freud, 131 Cal. 667, 63 P. 1080, 82 Am.St. Rep. 407; In re Estate of Smith, 118 Cal. 462, 50 P. 701; 11B Cal.Jur. 250, § 842; 2 Bancroft's Prob.Pr., 682, § 359. See, also, In re Estate of Meyer, 11 Cal.App.2d 409, 412, 53 P.2d 984. In the absence of evidence to the contrary it must be presumed the stock was properly cared for; that the expense of doing so was necessarily incurred, and that the horses and cattle were sold as promptly as was for the best interest of the estate. The court so found. There is evidence to support the finding that these duties were performed.

[5, 6] "The court was authorized under section 902 of the Probate Code, as it existed prior to the amendment of that section in 1939, to allow additional compensation for the feeding and care of 565 head of horses and cattle belonging to the estate. That section then provided in part: 'Such further allowances may be made as the court may deem just and reasonable for any extraordinary services, such as * * * the carrying on of the decedent's business pursuant to an order of the court, and *such other * * * special services as may be necessary for the executor or administrator to * * * perform.*' (Italics added.) It is said in Riedy v. Bidwell, 70 Cal.App. 552, at page 555, 233 P. 995 at page 996, there is an exception to the general rule that it is not ordinarily the duty of an executor to carry on the business of the testator during the administration of his estate. That exception exists 'where the will of the testator expressly creates the power so to do, or where the carrying on of a business would be cast upon the executor as a necessary means for the preservation of the estate.'" See, also, In re Estate of Maddalena, 42 Cal.App.2d 12, 108 P.2d 17; In re Estate of Broome, 162 Cal. 258, 122 P. 470; In re Estate of Ward, 127 Cal.App. 347, 15 P.2d 901. And in 11B California Jurisprudence, at page 269, it is stated: "A power to continue decedent's business may be conferred on the executor by will, and the statute providing that the court may authorize such continuance recognizes existing law and merely adds another method of obtaining authority."

"Where a continuation of the business of a deceased person during administration results in a profit to the estate, it has frequently been said the executor is entitled to extra compensation therefor, even though he voluntarily assumes to perform that service. 11B Cal.Jur. 270, § 860; 2 Bancroft's Prob.Pr., 788, § 419. In the text last cited it is said: 'Likewise, for management of farm operations, because of the chance of loss to the estate and personal liability on the part of the representative, extra compensation may be allowed.' * * *

[7, 8] "When extra compensation is allowable for such service, the amount which it is proper to fix is within the sound discretion of the probate judge. In re Estate of Broome, supra. The amount of extra compensation which has been awarded will not be disturbed on appeal unless it is improperly allowed or clearly appears to be excessive. * * *

[9] "Moreover the appellants waived their right of appeal from the order allowing extra compensation, by their failure to give notice of appeal therefrom within sixty days from the time of the settlement of the account. * * * In re Estate of Meyer, 11 Cal.App.2d 409, 412, 53 P.2d 984; In re Estate of Grant, 131 Cal. 426, 63 P. 731; In re Estate of Fernandez, 119 Cal. 579, 51 P. 851; In re Estate of Ward, 127 Cal.App. 347, 351, 15 P.2d 901; Prob. Code, § 1240; 11A Cal.Jur., p. 211. * * * [On] October 21, 1938, the probate court made and entered its order settling the * * * account. That order specifically found that Josephine King performed valuable services feeding and caring for the cattle; that her special services were worth $2,000, and thereupon allowed extraordinary compensation in that amount. * * * The notice of appeal in this case is from the order settling the final account and making distribution of the estate only, which was made and entered September 12, 1939. * *

[10] "The court properly charged against the distributive share of the estate received by the executor, Frank A. King, [the] two unpaid matured promissory notes executed by him to the deceased in his lifetime * * * [which] were included in the inventory as assets of the estate. The appellants contend that these notes were barred by the statute of limitations, and that they were therefore erroneously charged to the distributive share of the maker of the notes.

"[On] September 5, 1930, for value received, Frank A. King and Grace V. King, executed and delivered to the deceased, Frank J. King, their note for $1,200, payable five years after the date thereof. It was never paid. It became a part of the assets of the estate in the hands of Frank A. King, one of the makers thereof, as coexecutor of the will of the deceased. It was due and was appraised at $600. It did not outlaw until February 6, 1939. Frank A. King qualified as executor February 16, 1937. The note was in his hands as an executor of the estate for two years before it outlawed.

"On November 25, 1932, for a valuable consideration, Frank A. King executed and delivered to his father, another note for $4,328.10, due one year after the date of execution. It was secured by a mortgage on real property. The note was never paid. That note did not outlaw until November 26, 1937. It was also in the hands of the maker, as executor, for about three months before it would outlaw.

"Section 602 of the Probate Code charges an executor with obligations which he owes to the testator 'as for so much money in his hands.' It provides that such debts shall be included in the inventory, and that the executor is liable therefor. * * *

"The notes executed by the executor which were due and payable, and in his hands as assets of the estate before they were outlawed, become chargeable to him as cash on hand, and they were therefore properly charged, together with the accumulated interest thereon, against his distributive share of the estate. In re Estate of Clary, 203 Cal. 335, 264 P. 242; In re Estate of Miner, 46 Cal. 564; In re Estate of Jones, 115 Cal.App. 664, 2 P.2d 483; Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 434, 39 P. 20; 11B Cal.Jur. 554, sec. 1100. In * * * Re Estate of Clary, supra, [203 Cal. 335, 264 P. 244], it is said: '* * * as pointed out in 16 California Jurisprudence, p. 420 et seq., sections 30 to 37, the rule is that the statute of limitations does not run where the parties occupy a fiduciary relationship toward each other, so long as such relationship is not repudiated. * * * Irrespective of the lapse of time which would ordinarily bar an action upon the note, the executor, by reason of his fiduciary capacity, becoming chargeable with the note in his hands as so much money, is in that capacity, precluded from pleading the bar of the statute, and, therefore, so long as the trust relation continues, the statute does not run.'

[11] "It has been held that an executor, by virtue of his fiduciary relationship, is not only chargeable with the principal sum of a note which he owes to the deceased, if it is not outlawed before he accepts that trust, but he is also chargeable with the interest due thereon, as cash in his hands. In re Estate of Miner, supra; 11B Cal.Jur. 556, § 1100. In Re Estate of Miner, supra, the court says with respect to the obligation of the executor to pay both principal and interest of a note which he owes to the deceased: 'We think there was no error in charging the administrator with the amount of his own note and the stipulated interest. It is a debt due to the estate and has never been paid. The money has remained in his hands, not separated or set apart from his private funds or been devoted to the uses of the estate. Under what circumstances an administrator will become liable to pay interest is discussed In the Matter of Estate of Mary McQueen, 44 Cal. 584, and upon the principles settled in that case we think the administrator cannot escape the payment of interest.'"

[12] "The appellants contend that the court erroneously directed payment of the family allowance, which was previously granted to the widow under section 680 of the Probate Code, to be charged against the 'devisees and legatees in the proportions that they respectively share in the properties, both community and separate,' upon final distribution. It is asserted the entire amount of family allowance granted to the widow is required to be paid from the community interests of the deceased and his widow. We think not. The right of a widow to receive a family allowance, pending the administration of the estate, is purely statutory. Hills v. Superior Court, 207 Cal. 666, 279 P. 805, 65 A.L.R. 266; 11A Cal.Jur. 505, § 367; 21 Am.Jur. 560, § 314; 24 C.J. 230, § 758. The will may direct that a specified sum of money for family allowance shall be paid from particularly designated property. Prob.Code, § 750. The section last mentioned provides that if the designated property 'is insufficient' in value from which to pay the family allowance, the obligation shall be made a charge against 'that portion of the estate not disposed of by the will.' It is further provided that if such designated property is not sufficient for that purpose 'the property given to residuary legatees or devisees shall be resorted to, and thereafter all other property devised and bequeathed is liable for the same, in proportion to the value or amount of the several devises and legacies, but specific devises and legacies are exempt from such liability if it appears to the court necessary to carry into effect the intention of the testator, and there is other sufficient estate.'"

It here should be noted that the testator made no reference in his will to the payment either of a family allowance or of any debt or expense of administration, nor did he designate any property out of which such or any expense was to be paid. However, it is the appellants' contention that the provisions of section 750 of the Probate Code were applicable here,—that under such application all of the community property distributed to the widow was property "not disposed of by the will," and therefore that such property should have been first resorted to for the payment of the family allowance and other expenses of administration.

[13] To recapitulate, by her renunciation of the will, and according to the rules of succession, the widow succeeded to her half of the entire community property, over which portion the husband had no right of testamentary disposition. That portion consisted of: an undivided one-half interest in the Edgewood ranch; a one-third interest in the Magoffey ranch; a one-half interest in the two small notes; cash in the sum of $12,930.37; and, in addition thereto, she succeeded to the entire community interest in the Peterich ranch. Her succession to that entire interest was based on her statutory one-half community ownership therein and, pursuant to the provisions of section 201, Probate Code, on her right to succeed to the other half as community property over which her deceased husband's exercise of his right of testamentary disposition became ineffective as a result of her renunciation of the will.

[14] With respect to all the community property to which the widow succeeded solely by virtue of her statutory one-half interest, by operation of law, on the death of her husband such property "belonged to" her as the surviving wife. Prob.Code, § 201. It therefore may not be successfully argued that where, as here, the husband attempted to dispose of the wife's community interest it thereafter became property "not disposed of by the will," and that therefore it should have been first resorted to for the payment of family allowance and expenses of administration. Such property never belonged to the husband and the failure of his testamentary disposition thereof could not operate to place it in the category of property "not disposed of by the will." In re Estate of Haselbud, 26 Cal.App.2d 375, 79 P. 2d 443; In re Estate of Marinos, 39 Cal. App.2d 1, 8, 102 P.2d 443.

[15, 16] But it is contended by the appellants that, in any event, the community interest in the Peterich ranch over which the testator possessed the right of testamentary disposition, i. e., his community half of such property, having failed as a devise became property "not disposed of by the will." Under the provisions of section 201, Probate Code, in the absence of a testamentary disposition by a deceased spouse of his one-half of the community property, on his death such portion "goes to" the surviving spouse. The husband is charged with knowledge that if he makes a testamentary disposition of the wife's half of the community property the law gives her the right of renunciation of the will, with whatever attendant benefits may flow therefrom. In the present case, one of the effects of the widow's renunciation was to revoke and render inoperative as a devise the decedent's testamentary disposition of his one-half of the Peterich ranch. As another result of her election to renounce the will the widow became entitled to that one-half interest by virtue of the statutory right conferred on her by the provisions of section 201, to receive such property in the absence of an effective testamentary disposition thereof by her deceased husband. The effect of her renunciation of the will was to entitle her to the benefit of the statutes of succession "as fully and completely as if there had been no will." In re Estate of Bump, 152 Cal. 274, 92 P. 643, 644; 11A Cal.Jur., pp. 513, 514. It follows that as to the widow such property cannot be regarded as property "not disposed of by the will" and therefore cannot be subjected first to the payment of family allowance or any other expense of administration.

[17] Moreover, by section 751 of the Probate Code it is provided that legacies shall be paid, first, from property expressly appropriated therefor by the will and, secondly, from "property not disposed of by the will." Therefore, were we to accept appellants' contention that in any event the remaining one-half of the Peterich ranch—which because of the widow's renunciation of the will became ineffective as a devise—should be regarded as property "not disposed of by the will," under the provisions of section 751 such property could be taken from the wife and resorted to for the payment of legacies to other persons, a result which, obviously, the legislature never intended should follow from its reference in the several sections of the Probate Code to property "not disposed of by the will."

[18] The appellants also contend that under the provisions of section 202 of the Probate Code it was intended that the community property alone should be chargeable with the payment of family allowance and expenses of administration. We do not so interpret the section.

"In Re Estate of Finch, 173 Cal. 462, at page 464, 160 P. 556, 557, it is said: '* * * the surviving wife is * * * given the right to have a reasonable allowance made by the court for her support from the estate of her deceased husband whether the estate was community property or his separate estate and irrespective of whether the widow has estate of her own out of which she might support herself.'

"Section 300 of the Probate Code specifically provides that 'All of his [decedent's] property shall be subject to the possession of the executor or administrator and to the control of the superior court for the purpose of administration * * * and shall be chargeable with the expenses of administering his estate, and the payment of his debts and the allowance to the family, except as otherwise provided in this code.'"

And in the case of In re Estate of Haselbud, 26 Cal.App.2d 375, 79 P.2d 443, under the provisions of section 70, Probate Code, the will was revoked as to the surviving wife, and it was contended that the expenses of family allowance and other debts of administration should be paid entirely from community funds to which the widow had succeeded. It was there held that section 750 was not applicable and that, pursuant to the provisions of section 300, such expenses were to be borne ratably by the community and separate property of the decedent.

"A contrary construction of the statute might result in charging the obligation of an estate to pay family allowance to a widow against her own community interest in the property. That construction is opposed to the policy of the law with respect to family allowances. See note in 98 A.L.R. at page 1326. * * *

"We conclude that, under the circumstances of this case, the court properly held that the family allowance [as well as other expenses of administration] was chargeable to the assets of the estate without regard to whether it consists of community or separate property of the decedent."

The appellants' separate contention that the court wrongfully distributed to the widow any community property other than that in which she possessed a statutory one-half interest, has been fully discussed hereinbefore.

The decree settling the final account and ordering distribution of the estate is affirmed.

TRAYNOR, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent from that part of the opinion upholding the charging of the debts, expenses of administration, and the family allowance against the respective persons interested in the estate in the proportion that each shared in the estate.

Probate Code section 201 provides: "Upon the death of either husband or wife, one-half of the community property belongs to the surviving spouse; the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the decedent, and in the absence thereof goes to the surviving spouse." Respondent, testator's widow, after renouncing her right to take under the will, succeeded to one-half of all the community property as a matter of right under the above section. She was given all of the Peterich Ranch, which was community property, on the basis of the above section, because her husband, the testator, had failed to make an effective testamentary disposition of his half.

The court charged the debts of the testator and the expenses of administration, including a family allowance to the widow, against the respective persons interested in the estate in the proportion that they shared in the estate. Probate Code section 750 provides: "If the testator makes provision by his will, or designates the estate to be appropriated, for the payment of his debts, the expenses of administration, or family allowance, they must be paid according to such provision or out of the estate thus appropriated, so far as the same is sufficient. If insufficient, that portion of the estate not disposed of by the will, if any, must be appropriated for that purpose." (Italics added.) The testator did not designate in his will any particular portion of the estate to be used for the payment of his debts, administration expenses, and family allowance. Therefore, under section 750, that portion of the estate not disposed of by will should be resorted to for the payment of these amounts before other portions of the estate are assessed. Since one-half the community property automatically passes to the surviving wife upon the husband's death he has no power to dispose of it by will, and it therefore does not constitute a portion of his estate within the meaning of section 750. Although it is subject to his debts and administration expenses by virtue of Probate Code section 202, it cannot be first resorted to under section 750. In re Estate of Haselbud, 26 Cal.App.2d 375, 79 P.2d 443. The testator, however, has the power to dispose of the other half of the community property by will. If he does not do so, it must be considered a portion of his estate not disposed of by will within the meaning of section 750. If he fails to dispose of it by will, it passes to his wife under section 201, but in this respect it does not differ materially from separate property of which he makes no testamentary disposition. When he does not dispose of some of his separate property by will, it passes to his wife, his wife and children, or to other heirs, according to the laws of intestate succession. The latter half of section 201 simply fixes the intestate succession to the deceased spouse's half of the community property. Thus, if a testator does not dispose of his half of the community property by will it constitutes property not disposed of by will within the meaning of section 750 and must be resorted to first for the payment of debts and administration expenses, if no property is specifically appropriated for this purpose, just as if it were separate property undisposed of by will.

In re Estate of Haselbud, supra, is distinguishable from the present situation. In that case the decedent married after he made his will. His widow was therefore a pretermitted heir; under Probate Code section 70 the will was revoked as to her and she was entitled to her intestate share of the estate. Since section 750 has no application to the estates of persons dying completely intestate, the court, in order to insure the wife's receiving the share of the estate that she would receive if the husband died completely intestate, properly held that the property which the wife took as her intestate share of the estate, including all of the community property, should not be resorted to first for the payment of debts and expenses under section 750, but should be charged for the debts and expenses on the same basis that it would be charged if the husband died completely intestate. In the present case, however, the respondent's renunciation of her right to take under the will does not entitle her to an intestate share of the estate, but merely gives her the right to take her half of the community property free from the testamentary disposition made of it by the testator. She takes the other half of the Peterich Ranch, not on the theory that her husband died intestate but because after her renunciation it remained undisposed of by will.

In the present case, therefore, one-half of the Peterich Ranch constitutes property undisposed of by the will of the testator and, under section 750, should be resorted to for the payment of debts, administration expenses, and the family allowance, before other portions of the estate are charged.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

This action was instituted by the widow and minor children of George T. Hinds, deceased, to recover damages for his wrongful death, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants. The deceased was employed as a welder by E. H. Irwin who did business as the Irwin Welding Works. The defendant, I. M. Wheadon, did business as the Allied Petroleum Company, and in connection with his business employed the defendants Chester Fisher and Mark Haines. On February 23, 1937, Hinds was directed by his employer to go to the premises of the Allied Petroleum Company for the purpose of performing certain welding operations which had been ordered by defendants. The defendant Fisher informed him that a steel dehydrator tank, used in treating crude petroleum, had been prepared for the welding operation, that is, that it had been washed out and filled with water. In order to demonstrate that the tank was filled with water, Fisher ordered that the pump be started. When water flowed from a bleeder line at the top of the tank, Hinds said that it was satisfactory and began the welding operation which consisted of affixing metal brackets or straps to the outside of the dehydrator tank. The lower bracket was welded first and then Hinds commenced to work on the upper one. Shortly after Hinds commenced the final portion of the top weld, the tank exploded and he was killed. After the introduction of evidence by plaintiffs, the trial court granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit upon the theory that no evidence of negligence on the part of defendants had been produced. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment of nonsuit.

[1] Where a judgment is rendered upon a motion for nonsuit, the court must assume that all evidence received in favor of the plaintiff relevant to the issues is true. All presumptions, inferences and doubtful questions must be construed most favorably to the plaintiff. Richardes v. Richardes, 211 Cal. 392, 295 P. 816; Mitchell Camera Corp. v. Fox Film Corp., 8 Cal.2d 192, 64 P.2d 946; Moffatt v. Buffums' Inc., 21 Cal.App.2d 371, 373, 69 P. 2d 424; 9 Cal.Jur. 552. Here, the evidence introduced on behalf of plaintiffs, when construed most favorably to their case, tended to establish that the explosion resulted from an absence of water in the tank behind the point at which the upper bracket was to be attached. The testimony of plaintiffs' witness who was an expert in the field of physics, metallurgy and welding was that the discoloration found after the explosion on the inside of the dehydrator tank indicated an absence of water behind that point during the welding operation. He also testified that in his opinion it was probable that oil particles which had collected on the inside of the tank had vaporized and exploded because of the intense heat developed under such circumstances during the welding.

[2-5] The defendants had an obligation, which they do not dispute, to exercise reasonable care in order to make the dehydrator tank safe for the welding operation which Hinds was ordered to perform. Such a duty of care was required because Hinds was invited upon the premises as a business visitor to work upon the tank. Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 197 P. 793; Sawyer v. Hooper, 79 Cal.App. 395, 249 P. 530; Wooll v. J. S. Shea Co., 214 Cal. 302, 5 P.2d 421; Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 95 Cal.App. 781, 273 P. 630; Mendelsohn v. Van Herick, 133 Cal.App. 612, 24 P.2d 878; 19 Cal.Jur. 621; Restatement, Torts, sec. 343. The invitor's responsibility is not absolute but he is "required to use ordinary care for the safety of the persons he invites to come upon the premises. If there is a danger attending upon such entry, or upon the work which the person invited is to do thereon, and such danger arises from causes or conditions not readily apparent to the eye, it is the duty of the owner to give such person reasonable notice or warning of such danger." Shanley v. American Olive Co., supra, 185 Cal. at page 555, 197 P. at page 794. The evidence indicates further that defendants undertook to prepare the dehydrator tank for the welding operation and, in that event, a duty of reasonable care devolved upon them to make the tank safe for the purpose for which it was supplied. Mondine v. Sarlin, 11 Cal.2d 593, 597, 81 P.2d 903; Restatement, Torts, Sec. 392.

[6-8] Defendants contend, however, that there is no evidence from which it could be found that they were guilty of negligence. It may be conceded that plaintiffs have not produced evidence which tends to establish specific acts of negligence. Negligence was pleaded generally, and plaintiffs rely upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to establish a prima facie case of negligence sufficient to warrant submitting the case to the jury. This doctrine is applicable where a thing is shown to be under the exclusive management or control of the defendant or his servants and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care. In such cases an inference arises that the accident resulted from a want of proper care on the part of the defendants. Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 556, 40 P. 1020, 29 L.R.A. 718, 48 Am.St.Rep. 146; Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 607, 265 P. 238, 59 A.L.R. 480; Hernandez v. Southern California Gas Co., 213 Cal. 384, 2 P.2d 360; 1 Shearman & Redfield, Negligence, Rev.Ed.1941, pp. 149 et seq.; 23 Cal.L.Rev. 169; 10 So. Cal.L.Rev. 166; 19 Cal.Jur. 704. It is incumbent upon the defendant in such a case to bring forth evidence to rebut the inference of negligence, and under such circumstances a nonsuit is improper since the case should be submitted to the jury. Anderson v. I. M. Jameson Corporation, 7 Cal.2d 60, 59 P.2d 962; Prosser, Torts (1941), pp. 302 et seq.; 23 Cal.L.Rev. 169. It is urged by defendants that they did not have exclusive control over the dehydrator tank during the time the welding was being done and that consequently no inference of negligence should arise. The evidence introduced by plaintiffs, however, indicates that the explosion was caused by the unexplained absence of water at the top of the tank behind the spot where the welding was to be done. The work done by deceased on the outside of the tank had no relation whatever to the complicated system of valves and pipes which regulated the water level within the tank and, insofar as the matter can be determined upon the evidence introduced by plaintiffs, such matters were within the exclusive control of the defendants. At no time had the tank passed into the hands or control of any intermediate or third person. The cases relied upon by defendants are distinguishable either upon the ground that the cause of the accident could not be determined from the evidence before the court (Biddlecomb v. Haydon, 4 Cal.App.2d 361, 40 P.2d 873; Hubbert v. Aztec Brewing Co., 26 Cal.App.2d 664, 80 P.2d 185, 1016; White v. Spreckels, 10 Cal.App. 287, 101 P. 920) or upon the ground that the defendants actually had relinquished their control over the instrumentality which caused the injury. Peters v. Pioneer Laundry Co., 32 Cal.App.2d 494, 90 P.2d 146. In the present case the absence of water in the dehydrator tank, which resulted in the explosion, is not such an occurrence as happens in the ordinary course of things if those in control of the matter have used the proper amount of care. Under the facts of this case, therefore, we think an inference of negligence on the part of defendants arises which they are required to rebut and which is sufficient to take the case to the jury.

The judgment of nonsuit is reversed.

Mandamus proceeding by Monterey Peninsula Airport District against Edna Mason, as secretary of the Monterey Peninsula Airport District, to compel defendant to affix the official seal of the district to certain bonds.

Writ issued.

Argyll Campbell, of Monterey, for petitioner.

Orrick, Dahlquist, Neff & Herrington, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

By this proceeding in mandamus the Monterey Peninsula Airport District, a public corporation, seeks to compel respondent, as secretary of its board of directors, to execute and sign, and to affix the official seal of the district to certain "Acquisition and Improvement Bonds, Issue of 1942," as authorized and directed by resolution of the board. The respondent has demurred to the petition, contending that the act creating the petitioner district, Stats.1941, ch. 52, p. 684, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1941 Supp., Act 153, is invalid in that it violates the provision of the Constitution which forbids local or special laws in all cases "where a general law can be made applicable." Cal.Const., art. IV, sec. 25, subd. 33.

The challenged act creates and defines the extent of the petitioner district and empowers it to establish and maintain an airport for civil and military purposes. It also empowers the district to borrow money from the United States and to issue bonds to raise money when authorized by resolution of its board of directors. The legislature has declared the act to be an urgency measure necessary to the preservation of the public peace, health and safety because of the existence of a state of war "in numerous areas throughout the world," thus requiring augmentation of the inadequate air facilities at Monterey for purposes of national defense—an urgency made more acute because of events transpiring since enactment of the act. The act further declares that the War Department has certified the Monterey Municipal Airport, which has been acquired by the district, as necessary for national defense and that a federal appropriation in excess of $700,000 has been approved for its enlargement.

The Works Project Administration has approved the project and federal funds have been allocated to the district contingent upon the acquisition by it of adjacent lands, contemplated to cost in excess of $214,000, and a cash contribution by the district of not less than $25,000. In order to acquire these necessary funds the district, through its board of directors, by resolution has authorized issuance of bonds aggregating $250,000, which bonds it is here sought to have respondent sign.

In support of her demurrer and contention that the act here involved is special legislation and therefore violative of the cited constitutional provision, respondent relies principally upon the case of Ventura County Harbor District v. Board of Supervisors, 211 Cal. 271, 295 P. 6, and argues that at the time the legislation here challenged was enacted there was in existence a general act of the legislature entitled the California Airport District Act, Stats.1929, p. 1857, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 150, providing for the establishment of airport districts in the state.

[1] This argument, however, disregards the fact that the general act is wholly permissive in nature and does not provide for the mandatory establishment of airports. It requires a petition signed by a percentage of the voters in the district, notice and hearing before the Board of Supervisors, a general election in the area to determine whether the district shall be established and a two-thirds vote of the electors for the issuance of bonds. The present act, on the contrary, is designed to authorize the prompt and mandatory improvement of the airport in question for purposes of national defense.

[2] This court has held that if a general act is inadequate to accomplish certain objectives necessary for the protection of the public health, safety and morals, the legislature may enact more specific legislation dealing with the subject without violating the constitutional inhibition aimed at special legislation. This was recognized in the case of American River Flood Control District v. Sweet, 214 Cal. 778, 7 P.2d 1030, 1031, which presented a situation and problem analogous to those here presented. The cited case points out that the Ventura case, supra, relied on here by respondent, recognizes "that special legislation might coexist with a general law on the subject, and that it would be deemed a valid exercise of legislature power until it is demonstrated that a general law could be made applicable." It also points out, which is also significant here, that "the general law is permissive only. The initiation of proceedings for the formation of such districts under general law must depend on the voluntary petition of landowners in the district. The landowners in the district might never file, or might indefinitely delay the filing of, such a petition. Here the district is created by the special act. It has no alternative but to function and carry out the purposes of the act. The act contemplates the safeguards of life and property. * * * The project contemplated by the act is one of the essential parts of the coordinated plan. * * * The federal act made certain appropriations in aid of the plan provided for by the act here in question, conditioned * * * on assurances that appropriations would be made by the state of California * * *."

[3] The facts of the present case are even more compelling than those of the cited case. Here, the legislature in providing for the protection of a large and populous area has created a public corporation to execute an important unit of the national defense plan. The accomplishment of this project presents a problem unlike any other existing in the state and the machinery of the general law is inadequate to accomplish the objective. The legislature, in its wisdom, has determined that a solution of the problem lies only in the creation of a separate and special entity. It is not our province to interfere with that determination.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed, and pursuant to stipulation of the parties, here filed, waiving the statutory time within which such writ may issue, it is further ordered that such peremptory writ may issue upon the filing of this decision.

SHENK, Justice.

The petitioner seeks the writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent superior court from exercising jurisdiction in a pending action until it has ordered the presence of parties claimed to be indispensable to a complete determination of the controversy. See section 389, Code of Civil Procedure. This court issued the alternative writ. The matter is submitted on the petition and the respondent's demurrer and answer.

The pleadings herein show that on March 15, 1941, Sallyneil B. Wilson commenced an action in the Superior Court in Los Angeles County naming the First National Trust and Savings Bank of San Diego, petitioner herein, as the sole defendant. The plaintiff in that action sought to recover from the defendant, trustee of an express trust, one-half of the income from the trust estate under an amendment to the declaration of trust whereby the plaintiff was made a beneficiary of the trust. The following are the facts alleged in the complaint in that action:

On August 16, 1929, Edith W. Crose executed a declaration of trust covering real and personal property, naming the First National Trust and Savings Bank of San Diego as trustee to collect the income therefrom and pay the same to Juliet Guthrie Wilson during her lifetime, and upon her death to her surviving issue. Juliet Guthrie Wilson died in December, 1929, and was survived by her son, F. Guthrie Wilson, and her daughter, Edith W. Crose. The trustee thereupon paid the income from the trust estate to the two surviving children in equal shares.

The trust instrument provided that the trustor should have the right, upon thirty days' written notice to the trustee, to revoke the trust in whole or in part and to alter or amend the same by a memorandum in writing delivered to the trustee, provided the amendment be accepted by the trustee. On June 30, 1933, the trustor, Edith W. Crose, executed and delivered to the trustee an amendment of the trust declaration as follows: "F. Guthrie Wilson, my brother, is about to marry one Sallyneil Braden. In the event said marriage is consummated, and in case said Sallyneil Braden survives F. Guthrie Wilson, then in that event, I direct the trustee shall pay to her for so long as she may live, all of the income to which the said F. Guthrie Wilson would have been entitled had he survived."

The trustee accepted the amendment. On July 29, 1933, Sallyneil Braden married F. Guthrie Wilson. On December 14, 1940, F. Guthrie Wilson died. The trustee refused to recognize the validity of the foregoing amendment to the trust declaration and the plaintiff brought the action for the purpose of establishing herself as beneficiary of one-half of the income of the trust, that being the portion which F. Guthrie Wilson would have received had he lived. The plaintiff also sought an accounting and a declaration of the rights of the parties.

It was also alleged in the complaint that F. Guthrie Wilson and Edith W. Crose were the sole issue of said Juliet Guthrie Wilson and therefore became the sole beneficiaries of the trust. The original trust declaration, annexed as an exhibit to the complaint, contained the following provisions with respect to the payment of the net income derived from the estate after the death of the first named beneficiary, Juliet Guthrie Wilson:

"Upon the death of Juliet Guthrie Wilson, the trustee shall pay the net income * * * to the issue of Juliet Guthrie Wilson living at each income date until the termination of this trust as hereinafter provided.

"Upon the death of the last survivor of the Trustor, Juliet Guthrie Wilson, F. Guthrie Wilson, brother of the Trustor, and Janet C. Stanley and Catherine C. Crose, daughters of the Trustor, this trust shall cease and determine, and thereupon the Trustee shall transfer, pay over, convey and deliver the trust estate and any accumulations thereof then in its hands, to the issue of Juliet Guthrie Wilson then living, per stirpes and not per capita.

"In case Henry T. Stanley, Jr., Grandchild of the Trustor, shall not have attained the age of thirty (30) years at the time of the termination of this trust, his share of the trust estate shall vest but possession thereof shall be postponed" until he shall have attained the age of thirty years. Similar provisions were made respecting the share of "any other beneficiary, being the issue of Juliet Guthrie Wilson, under the age of thirty (30) years at the time of the termination of this trust."

The defendant trustee filed an answer in said action alleging that in fact Juliet Guthrie Wilson was the trustor, and that Edith W. Crose was not the owner of the trust property nor the trustor, and denying that the plaintiff was a beneficiary of the trust. In the answer it was admitted that the amendment of June 30, 1933, was executed by Edith W. Crose, but it was alleged that Edith W. Crose, purporting to act as trustor, on April 22, 1935, executed another instrument amending the trust declaration, accepted by the trustee, which was a substitute for the amendment of June 30, 1933, and provided that Sallyneil B. Wilson, should she survive F. Guthrie Wilson, should receive two-thirds of the income to which F. Guthrie Wilson would have been entitled, unless she became divorced from her husband or should remarry, and but one-third of such income upon termination of the trust, unless she had been divorced or had remarried.

On the trial the defendant in the action objected to the introduction of evidence on the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction to render judgment therein without the presence of Edith W. Crose, Janet C. Stanley, Catherine C. Crose and Henry T. Stanley, Jr., who were named in the original trust instrument. On July 22, 1941, the trial court rendered an interlocutory judgment whereby it decreed that the original trust instrument was duly amended by the writing dated June 30, 1933, but that the instrument of April 22, 1935, was ineffective as a modification of said amendment and of said trust instrument and was therefore void; that upon the death of Juliet Guthrie Wilson, F. Guthrie Wilson became one of the two sole surviving beneficiaries of the trust and was entitled to one-half the income therefrom so long as he lived, and that upon his death the plaintiff became entitled to the same share of the income. The court ordered the trustee to render an accounting and report of its administration under oath. It also ordered that Edith W. Crose, the trustor under the trust instrument, and the only other beneficiary thereunder, be made a party to the action "for the purpose of the accounting"; further, "that she be served forthwith with a copy of this judgment; that she, as well as the plaintiff, be served by the defendant trustee with a copy of the account * * * that said Edith W. Crose, as well as the plaintiff, serve and file herein her objections and exceptions to such account and the same be set for hearing and determination, upon motion of any of the three parties to such accounting. * * * That plaintiff have a personal judgment, with costs, against the defendant, for any and all" income found to be due and payable to the plaintiff after the court "shall have passed upon said account and rendered its decision thereon," and that said Edith W. Crose should have a personal judgment against the defendant trustee for any sums found to be due her as a result of such accounting.

It is asserted that, as there is no appeal from the interlocutory judgment, any appeal from the final judgment would be inadequate and that the petitioner is therefore entitled to the writ of prohibition to restrain the exercise of jurisdiction by the respondent court until the additional parties have been brought in.

The petitioner contends that all beneficiaries of a trust are indispensable parties; that without their presence the trial court has no jurisdiction to proceed; that Edith W. Crose, Janet C. Stanley, Catherine C. Crose and Henry T. Stanley, Jr., are beneficiaries of the trust and are therefore such indispensable parties; also that the respondent court had no jurisdiction to enter a judgment in favor of Edith W. Crose until she had been made a party as provided by section 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The interlocutory judgment is declaratory of the right of Edith W. Crose, when she shall have been brought in as a party by the service of summons as required by law (section 410, Code of Civil Procedure), to a personal judgment against the trustee, if any amounts be shown to be due her by the accounting. The interlocutory judgment does not serve as such personal judgment against the trustee. A personal judgment, it is assumed, will not be entered until the court has acquired jurisdiction of Edith W. Crose as a party in the action, and after an opportunity has been given to her to file any pleadings she may be entitled to file and to be heard on any objections she may timely make. Likewise, the entry of the interlocutory judgment does not prevent the defendants in the action from urging error in the accounting, or otherwise, upon appeal from the final judgment.

It may be assumed that under the law the beneficiaries of a trust are indispensable parties to an action involving conflicting rights between themselves or between them and the trustee. McPherson v. Parker, 30 Cal. 455, 456, 89 Am.Dec. 129; O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435, 16 P. 236; Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 84 P. 145, 6 L.R.A.,N.S., 275; Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Henry, 208 Cal. 185, 280 P. 959. But whether the writ should issue in this proceeding involves more than a mere declaration that beneficiaries of a trust are indispensable parties to such an action. It must first be shown that the parties claimed to be indispensable are beneficiaries of the trust.

In support of its contention that all the persons named in the trust declaration are beneficiaries of the trust the petitioner relies on an excerpt from the opinion in the case of Bank of California v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 516, at page 521, 106 P. 2d 879. There this court defined as indispensable parties persons who have undetermined interests in the same property, or in a particular trust fund, and one of them seeks in an action to recover the whole, to fix his share, or to recover a portion claimed by him. In that case an application for the writ of prohibition was denied because it appeared that the interests of the persons not ordered to be brought in were not involved and would not be "affected" by any decree which the trial court would or could render on the issues presented for determination. It was there recognized that the issuance of the writ of prohibition in such cases may be a matter of discretion, depending on the particular facts and circumstances.

[1, 2] On the facts and issues involved in the action pending in the respondent court it likewise appears that it would not be appropriate for this Court to grant the trustee's application for the writ of prohibition. The principal issues in the action are the construction of the provisions of the trust and the determination of who are beneficiaries thereunder. Those issues were raised not only by the defendant's denials of the allegations of the complaint, but also by affirmative allegations contained in its answer. It is apparent that the trial court, for the purpose of the interlocutory decree only, and in order that all the beneficiaries of the trust might be brought in, determined that the surviving children of Juliet Guthrie Wilson, namely, F. Guthrie Wilson and Edith W. Crose, were the sole beneficiaries of the trust. Accordingly Edith W. Crose was ordered brought into the action. In so far as the record in this proceeding is concerned, there is no showing upon which we may properly conclude that a mandatory duty rests upon the respondent court to order persons other than Edith W. Crose now to be brought into the action. In Ambassador Petroleum Co. v. Superior Court, 208 Cal. 667, at page 671, 284 P. 445, it was pointed out that a mandatory duty to order other parties brought in is shown only when the trial court finds or the record indisputably discloses that such parties are indispensable to a complete determination of the controversy. See, also, Morrow v. Superior Court, 9 Cal.App.2d 16, at pages 26, 27, 48 P.2d 188, 50 P.2d 66, opinion of this court on denial of petition for hearing; De Olazabal v. Mix, 24 Cal.App.2d 258, 74 P. 2d 787. It was there stated that when the course of judicial action appeared to be mandatory, the writ of prohibition would be appropriate. It cannot be said that the record in this proceeding presents such a case. Furthermore, it is not shown that the portion of the income from the fund claimed by the plaintiff in the pending action, if the same be granted to her by the final judgment, will necessarily purport to diminish any share or income to which persons not now ordered to be brought in may become entitled under the terms of the trust. Any further review of the question of who are beneficiaries of the trust is one which properly may be considered only on an appeal from the final judgment. Bank of California v. Superior Court, supra; Fitts v. Superior Court, 4 Cal.2d 514, 519, 51 P.2d 66, 102 A.L.R. 290.

The petitioner has also failed to establish that its remedy by appeal will prove inadequate. The additional persons now sought to be brought into the pending action are concededly not presently entitled to any of the income from the trust concerning which the trustee has been ordered to render an accounting. If on the appeal from the final judgment such additional persons are determined to be beneficiaries of any part of the trust estate their rights to future participation in the income can be saved to them by appropriate direction. The plaintiff seeks to participate only in the income from the trust. All the parties who have any present right to such income are or will be before the court before final judgment.

In the light of the foregoing considerations the issuance of the peremptory writ would serve only to delay further the matter of the accounting by the trustee and thus postpone without reason the final disposition of the controversy.

The peremptory writ is denied.

I dissent. The majority opinion in the present case concludes that this court should not issue its writ of prohibition to halt the proceedings in the court below, despite the fact that the court has exceeded its jurisdiction by proceeding in the absence of an indispensable party and although further action remains to be taken by the trial court.

Stated in simplest terms, the facts are that Edith W. Crose and F. Guthrie Wilson, as the surviving issue of Juliet Guthrie Wilson, were entitled upon her death to share equally in the income from certain trust property. When F. Guthrie Wilson died in 1940, Edith W. Crose would have been entitled to the entire current income under the terms of the original trust instrument. The plaintiff, Sallyneil B. Wilson, who is the surviving wife of F. Guthrie Wilson, claims that she is entitled to receive her husband's share of the income under the terms of an amendment to the trust instrument executed in 1933. A further amendment of the trust instrument in 1935 purported, under certain conditions stated therein, to grant the plaintiff two-thirds of the share to which F. Guthrie Wilson was entitled during his lifetime. The defendant trustee refused to recognize the 1933 amendment after the death of F. Guthrie Wilson, and plaintiff brought this action to enforce the trust according to the terms of that amendment.

At the commencement of the trial the trustee objected to the jurisdiction of the court to proceed in the absence of Edith W. Crose and the other beneficiaries of the trust upon the ground that they were indispensable parties to the action. The trial court overruled this objection and proceeded to the trial with the trustee as the sole defendant. In the absence of Edith W. Crose, who would have been entitled to the entire present income under the original trust instrument, the court determined that the amendment of 1933 was valid and that the amendment of 1935 was null and void. It determined that the plaintiff, Sallyneil B. Wilson, should "have and receive all the income therefrom and arising thereunder as long as she may live and to which said F. Guthrie Wilson would have been entitled had he survived." The court ordered that the defendant trustee make an accounting and that Edith W. Crose "be, and she is hereby made a party to this action for the purpose of the accounting to be had herein * * *." It was ordered that a copy of the judgment establishing plaintiff's right to one-half of the trust income be served upon Edith W. Crose, that she be served with a copy of the trustee's account, that she file her objections to such account, and that she as well as the plaintiff be granted a personal judgment against the trustee for the amount found to be due as a result of the accounting.

The law is settled in this state that, where one of several beneficiaries seeks to fix his share in a trust fund and where judgment in his favor would inevitably determine the amount available for others similarly situated, such other beneficiaries are indispensable parties. A judgment rendered in their absence and purporting to determine their rights is in excess of the court's jurisdiction. Bank of California v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 516, 521, 106 P. 2d 879; O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435, 16 P. 236. When such parties are indispensable to a complete determination of the controversy, the court must order that they be brought in. Code Civ. Proc. § 389; Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 7, 84 P. 145, 6 L.R.A.,N.S., 275. In the present case a determination that the plaintiff is entitled to any portion of the present income inevitably reduces the income to which Edith W. Crose is entitled and under the cases above cited she is an indispensable party to the action. This is not true, however, as to the other beneficiaries who have no interest in the income in which plaintiff seeks to establish her share. The majority opinion apparently concedes that Edith W. Crose is an indispensable party. The opinion does not hold that the action already taken by the trial court is valid in so far as it has attempted to determine the rights of Edith W. Crose in her absence. Instead, the denial of the writ of prohibition is sought to be justified upon the ground that the court belatedly ordered that Edith W. Crose be made a party for the purpose of the accounting. This does not warrant a denial of prohibition under the facts here presented. The rights of an indispensable party cannot be protected by an order which, as indicated above, made her a party "for the purpose of the accounting." That order was made as a part of the interlocutory judgment which purported to establish the relative interests of plaintiff and Edith W. Crose in the trust income and which ordered that final judgment be entered for each of them in the amount determined to be due after the accounting. Nor is it an answer to say that any error can be corrected upon an appeal from the final judgment. The fact that an indispensable party was not present when her rights were adjudicated constitutes a fatal defect in the action below which is clearly disclosed in the present prohibition proceeding. That being so, there is no sound reason for permitting the trial court to continue to a final judgment which must inevitably be reversed upon the appeal.

Since the respondent court has proceeded in excess of its jurisdiction by purporting to determine the plaintiff's right to one-half of the trust income in the absence of Edith W. Crose and since the court has ordered that an accounting be held and final judgment be entered for plaintiff in accordance therewith, a writ of prohibition should issue both to restrain further acts of the trial court and to correct the past acts of the court in excess of its jurisdiction. It is true that ordinarily the writ of prohibition is a preventive, rather than a corrective, remedy. But, from the early case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 390, 24 P. 121, 10 L.R.A. 627, 18 Am.St.Rep. 192, down to the comparatively recent case of Evans v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 563, 580, 96 P.2d 107, it has been consistently recognized that "the operation of the writ of prohibition is excluded only in cases where the action of the inferior tribunal is completed, and nothing remains to be done in pursuance of its void order. If its action is not completed and ended, its further proceedings may be stayed; and, if it is necessary for the purpose of affording complete and adequate relief, what has been done will be undone." (Italics added.) Havemeyer v. Superior Court, supra [84 Cal. 327, 24 P. 137, 10 L.R.A. 627, 18 Am.St.Rep. 192]; see, also, Pierce v. Superior Court, 1 Cal. 2d 759, 782, 37 P.2d 453, 460, 96 A.L.R. 1020; 21 Cal.Jur. 581. Here the action of the trial court "in pursuance of its void order" is not "completed and ended," for it has ordered an accounting upon the basis of which a final judgment is to be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the specific amount found to be due in accordance with the terms of the interlocutory judgment. The writ of prohibition is available and should be used to restrain the contemplated action of the trial court in pursuance of its invalid decree. In order to furnish complete and adequate relief, the writ should direct that the trial court correct its invalid proceedings by permitting Edith W. Crose to participate fully as a party in any action the purpose of which is to determine that plaintiff is entitled to a share in the present trust income.

The majority opinion, it should be noted, does not give validity to the acts of the court below which were in excess of its jurisdiction. Under the law of this jurisdiction, as established by the decisions of this court, the attempt to adjudicate the rights of an absent, indispensable party was futile. Those rights are unaffected by the void decree and the absent party whose interests were thus infringed may attack the decree directly or collaterally. Bank of California v. Superior Court, supra, and cases cited therein. The majority opinion by refusing to issue the writ merely postpones an actual determination of the rights involved in the present case.

The writ should issue.

In re ROBINSON'S ESTATE.

ROBINSON v. HILL et al.

L. A. 17573.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 16, 1942.

1. Judgment ⇐338

When all parties affected by judgment are actually or constructively before the court with an opportunity to assert their contentions and to appeal from an adverse ruling, the finding of jurisdictional facts by the court may be reviewed only by an appeal or other timely and available direct attack.

2. Judgment ⇐338

The superior court cannot, after time for appeal has elapsed, set aside a judgment or order on ground that the court lacked jurisdiction, when the facts establishing such jurisdiction were found by the court in original proceedings, and all adverse parties were properly served with notice and had opportunity to present their objections.

3. Executors and administrators ⇐29(3)

Where notice of hearing in superior court of Los Angeles county on petition for letters of administration on the estate of a nonresident decedent was given in accordance with law, and there was no contention that heirs did not receive notice or did not have opportunity to attend, and an order was entered granting letters, and such order was unappealed, and the time for appeal therefrom had elapsed, the order was conclusive and could not be set aside in subsequent proceedings on ground that the court lacked jurisdiction of subject matter because decedent had no property in Los Angeles county at time of death.

4. Executors and administrators ⇐29(3)

Under statute providing that, in absence of "fraud" in its procurement, an order of the superior court granting letters of administration, when it becomes final, is a conclusive determination of the court's jurisdiction, except when based upon the erroneous assumption of death, the word fraud refers to extrinsic fraud, and a case of "extrinsic fraud" is not presented when all parties entitled to notice have been notified and have been given an opportunity to appear and contest issuance of letters and when the letters have been issued on a showing of required jurisdictional facts, even though it might thereafter develop that decedent left no property in the county, or that a probate proceeding in another state or county was pending. Probate Code, § 302.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Extrinsic Fraud" and "Fraud".

5. Executors and administrators ⇐29(3)

In proceedings for issuance of letters of administration on the estate of a nonresident decedent, implied findings of the superior court of Los Angeles county that decedent left property in that county and that administrative proceedings were not pending in another state or county, even if erroneous, were not sufficient to disturb finality of order granting letters, where order was otherwise valid.

6. Executors and administrators ⇐32(2)

A motion to vacate an order granting letters of administration on the estate of a nonresident decedent, and which motion was resisted by administrator on ground that there was property of the estate subject to administration in California, could not be construed as a proceeding pursuant to provisions of the Probate Code respecting termination of administration proceedings where there is no property subject to administration. Probate Code, § 1068.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of William Robinson, deceased, wherein Glen M. Robinson was appointed administrator and Minnie Lee Hill and others made a motion to vacate the order appointing Glen M. Robinson as administrator. From an order granting the motion, Glen M. Robinson, as administrator, etc., appeals, opposed by Minnie Lee Hill and others.

SHENK, Justice.

This is an appeal from an order setting aside an order granting letters of administration. Two notices of appeal and two bills of exception were filed by the administrator. They present the same questions for determination and will be considered as one appeal.

On June 1, 1937, Glen M. Robinson, a grandson of the decedent, William Robinson, filed in the superior court in Los Angeles County, a verified petition for letters of administration of the estate of his grandfather. The petition recited that the decedent died on or about the 15th day of December, 1935, in the county of Tippecanoe, State of Indiana; that he was a resident of that state; that he left estate in the county of Los Angeles, State of California, consisting of United States Government bonds of an unknown value believed to be in the possession of Minnie Lee Robinson, a daughter of the decedent and a resident of Los Angeles County; that the heirs of the decedent were D. E. Robinson, a son, aged 57, living in the city of Los Angeles, Minnie Lee Robinson, a daughter, aged 63, living in El Monte, Los Angeles County, and Edward Robinson, aged 65, a son, living in Lafayette, Indiana; and that the decedent left no will. Notice was given in accordance with law and there is no contention that the heirs did not receive actual notice, or that they did not have an opportunity to attend the hearing on the petition. The hearing was held without any objection to the granting of letters as requested, and an order granting the same was entered. No appeal was taken therefrom. On April 14, 1938, Glen M. Robinson qualified and letters of administration were issued to him.

On January 4, 1939, the administrator brought an action in the superior court in Los Angeles County against Minnie Lee Robinson and her daughter, Pauline Mann, and the latter's husband, Carl L. Mann, to recover possession of United States Government bonds of approximately $40,000, or real estate or other property into which the same had been converted, under a claim that such property belonged to the estate of the decedent.

On March 11, 1939, Minnie Lee Robinson (now Minnie Lee Hill) and the Manns served a notice of motion to set aside the probate proceedings and to vacate the order appointing Glen M. Robinson as administrator on the ground that the court in Los Angeles County had no jurisdiction of the subject matter for the asserted reason that the decedent had no property in said county at the time of his death, and for alleged fraud practiced on the court by Glen M. Robinson. The affidavits of the moving parties stated that the decedent was a resident of Indiana at the time of his death and owned no property in California; that no probate proceedings had been commenced or were pending in the State of Indiana, and that certain criminal proceedings had been instituted in Indiana against Minnie Lee Hill and Pauline Mann concerning the alleged conversion of estate property but that the same had been dismissed; and that about six months after the death of William Robinson, Minnie Lee Hill and the Manns moved to California. The administrator opposed the granting of the motion. The affidavits of himself and of D. E. Robinson, son of the decedent living in Los Angeles County, averred that at the time of his death William Robinson was the owner of about $30,000 in Liberty Bonds and $9,000 in cash of which Minnie Lee Hill had obtained possession; that Minnie Lee Hill admitted to her brother in California that she had possession of such property and acknowledged that it was the property of the father's estate; also that she desired to divide the property with D. E. Robinson in equal shares so that Edward Robinson, the brother in Indiana, would receive no part of the estate, but that D. E. Robinson refused to enter into any such plan, agreement or division; that D. E. Robinson received monthly from Minnie Lee Hill one-third of the income from said bonds from the date of the death of the decedent until July, 1937. It was also averred that Minnie Lee Hill admitted that she had invested a portion of said cash and Liberty Bonds in income-producing real estate, known as Walnut Auto Court, situated in El Monte, California. The motion to set aside the probate proceedings was denied on April 5, 1939, and no appeal was taken from the order denying the same.

On April 10, 1939, Glen M. Robinson filed his first account as administrator wherein he reported to the court the claim of the estate against Minnie Lee Hill and the Manns and filed a description of the property, including the real estate purchased by Minnie Lee Hill and claimed to be a part of the estate. He also reported the commencement of the action in the superior court in Los Angeles County for the recovery of the property, and the filing of a lis pendens. Notice of the hearing on the account and report was given and on May 1, 1939, the court entered an order approving and settling the account and report and no appeal therefrom was taken.

On January 31, 1940, Minnie Lee Hill and the Manns again moved the court for an order setting aside the probate proceedings and vacating the order appointing Glen M. Robinson as administrator. The motion was made on the same grounds as the former motion, and on the additional ground that at the time of the appointment of Glen M. Robinson as administrator there was pending in Hendricks County, Indiana, a proceeding to administer the estate of the decedent which had never been terminated, all of which had not been revealed to the court by said Glen M. Robinson at the time of his application for letters of administration. It was shown that special letters of administration were issued to one Edgar M. Blessing, an attorney, in Indiana, on the petition of Clay D. Robinson, a grandson of the decedent; that the special administrator sought to examine Minnie Lee Hill and Pauline Mann in a proceeding to discover assets in the course of the administration of the estate; that in said proceeding Minnie Lee Hill and Pauline Mann denied any knowledge of estate property; that subsequently they were accused by the State of Indiana of falsely testifying in said proceeding, but for lack of sufficient evidence the criminal proceeding was dismissed.

The administrator also resisted the granting of the second motion to set aside the probate proceedings on the ground that the jurisdictional facts had theretofore been determined by the court in prior proceedings and that said determinations had become final and could not be attacked collaterally, as well as on the ground that the property in the possession of Minnie Lee Hill and claimed to belong to the estate was property of the decedent subject to administration in California. On March 6, 1940, the court granted the motion of January 31, 1940, to vacate the order appointing Glen M. Robinson as administrator, and this appeal is from that order.

[1, 2] The administrator as appellant urges that the prior proceedings are final and conclusive and compel a reversal of the order. He relies on Estate of Estrem, 16 Cal.2d 563, 107 P.2d 36. In that case the superior court in Alameda County ordered the admission to probate of a will of the decedent on a petition alleging that the decedent had died in Belgium, a resident of France, and had left estate in the counties of Alameda and Fresno in the State of California. No appeal was taken from the order admitting the will to probate and the order became final. On a subsequent motion to set aside the order made pursuant to section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it appeared that a later will had been admitted to probate in France by a decree prior in time to the order of the court in Alameda County, and that there was no property of the estate in Alameda County. The appeal in that case was from an order denying the motion. This court rejected the contention that a jurisdictional fact appearing outside the judgment roll of the order sought to be vacated, namely, the fact of an absence of property in Alameda County, could be considered to establish this invalidity of an order otherwise valid on its face. It was said at page 570 and following of 16 Cal.2d, at page 40 of 107 P.2d: "The jurisdiction of the court to render a judgment or order often depends upon the preliminary determination of certain jurisdictional facts. When all parties affected are actually or constructively before it with an opportunity to assert their contentions and to appeal from an adverse ruling, the finding of such facts by the court may be reviewed only by an appeal or other timely and available direct attack. This finding cannot be attacked in proceeding under paragraph 4 of section 473 to have the judgment declared void, nor can it be attacked in any collateral proceeding. In such situations the finding is as conclusive as any other finding of fact by the court in the original proceeding. * * * In the present case the superior court of Alameda county, in admitting the will to probate, necessarily found in accordance with the allegations of the petition that the decedent had left property in Alameda County. The appellants were served with notice of such proceeding and had full opportunity to come in and contest such a finding. If the finding was erroneous, it could have been attacked on appeal. The time for appeal having elapsed, the finding has become conclusive." The court "cannot, after time for appeal has elapsed, set aside a judgment or order on the ground that the court lacked jurisdiction, when the facts establishing such jurisdiction were found by the court in the original proceedings, and all adverse parties were properly served with notice and had the opportunity to present their objections." The order denying the motion to vacate was affirmed. See, also, Security-First National Bank v. Superior Court, 1 Cal.2d 749, 37 P.2d 69.

[3] There is no distinction between the Estrem case and the present case which would justify a refusal to follow the well-settled doctrine of conclusiveness of such an order as is here involved.

[4] The respondents rely on the following italicized language of section 302 of the Probate Code, which reads: "In the absence of fraud in its procurement, an order of the superior court granting letters, when it becomes final, is a conclusive determination of the jurisdiction of the court (except when based upon the erroneous assumption of death), and cannot be collaterally attacked." We need observe only that the fraud mentioned in that code provision refers to extrinsic fraud. As indicated in the Estrem decision a case of extrinsic fraud is not presented when all the parties entitled to notice have been notified and have been given an opportunity to appear and contest the issuance of letters, and when as here, the letters have been issued on a showing of the required jurisdictional facts even though it might thereafter develop that the decedent "left" no property in the county or that a probate proceeding in another state or county was pending.

[5, 6] The respondents also rely on Lake v. Bonynge, 161 Cal. 120, 118 P. 535, and Estate of Ivory, 37 Cal.App.2d 22, 98 P.2d 761, as support for their contention that an admission by the adverse party of a fact showing fraud or lack of jurisdiction would be sufficient justification for vacating the order on collateral attack. In Lake v. Bonynge, it was assumed that, on collateral attack, an admission by the adverse party that service of summons was not made on the defendant would be a sufficient basis upon which to decree the invalidity of the judgment. But, as observed in that case, the principle has no application where the record contains no such admission. Here the administrator throughout resisted the motion to set aside the order, and at no time was a statement made by him or on his behalf which could be construed as an admission of fraud such as would require the court to declare the order void. The implied findings that the decedent left property in Los Angeles County and that administrative proceedings were not pending in another state or country, even if admitted to be erroneous, would not be sufficient to disturb the finality of the otherwise valid order. If it should develop that there is no property of any kind belonging to the estate and subject to administration in the State of California, the appropriate course would be the filing of a petition signed and filed by the administrator or on his behalf showing such fact and praying for termination of the proceedings. Section 1068, Probate Code. The motion to vacate the probate proceeding which was resisted by the administrator on the ground that there is property of the estate subject to administration in California may not be construed as a proceeding pursuant to that section.

The order is reversed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clarence M. Hanson, Judge.

Action by Hubert F. Laugharn, as trustee in bankruptcy of the Commercial Rock Company, against James Carter, as director, etc., and others, to recover penalties imposed for nonpayment of commercial vehicle registration and license fees, paid under protest. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney and R. S. McLaughlin, Deputy Attys. Gen., for appellants.

Howard V. Calverley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, Justice.

This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,758 paid to the state under protest.

The plaintiff is the trustee of Commercial Rock Company, a bankrupt corporation. The corporation owned and operated twenty-three trucks on the public highways of this state prior to January 1, 1939, and from that date until March 6, 1939, at which time a petition in bankruptcy was filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California. On March 28, 1939, the district court appointed receivers who continued to operate the trucks and conduct the trucking business until August 1, 1939, on which date the corporation was adjudicated a bankrupt and the plaintiff herein was appointed the trustee in bankruptcy. On January 1, 1939, the registration fees applicable to the trucks pursuant to section 378 of the Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 2451, and the vehicle license fees, or "in lieu" tax, as provided by section 6 of the Vehicle License Fee Act, Stats.1935, p. 1312; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 5135 became delinquent. On February 5, 1939, the sum of $1758, called a penalty, was added to the amount required by the statute to be paid on the trucks because the corporation had failed to make payment of the registration and license fees, hereinafter called taxes, during the period from January 1, 1939 to February 5, 1939. On May 11, 1939, the receivers tendered to the state the amount of the taxes without the penalties and demanded license plates and registration of the trucks. The defendants refused to comply with the demand unless the penalties which had accrued on February 5, 1939, were also paid. The trucks were operated without the payment of the taxes until after the trustee was appointed when on August 9, 1939, the referee in bankruptcy directed the trustee to pay the penalties under protest and sue to recover the same by the action herein. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, doubtless on the theory that section 57, sub. j of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 93, sub. j, avoided the payment of penalties. That section, with an exception not here applicable provides: "Debts owing to the United States or any State or subdivision thereof as a penalty or forfeiture shall not be allowed * * *" in the bankruptcy proceeding.

The defendants advance two theories, on either one of which it is contended that the judgment is erroneous. First, that the so-called penalties were a part of the taxes; that the whole thereof was secured by a lien which attached prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy; that the lien continued until after the adjudication; that the taxes were collectible in bankruptcy as a lien claim, and the fact that they were called penalties is immaterial. And, second, that as the receivers operated the trucks for more than thirty days from the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy on March 6, 1939, and for more than thirty days after their appointment as receivers on March 28, 1939, and for more than thirty days before the tender of the taxes without the penalties, the taxes including the penalties were a part of the expense of operating the trucking business.

In support of their position the defendants call attention to the provisions of section 379(a) of the Vehicle Code St.1937, p. 505, to the effect that every registration or transfer fee (and of section 6 of the Vehicle License Fee Act that every license fee), "and any penalty added thereto, from the date the same become due, constitute a lien upon the vehicle for which due." The language just quoted is common to both acts. Attention may also be directed to the provisions of section 379(b) of the Vehicle Code that "The department [of motor vehicles] shall collect such fee and any penalty by seizure of such vehicle from the person or persons in possession thereof, if any, by the sale of such vehicle * * * in the same manner as is provided by law for the seizure and sale of personal property by the assessor for the collection of taxes due on personal property." Section 67, sub. b of the Bankruptcy Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 107, sub. b, provides that "statutory liens for taxes and debts owing to * * * any State * * * created or recognized by the laws * * * of any State, may be valid against the trustee, even though arising or perfected while the debtor is insolvent and within four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy." Section 67, sub. c of the same act provides that when, as here, the statutory lien for taxes due any state is not enforced before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy the same "shall be postponed in payment to the debts specified in clauses (1) and (2) of subdivision a of section 64 [104] of this act [title] * * *." Clause (1) refers to costs of administration and clause (2) refers to wages earned within three months.

Again, section 124a of the Judicial Code, 28 U.S.C.A., provides: "Any receiver, liquidator, referee, trustee, or other officers or agents appointed by any United States court who is authorized by said court to conduct any business, or who does conduct any business, shall, from and after June 18, 1934, be subject to all State and local taxes applicable to such business the same as if such business were conducted by an individual or corporation."

This court has held that the provisions of section 3627a of the Political Code, that "a penalty shall attach to the tax so levied," clearly means that the penalty becomes a part of the tax, County of Los Angeles v. Morrison, 15 Cal.2d 368, 373, 101 P.2d 470, 129 A.L.R. 443, and that property in the custody of the law (the Insurance Commissioner as liquidator), is not removed from the power of taxation, for the reason that "the percentage penalty for delinquency is as much a part of the tax as the principal amount." Carpenter v. Peoples Mutual Life Ins. Co., 10 Cal.2d 299, 303, 74 P.2d 508, 511.

[1] In the case of State of California v. Hisey, 84 F.2d 802, 805, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit stated with reference to the obligation of a receiver in equity to pay a penalty which had become a lien: "If the penalty, as well as the tax, is a lien upon the property in the hands of a receiver, as the statutes of California provide, it is difficult to see how the payment of the penalty can be differentiated from the payment of the lien for the tax. We can see no distinction. The penalty is a part of the tax." It has also been held that where both the penalties and taxes are secured by a lien existing at the time of adjudication in bankruptcy, section 57, sub. j of the Bankruptcy Act does not come into operation. In re Knox-Powell-Stockton Co., 9 Cir., 100 F.2d 979, 983.

In Boteler v. Ingels, 308 U.S. 57, 58, 521, 60 S.Ct. 29, 30, 84 L.Ed. 78, 442, the court said: "The single question presented is sufficiently stated by the petition for certiorari: 'Is a bankrupt's estate liable to penalties imposed by State statutes for non-payment of automobile license fees where license fees and penalties claims accrued during operations for purposes of liquidation of the business of bankrupt's estate by the Trustee in Bankruptcy?'" In answering the question in the affirmative, it was held that the trustee in bankruptcy was liable for the penalties which accrued while he was operating the business.

[2] For the purposes of this case it is unnecessary to go further than to conclude that upon delinquency the penalties became a part of the taxes; that the taxes then became an outstanding obligation in favor of the state; that the statutory lien securing the obligation attached and was in effect at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy and at the time of adjudication, and that there was nothing in the bankruptcy act which prevented the enforcement of such obligation.

The judgment is reversed.

DRAPEAU, Justice pro tem.

U. S. Highway 101 in California runs northerly and southerly for the whole length of the state, and follows approximately the shore line of the Pacific ocean. In southern California it divides into two routes, the most westerly one being called U. S. Alternate 101.

It was on U. S. Alternate 101, between the cities of Long Beach and Seal Beach, that a collision between an automobile and a loaded oil tank and trailer occurred, which caused the death of two persons and serious injuries to two others.

And it is with regard to the damages alleged to have been caused by this collision, and the resulting trial of these issues in the superior court that the appeals in this case have to do. Hereafter we will refer to Alternate 101 as the coast highway. Also, while the coast highway at this point runs southeasterly and northwesterly, we will hereafter speak of it as running north and south.

A short distance north of Seal Beach there was located a private road, leading in an easterly direction from the coast highway. At this intersection the level of the coast highway and the private roadway was a few feet above the surface of the adjoining ground. And at this intersection the coast highway was divided into four traffic lanes. Being outside of any specially restricted speed zone, traffic proceeded at a rapid rate of speed.

At the time of the collision owners of the land east of the highway, and upon which was located the private road, were the defendants, Fred H. Bixby Company and Continental Oil Company. Fred H. Bixby Company was the owner of the fee and lessor of an oil lease to defendant Continental Oil Company, as lessee. Oil had been discovered and was being produced upon the leased premises. In the lease was a covenant permitting the lessor, at its option, to take its royalty in oil rather than in cash. Prior to the collision, the lessor had exercised this option, and had contracted with defendant, Olympic Oil Company, to purchase the royalty oil which the defendant, Continental Oil Company, was obligated under the lease to deliver. Hereafter, for the sake of brevity, we will refer to these parties as Bixby, Continental, and Olympic.

Upon the exercise of the option to take it in kind, it became necessary to provide facilities to load the oil at some point upon the real property, so that it might be transported by truck to the refinery of Olympic. Therefore, there was constructed upon the north side of the private roadway, at a point about 70 feet from the coast highway, a loading rack, with pipes leading to it from Continental's oil tanks. At the loading rack these pipes were equipped with valves. In order to load tank trucks and trailers, the drivers thereof would turn from the coast highway into the private roadway, stop at the loading rack, open the valves to turn on the oil, and fill the tanks.

Olympic contracted with the defendant, A. P. Danaher, to truck the oil from the loading rack to Olympic's refinery near Long Beach. Mr. Danaher owned the tank truck and trailer which figured in the collision, which we will hereafter call the "tanker." The defendant, Herbert F. Yohann, was the driver of the tanker.

The collision occurred about 8:30 p. m. on November 17, 1937. The automobile was en route from San Diego to Long Beach. In it were four people; two couples, husbands and wives, returning to their homes in Long Beach from a day's outing. The two men were riding in the front seat of the automobile and the two women were in the back seat.

The defendant truck driver, Herbert F. Yohann, had come south from Long Beach, on the coast highway, driving the tanker. Reaching the intersection of the private roadway, he made a left turn easterly, drove to the loading rack, and filled his tanks.

Another tanker belonging to the defendant, Danaher, was parked on the coast highway. The driver of this tanker was talking to the defendant driver while the loading was going on.

When the tanker driven by Yohann was loaded, he backed it out into the coast highway, while the other driver was out there signaling with a flashlight to traffic coming in both directions. In backing out into the highway, the tanker described a quarter circle, so that when the backing was completed, it stopped, headed south on the coast highway, partly on the shoulder and partly on the most easterly fourth lane. In other words, at the conclusion of this backing process, the tanker was on the east side of the coast highway, and it was headed in the opposite direction from Long Beach, where it was to deliver the oil to the refinery.

Then the tanker started forward, making a right turn, which, if it had been completed, would have been a complete U turn and would have caused the tanker to have been headed north on the coast highway. While this last turn was in progress, the other driver was still signaling with his flashlight. The U turn was not completed, because as the tanker was making it, and just as the front of the tanker reached the center of the highway, the automobile driven by one of the decedents, traveling along the coast highway northward from Seal Beach to Long Beach, ran into the forward truck of the tanker, with the results above described.

In due time this action was brought by plaintiffs, surviving widow and parents of the decedent who was riding in the front seat of the automobile, and who was not driving.

Continental and Olympic were joined as defendants upon the theory that they were negligent in locating and maintaining the loading rack on their premises, in that the loading rack was so planned, located, and constructed that it was necessary for drivers of tank trucks to back out from the private roadway and then make a complete right hand turn on the coast highway. The driver and truck owner were joined on the theory of negligence and respondeat superior.

A jury was impaneled and sworn to try the facts, and the case proceeded to trial. At the close of plaintiff's case, the trial court granted a motion for a nonsuit as to the defendant, Continental. When the case was finally submitted to the jury a general verdict in favor of all of the defendants was rendered.

Thereafter, motion for a new trial was granted, except as to the defendant, Continental.

All of the parties, except Continental, have appealed.

The plaintiffs appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in favor of Continental; all of the other defendants, except Continental, appeal from the order of the superior court granting a new trial.

All of these appeals can be decided upon a determination of one of the two following interrogatories.

1. In maintaining the loading rack upon the premises of Bixby were Continental or Olympic or Bixby guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the injuries complained of by plaintiffs?

2. Did the trial court abuse its discretion in granting the motion for a new trial?

Firstly, with reference to the maintenance of the loading rack: It is conceded by all parties that there is no question of respondeat superior involved in the relationship of any of the parties to the action, except as between the truck owner and his driver.

Therefore, the only theory under which the defendants, Bixby, Continental, or Olympic, can be held responsible in damages, is that they agreed upon, consented to, and constructed and maintained, the loading rack upon the Bixby lands; and that in so doing, they knew the tanker would have to use the loading rack in such a way, and in such a way only, that it would have to back out upon the coast highway in the manner described.

There are many reasons why this contention is entirely untenable.

[1] Concededly, none of these defendants had any right to control or direct the movements of the tanker, nor did they exercise any control over its movements. In the absence of such essential proof, a motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. Withey v. Hammond Lumber Co., 140 Cal.App. 587, 35 P.2d 1080.

A review of the record and inspection of the exhibits showing the intersection where the collision occurred demonstrates that the manner in which the tanker was backed out into the coast highway was not the sole and only way in which this maneuver could have been accomplished. Here the terrain at some time in the past was subject to overflow by waters of the Pacific ocean, and the land was low and marshy. The coast highway and the private roadway were constructed upon an earthen fill, four or five feet above the level of the adjacent low lands. At the intersection itself there were no sharp angles; it was not like a street intersection in a city, with sharp angles at the street lines. It was so wide where the coast highway and the private roadway came together that the witnesses spoke of that point as a "Y". There was no necessity for any vehicle entering or leaving it to make a sharp turn. It was entirely feasible for the tanker to have backed out onto the coast highway so that at the conclusion of the backing it would have been facing Long Beach on its own right hand side of the highway.

It is difficult to visualize a traffic condition on the coast highway at this place when it would not be negligence for a tanker to make a right hand U turn all over the four traffic lanes of the coast highway, starting from the wrong side of the road, and going in a direction opposite that provided by our Vehicle Code. Sections 525 and 526, California Vehicle Code, St.1937, p. 619, St 1935, p. 181.

In the case now under consideration, if the tanker had been backed onto the highway so that it faced north on its own right hand side of the road, its tail lights would have been plainly visible to north-bound traffic; whereas, under the facts before us, the only thing visible to the oncoming automobile which ran into it were the dark-colored side lights of the truck.

[2] There is nothing in the record in this case which either directly or by inference establishes the fact that any of the defendants except the trucker and his employee had anything to do with the manner in which the tanker backed into the highway, or had any idea in advance that it had, as a matter of necessity, to be so backed. There is no obligation on the part of a landowner to anticipate that users of a private roadway leading to a state highway will violate the Motor Vehicle Act or be guilty of negligence. Schwerin v. H. C. Capwell Co., 140 Cal.App. 1, 34 P.2d 1050; Meloy v. City of Santa Monica, 124 Cal. App. 622, 12 P.2d 1072; Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 593, 11 P. 346, 58 Am.Rep. 568; Lucid v. Citizens Investment Co., 49 Cal. App. 257, 193 P. 161.

[3] Moreover, it is established by the record that neither the acts nor conduct of any of these three defendants was the proximate cause of the collision. The right-hand U turn of the tanker which we have described was entirely separate and distinct from any use or maintenance of the loading rack. This turn was made out in the highway, after the tanker was backed up.

[4] In order to recover damages for injuries, it must be made to appear that the alleged negligence which caused such injuries was the proximate cause of the injuries sustained. There can be no intervening independent act of another party. Hale v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 42 Cal.App. 55, 183 P. 280; Stackpole v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 181 Cal. 700, 186 P. 354; Klarquist v. Chamberlain & Proctor, 124 Cal.App. 398, 12 P.2d 664.

The trial court should be directed to render judgment in favor of said defendants, Bixby and Olympic, pursuant to the verdict of the jury.

[5, 6] There is another and additional reason why there is no liability as to Continental. It is true that the lessee of an oil lease has an interest or estate in real property. Callahan v. Martin, 3 Cal.2d 110, 43 P.2d 788, 101 A.L.R. 871. What this interest or estate may be is, of course, to be determined from the lease. A reading of the lease makes it evident that the lessor reserved such surface rights as would not interfere with the development and production of oil upon the demised premises. This being the case, it is apparent that the defendant, Continental, was not the owner of the surface where the loading rack was located, and for this and the other reasons we have pointed out, the motion for nonsuit was properly granted.

Continental had nothing to do with the construction or maintenance of the loading rack. This defendant's representative was present at a conference between representatives of the lessor, the refining company and the trucker, at which the location of the loading rack was determined upon. It was explained that Continental was represented at this conference so that the location of the loading rack would not interfere with its rights to drill and produce oil, and so that the loading rack would be located at a place to which the Bixby royalty oil could be conveniently conducted from Continental's storage tanks.

The judgment in favor of Continental should be affirmed.

[7] Secondly, with reference to the order granting the motion for a new trial: This motion was granted pursuant to a notice to move for a new trial, which notice recited all of the usual grounds upon which such motions are made. This court will presume that the order was based upon the grounds stated in the notice, and the order will be affirmed if any one of the grounds set forth is sufficient to sustain the motion. Tasker v. Cochrane, 94 Cal.App. 361, 271 P. 503; Gray v. Robinson, 33 Cal. App.2d 177, 91 P.2d 194; La Rue v. Barr, 208 Cal. 493, 282 P. 10; Phillips v. Powell, 210 Cal. 39, 290 P. 441.

[8] There must be a clear showing of abuse of discretion before a reviewing court will reverse an order granting a new trial; this must be manifest abuse of discretion by the trial court. Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 P. 1019; Kenezleber v. Wahl, 92 Cal. 202, 28 P. 225; Brannock v. Bromley, 30 Cal.App.2d 516, 86 P.2d 1062; Kohlhauer v. Bronstein, 9 Cal.App.2d 166, 48 P.2d 994; Heintz v. Cooper, 104 Cal. 668, 38 P. 511.

[9] As we have already indicated, it was negligence on the part of the truck driver to have backed this heavy tanker so that he had to turn it in the wrong direction upon a fast and heavily traveled through highway. The only way in which the defendant truckers could prevail was to convince the jury that the driver of the automobile was guilty of contributory negligence, and that this contributory negligence was imputed to the survivors of the decedent who bring this action.

When the collision occurred it was a bright, clear night, and the automobile, without slackening its speed, ran right into the tanker. The jury evidently found contributory negligence upon the part of the deceased driver of the automobile and imputed it to the other decedent and to the plaintiffs in this case; because the verdict was in favor of the defendant truckers.

In coming to this conclusion, evidence that the driver of the automobile was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and that those riding with him knew it, must have been given great weight by the jury.

[10] It is only when a person riding as a passenger in an automobile has actual knowledge or must have known of the intoxicated condition of the driver that the passenger may be charged with contributory negligence in riding with him. Lynn v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 112, 148 P. 927, L.R.A. 1915E, 588; Smith v. Schwartz, 14 Cal. App.2d 160, 57 P.2d 1386.

The plaintiff widow testified positively that there was no drinking by anyone in the party on the day of the accident. There was found a glass container in the automobile with some wine in the bottom of it. There was testimony that there was a broken pint bottle of whiskey found about the automobile after the accident. Witnesses testified that there was no odor of alcohol on the bodies of the decedents; other witnesses testified that there was. An employee of an undertaking establishment in which the bodies were embalmed testified that he smelled liquor on the bodies of both men, and in a purge emanating from their stomachs.

In support of the motion for a new trial plaintiffs presented the affidavit of the widow of the driver of the automobile (who was in the East and did not testify at the trial) to the same effect as the testimony of the other widow; and presented the affidavit of another employee of the undertaking parlor. If the facts recited in the latter affidavit are true and were testified to by the affiant, grave doubt would be cast upon the truth of the testimony of the undertaker's assistant who did testify.

[11] The use or abuse of liquor is many times an important and controlling factor in the decision of negligence cases involving the operation of motor vehicles. But testimony as to liquor in these cases if improperly admitted can be the means of arousing prejudice in the minds of jurors, which should have no place in a finding as to any fact. Trial judges should at all times be alive to the possibility of this sort of prejudice, and if convinced that such prejudice influenced in any manner the verdict of a jury, there should be no hesitation in making an order granting a new trial.

[12, 13] Whether this additional testimony would possibly have changed the verdict of the jury; whether their verdict may have been to any extent the result of prejudice; whether in the interest of due administration of justice and in the securing to the plaintiffs of their constitutional right of due process of law—these and many other questions are by our law left to the sound discretion of the trial judge who hears the evidence along with the jury. There is nothing in this case which would warrant this court in interfering with the exercise of this discretion by the trial judge in granting the motion for a new trial.

For the reasons heretofore given, the judgment in favor of the Continental Oil Company is affirmed; the order granting the motion for new trial as to Fred H. Bixby Company and Olympic Refining Company is reversed and the trial court is directed to render judgment in their favor, pursuant to the verdict of the jury; and the order granting the motion for a new trial as to the other defendants is affirmed.

Where Supreme Court denied a petition for hearing of original order by which District Court of Appeal refused to assume jurisdiction of an application for writ of mandate, District Court of Appeal was thereafter powerless to grant a rehearing of petition for order vacating the order denying the application for the writ.

Application for writ of mandate by Trabue Pittman Corporation, Ltd., against Board of Supervisors of the County of Los Angeles and others. On petition for rehearing of petition for order vacating order of October 8, 1941 and supplement to petition for rehearing.

Petition denied.

Holbrook & Tarr and Bernard G. Hiss, all of Los Angeles, Louis Ferrari, Edmund Nelson, and G. D. Schilling, all of San Francisco, and Claude I. Parker, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

J. H. O'Connor, Co. Counsel, S. V. O. Pritchard, Asst. Co. Counsel, and A. Curtis Smith, Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

In considering the "Petition for Rehearing of Petition for Order Vacating Order of October 8, 1941 * * *," and the document entitled "Supplement to Petition for Rehearing," filed January 28, 1942, in the above matter, this court refuses to take jurisdiction of the cause, as it did in the matter of the original application for a writ of mandate made to this court on October 1, 1941.

This court is powerless at this time to grant a rehearing by reason of the fact that the Supreme Court has denied a petition for a hearing of the original order made herein on October 8, 1941, at which time this court refused to assume jurisdiction of the matter.

No written opinion is necessary in a matter such as this, where the court refuses to assume jurisdiction, and for that reason no opinion has been filed in the proceeding until this memorandum opinion was written, and this is being written only because of the fact that the attorneys for petitioners have stated that the Superior Court will not consider a petition herein made by them because of its belief that the refusal by this court to take jurisdiction is a decision that there is no merit in any part of the various petitions herein. This court refused to issue the original writ only because it believed that the application originally made to it should have been made to the Superior Court, if it was at all proper to make it anywhere.

SOMMERFIELD v. MIRATTI et al.

Civ. 13348.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

Jan. 30, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 30, 1942.

1. Innkeepers ⇐14¼

Where for a period of about twelve years an uncarpeted tile stairway in hotel had been waxed weekly by hotel employees, whether hotel and manager had full and complete knowledge of the condition of the stairway at the time of the fall of business invitee was for the jury.

2. Innkeepers ⇐14¼

In action for injuries received by the business invitee of a hotel when, notwithstanding her use of the handrail, she slipped on a waxed uncarpeted tile stairway, mere evidence that invitee at some unknown time previous to her fall knew that the steps were slippery did not require holding as a matter of law that invitee had such full knowledge of the condition of the stairs as to make her use of them contributory negligence.

3. Innkeepers ⇐14¼

That stairways in public places such as hotels are frequently smooth and somewhat slippery does not mean that the public are required to use them at their own risk, regardless of the care exercised by them in such use or the apparent possibility of using them safely by the use of proper care.

4. Innkeepers ⇐14¼

In action by business invitee of a hotel for injuries received when she slipped on waxed, uncarpeted, tile stairway, use of the stairs in view of her knowledge in the past of the slippery condition did not constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law, since the invitee had the right to assume that hotel in exercise of ordinary care for the safety of its invitees would discover and remove the danger.

5. Appeal and error ⇐930(4)

In action by business invitee of a hotel for injuries received when she slipped on waxed, uncarpeted, tile stairway, on question of invitee's contributory negligence, the appellate court in support of a verdict for the invitee would presume that from the conflicting testimony the jury found that invitee made such inspection as a reasonably prudent person would make under the circumstances, used ordinary care in attempting to use the stairs with the aid of the handrail and with rough crepe rubber soles on her shoes, and that the fact that the stairway was more slippery than usual was unknown to invitee.

6. Innkeepers ⇐14¼

If to a person of ordinary prudence it appears that in spite of the danger of falling while using a passageway provided for use of hotel invitees he could safely use the passageway by taking available precautions and he exercised ordinary care in using the passageway, he is not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in his action against the hotel for injury received in a fall.

7. Innkeepers ⇐14¼

In action by business invitee of a hotel for injuries received when she slipped on waxed, uncarpeted, tile stairway where invitee had no reason to believe that stairs presented any danger which she could not avoid by using them with ordinary care, the fact that invitee chose to use the stairway instead of an elevator was not negligence of invitee.

SHAW, Justice pro tem.

The defendants Frank Miratti, Inc., a corporation, and Frank Miratti, Jr., appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. At all times material here, the defendant corporation maintained and operated a hotel and the other defendant named was its president and general manager and resided in the hotel. In this hotel there was a stairway leading up from the main lobby floor to a mezzanine floor upon which was situated a ladies' rest room. The plaintiff, who was a business invitee of the defendants, ascended this stairway went to the rest room, and on her return started down the stairs to the lobby. On the second step her feet slipped out from under her and she fell, sliding and bumping, to the bottom of the stairs, and thus received personal injuries for which she sued and recovered in this action. In her complaint she alleged that the defendants negligently caused the steps to be slippery and unsafe for use by waxing and polishing them. In addition to some denials the defendants alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in her use of the stairs.

On this appeal the defendants do not deny the sufficiency of the evidence to show negligence on their part, so that matter need not be discussed. They make but two contentions: first, that plaintiff knew the condition of the stairway before and when she used it and for that reason she assumed the risk and was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in using it; and second, that because of this contributory negligence the court should have directed a verdict for defendants. Our conclusion that the first contention cannot be sustained eliminates the second from consideration.

In support of their contention defendants cite and rely chiefly upon Mautino v. Sutter Hospital Ass'n, 1931, 211 Cal. 556, 296 P. 76, where the court held that a nurse using a hospital floor which she knew to be waxed and slippery was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The nurse was not an employee, but an invitee, of the hospital, and, in stating the rule regarding the liability of the owner or occupant of land or buildings to an invitee, the court there used this language, upon which defendants rely, taken from another authority: "An owner or occupant of land who by invitation, express or implied, induces or leads others to go upon premises for any lawful purpose is liable for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, if such condition was known to him and not to them. * * * The true ground of liability is the proprietor's superior knowledge of the perilous instrumentality and the danger therefrom to persons going upon the property. * * * There is no liability for injuries from dangers that are obvious, or as well known to the person injured as to the owner or occupant." 211 Cal. 560, 561, 296 P. 77. It appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff in that case that she had been using the floor on which she fell for a day and part of the next day immediately prior to her fall, that during all that time she had noticed that the floor was so slippery that she could not keep her feet, and that she had complained of this condition to the head nurse. After stating this testimony, the court said, regarding the contributory negligence of plaintiff there: "It is clear from the plaintiff's testimony that she had full knowledge of the condition of the floor * * *. It does not appear that the defendant's knowledge thereof was superior to that of the plaintiff. If it was negligence for the defendant to maintain the floor in the condition described by the plaintiff, there appears to be no escape from the conclusion that it was negligence for the plaintiff, with full knowledge of such condition, to continue in the use thereof." 211 Cal. 560, 296 P. 77. (Emphasis ours.)

[1-3] The evidence in the present case does not require us to hold, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff had full knowledge of the condition of the stairs at the time she fell, or that defendants' knowledge thereof was not superior to hers. The steps were made of red composition tile and had no carpet or other covering upon them. The whole surface was waxed and a new application of wax was made once a week. This was done by an employee of the corporate defendant, upon the order and under the supervision of the other appealing defendant, and this course of action had continued for a period of some 12 years immediately preceding the accident. The jury could properly infer from these facts that both appealing defendants had full and complete knowledge of the condition of the stairway at the time in question.

The plaintiff was familiar with the hotel and had used the steps many times during a period of four or five years before the date of the accident, and on these occasions she had always used the handrail and kept her eyes on the steps, but had never slipped on them. She had also then observed the condition of the steps; and on these occasions, as she testified "I knew the steps were slippery and that is why I used the handrail.

Q. And you knew that at all the time previously, is that true? A. That is right."

Nowhere does it appear how long before the accident her last previous use of the stairs and observation of this condition occurred. A considerable period of time may have intervened. The plaintiff had heard that three or four other people had also slipped on the steps. This she heard before her own fall, but how long before, or when these persons had fallen, is not shown. There is nothing in all this to compel a finding that plaintiff knew the stairs had, in past times, been so slippery that she could not, even by taking proper precautions, safely use them. Stairways in public places are quite frequently smooth and somewhat slippery, especially where they have no covering upon the treads, but the public are not for that reason required to use them at their own risk, regardless of the care exercised by them in such use, or the apparent possibility of using them safely by the use of proper care.

[4] But even if plaintiff had observed or been informed that on previous occasions the stairs were so slippery as to be unsafe for use, such knowledge on her part would not require her to expect that the situation would remain the same forever. She might properly assume that defendants, who were charged with the duty of exercising ordinary care for the safety of those whom they invited there (Mautino v. Sutter Hospital Ass'n, supra; Tuttle v. Crawford, 1936, 8 Cal.2d 126, 130, 63 P.2d 1128; Dingman v. A. F. Mattock Co., 1940, 15 Cal.2d 622, 624, 104 P.2d 26), would in due time discover and remove any danger which she saw at any particular time (see De Verdi v. Weiss, 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 439, 60 P.2d 879), especially a danger of this kind, which was not due to the plan or construction of the building, not easily changed, but merely to the manner of performing the periodical task of cleaning and caring for the building. In other words, knowledge of a condition existing at some unknown time in the past is not that "full knowledge" of a present condition which the plaintiff in Mautino v. Sutter Hospital Ass'n, supra, had.

Regarding her knowledge of the conditions at the time of the accident and her conduct then, plaintiff testified that she went up the stairs, without slipping, and that she put her hand on the handrail as she started down, and was looking down at her feet. She was wearing at this time shoes with new crepe rubber soles, having a rough surface. To a question, "Did you realize at that time when you were going up—anything when you went up the steps to indicate that they were slippery?" she replied, "Only that they were very shiny and glossy and red." She further testified:

"Q. Did your foot fly off of the step? A. Yes, it did * * *

"Q. Did you notice whether that was any more slippery, the condition of that step was any more slippery than any other steps that you had noticed on previous occasions, of these stairs? A. I did when my foot went out from under me.

"Q. And not before? A. No, sir."

She also testified:

"Q. Did you notice that the stairs were slippery when you went up there? A. I did not notice that they were slippery when I went up. I knew that they were slippery.

"Q. You knew that they were slippery? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. From past going up and down those stairs you knew that they were slippery, didn't you? A. Well, yes."

[5, 6] From all this testimony it was possible for the jury to find and in support of the verdict we must presume they did find that, while plaintiff knew these stairs had been slippery in the past, the past condition was such that she could safely use them by putting her hands on the handrail, that on this occasion the stairs were more slippery than they had previously been but plaintiff did not notice this fact and it was not obvious to her on such inspection as a reasonably prudent person would make under the circumstances, and that she used ordinary care in attempting to use the stairs with the aid of the handrail and with rough crepe rubber soles on her shoes. Possibly the evidence would have supported contrary findings on some or all of these matters, but we cannot interfere with the jury's conclusions, based, as they are, on sufficient evidence. The mere fact that there is some danger of falling in using a passageway provided for the use of an invitee does not in every case convict him of contributory negligence for using it with knowledge of the condition. The question is whether he used ordinary care in so doing, and if to a man of ordinary prudence it would appear that in spite of the danger he can by taking available precautions safely use the passageway, he is not negligent in using it with those precautions. See Christy v. Ulrich, 1931, 113 Cal.App. 338, 342, 298 P. 135; Roseberry v. Edward F. Niehaus & Co., 1913, 166 Cal. 481, 137 P. 232; Tuttle v. Crawford, supra.

[7] Defendants call attention to the fact that there was an elevator, of the passenger operated variety, which the plaintiff could have used in going from the mezzanine floor to the lobby and contends that since by so doing she could have avoided the danger of falling on the steps, the choice of the dangerous route instead of a safe one was itself negligence. A sufficient answer to this argument is that upon the finding (which we must presume the jury made) that the plaintiff had no reason to believe the stairs presented any danger which she could not avoid by using them as she did, the rule for which defendants contend is not applicable.

The judgment is affirmed.

STEPHENS, Justice, pro tem.

Appeal was taken herein from a judgment in favor of defendants.

Plaintiff was the daughter of Mabel Pearl Abrams, who was deceased at the time of bringing the action, and defendant Frank Rouse was administrator of her estate, being sued in his representative capacity only; defendant Emanuel Abrams was the surviving husband of said decedent. Plaintiff was the daughter of decedent by a prior marriage.

It is alleged that some six or seven months prior to her death decedent executed a deed conveying certain real property to defendant Abrams and herself as joint tenants; that at the time of the execution of said deed "the said Mabel Pearl Abrams was mentally incompetent to sign or execute said instrument, by reason of the fact that she was then, and had been for many months prior thereto, in an intoxicated, inebriated and debilitated state and condition, by reason of her continual consumption of excessive amounts of alcoholic liquors, and that the said defendant Emanuel Abrams knew of her condition at said times and procured her to sign or execute said conveyance while she was in such state of intoxication, inebriety and mental incompetency; and that by reason of said intoxication, inebriety and mental incompetency the said Mabel Pearl Abrams could not and did not know or understand that she had signed or executed said deed"; that by reason of the said "purported joint tenancy deed" defendant Abrams claims title to said real property, is in possession thereof and refused to turn over said real property or the rents collected therefrom to defendant Rouse, as administrator; that said Rouse, as administrator, has refused to bring any action on behalf of the estate or to join plaintiff therein, and has demanded that he be made a party defendant herein; and that for these reasons he is made a defendant in his representative capacity as administrator. A second cause of action is set forth, attacking a claimed gift of personal property upon exactly the same grounds.

[1] In her specifications of error appellant sets forth nine findings of fact and nine conclusions of law, but makes no contention that the findings are not supported by substantial evidence. Portions of the testimony are quoted and authorities cited in support of the apparent contention that the trial court did not give sufficient weight to the evidence presented by her, or required too high a degree of proof on her part. It is of course a thoroughly established rule in this state that where, upon a question of fact, the testimony in the court below involves a substantial conflict, the action of the trial court will not be disturbed. Bright v. Zabler, 43 Cal.App.2d 706, 111 P.2d 387; 10 Cal.Jur. 1172, and cases there cited.

[2] The burden was upon appellant to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that "said Mabel Pearl Abrams was mentally incompetent to sign or execute said instrument" at the time of signing it. There was no direct evidence that upon that day she was intoxicated or that she had even taken one drink. The only testimony of anyone who had seen her on that day was that of the notary public, a disinterested witness, who testified that she was not intoxicated, that she was perfectly normal and that he did not observe any smell of liquor on her breath, and defendant Abrams, who corroborated this testimony. No evidence was presented which could support a finding that defendant Abrams procured deceased to sign the deed while intoxicated.

The case was tried solely on the theory that deceased had mentally deteriorated to the point where she was incapable of knowing what she was doing. Appellant relies upon the testimony of several witnesses who testified to habitual and excessive drinking by decedent over a period of many months, both prior to the signing and subsequently, and up to the date of her death, resulting in her general mental deterioration. Two physicians who had treated her at various times testified to the effect upon her of the excessive use of liquor when they had seen her (though not at or immediately near the date of signing); but upon cross-examination one of them said: "I can't go so far as to say she was mentally completely deranged, no. She was able to answer questions. She was able to respond to various things, but her whole mental attitude was uncooperative and appeared in an intoxicated state." The other physician, in answer to a request for his opinion as to how far her mind was normal, said: "Well, her mind was very keen. It was surprising to me * * *. The mental condition, however, at least at the time that I spoke to her, was very clear." Again, in answer to the question, "In your opinion was she at that time sane or insane?" he replied: "Absolutely sane." This was about two months after the signing.

[3, 4] At least two witnesses (in addition to defendant Abrams) were produced by defendants who testified strongly that decedent's mind was normal and even unusually keen in business matters. It must be borne in mind that the presumption is always that a person is sane. Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45, and cases there cited.

It therefore clearly appears that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence, and consequently the action of the trial court will not be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Criminal law ⇐997

A motion by a defendant to vacate a judgment of conviction upon which he was also found to be an habitual criminal was in its legal effect a petition for a "writ of error coram nobis".

2. Criminal law ⇐997

Where information charged defendant with forgery and with prior conviction of felonies in other states, and defendant knew that such prior offenses did not amount to felonies under California law, upon defendant's conviction under a plea of guilty to the information, and a finding that by reason of the prior convictions he was an habitual criminal, defendant's failure to avail himself of statutory remedies which would have given relief precluded issuance of a writ of error coram nobis to vacate conviction. Pen.Code, § 644.

3. Criminal law ⇐997

Where defendant was convicted upon his plea of guilty to an information charging him with forgery and with prior convictions of felonies in other states and he was found to be an habitual criminal, a delay of five years by defendant in filing motion to vacate judgment, alleging that the prior offenses did not amount to felonies under California law, was unreasonable and precluded the issuance of a writ of error coram nobis. Pen.Code, § 644.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward R. Brand, Judge.

Joseph Harincar entered a plea of guilty to an information charging forgery and prior conviction of felonies in other states, and judgment of conviction was entered upon the plea. From an order denying his motion to vacate the judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Joseph Harincar, in pro. per.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and R. S. McLaughlin, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Defendant has appealed from an order of the trial court denying his motion to vacate the judgment of conviction.

Defendant was charged by information with the crime of forgery. It was also charged that he had suffered three prior convictions in the states of Iowa and Minnesota, and that in the case of each prior conviction he had served a term of imprisonment therefor in the state prison. He pleaded not guilty and denied the prior convictions, but thereafter withdrew this plea and entered a plea of guilty and also admitted the prior convictions. The court found him to be an habitual criminal and sentenced him accordingly. The judgment of conviction was entered October 1, 1936, and no appeal was taken therefrom.

A motion was filed by defendant on September 22, 1941, to vacate the judgment entered in 1936, certified copies of the prior convictions being filed with the motion. Defendant claims that if the prior crimes had been committed in California only one of them would have come within the classification of crimes enumerated in section 644 of the Penal Code. The trial court was therefore asked to "relieve the defendant of that portion of the judgment declaring the defendant to be an habitual criminal."

[1] Although defendant's motion is designated a motion to vacate the judgment, it is in legal effect under the practice of this state a petition for a writ of error coram nobis. In People v. Vernon, 9 Cal. App.2d 138, 49 P.2d 326, 328, it is held that the writ of error coram nobis "is nothing more nor less than a motion to vacate a judgment," and that the remedy provided by the writ could be designated by "the more simple and appropriate name of a motion to vacate the judgment."

[2] The issue now presented by defendant was squarely before the court in People v. Moore, 9 Cal.App.2d 251, 49 P.2d 615, 617, where the defendant petitioned the court in which he had been convicted for the issuance of a writ of error coram nobis. Moore had admitted four prior convictions and was sentenced as an habitual criminal. He appealed and the judgment was affirmed. In his petition for the writ thereafter filed he claimed that three of the four prior convictions with which he had been charged were not felonies in California, and that he was ignorant of the legal effect of these prior convictions at the time he was sentenced in this state. The court held that even if it be conceded that three of the four prior convictions were not felonies in California, nevertheless the writ of error coram nobis did not furnish a remedy under the circumstances, and that since defendant had omitted to avail himself of the remedies afforded by statute and the judgment had become final, "there would be no further legal recourse by any form of judicial review." The decision in the Moore case was cited with approval in People v. Lumbley, 8 Cal.2d 752, 760, 68 P.2d 354.

The facts in the Moore case were more favorable to the party seeking the writ than are the facts shown by the record now before us, for it appears that petitioner at the time he was sentenced was aware of the true facts as to his prior convictions and as to their legal effect on a conviction in California. His counsel then stated that the prior convictions "were nothing but petty larcenies under our laws at the present time."

[3] An additional reason for affirming the order may be found in the unreasonable delay on the part of defendant in filing his motion. People v. Lumbley, supra.

The order is affirmed.

P. Wood and said Table Linen Supply Co., and that, by reason thereof, he would disrupt and destroy the business and property of the said Mrs. E. P. Wood and said Table Linen Supply Co., and thereby prevent the rendering of service to customers thereof, and thereby destroy the value of the plant, business and property of said Mrs. E. P. Wood and said Table Linen Supply Co., all of which the said defendant, Louis Bolanos, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and by wrongful use of force and fear, threaten unless the said Mrs. E. P. Wood paid over to him, the said defendant, the sum of Two Thousand Dollars ($2000) for his own personal use and benefit;

"That said defendant, Louis Bolanos, at the time when he made the said threats * * * did not intend to call or cause the calling of any strike, legal or otherwise, or to * * * organize in a labor union * * * all or any of said employees, or to perform or promote any service or activity on behalf of said employees or on behalf of the labor union for which he * * * was then an organizer and business agent * * * or any of them, but, on the contrary, said defendant did intend to and did willfully, unlawfully, corruptly and feloniously, then and there threaten that he * * * would then and thereafter do said unlawful injury to the property of the said Mrs. E. P. Wood and said Table Linen Supply Co. * * * for the purpose of obtaining and extorting money and property from the said Mrs. E. P. Wood by means of fear induced by said wrongful threats as aforesaid, and for the personal use and benefit of him, the said defendant."

The demurrer to said amended indictment was made upon the following grounds:

"I. That said amended indictment does not substantially conform to the requirements of Sections 950, 951, 952 of the Penal Code * * * in that:

"A. Said amended indictment does not contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language in such manner as to enable this defendant, who is a person of common understanding, to know what is intended thereby.

"B. That said amended indictment purports to charge one offense, to-wit, that of attempted extortion, a felony. That said amended indictment in attempting to charge said above described offense does not do so in the words of the enactment describing the offense or declaring the matter to be a public offense, and it does not do so in any words sufficient to give the accused notice of the offense of which he is accused.

"II. That said amended indictment is uncertain, indefinite and ambiguous. * * *

"III. That the facts stated in said amended indictment do not constitute a public offense in that it is not made to appear by the charging part (thereof) by any allegation whatsoever, that the defendant threatened to do any unlawful injury to the person or property of said Mrs. E. P. Wood or the Table Linen Supply Company, or any relative of said Mrs. E. P. Wood or member of her family."

Section 518 of the Penal Code defines extortion as "the obtaining of property from another, with his consent, or the obtaining of an official act of a public officer, induced by a wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right."

Section 519 provides as follows: "Threats which may constitute extortion. Fear, such as will constitute extortion, may be induced by a threat, either: 1. To do an unlawful injury to the person or property of the individual threatened or of a third person * * *."

[1] Neither the rights of workmen to strike, nor to negotiate with employers for the purpose of averting a strike are involved in this prosecution. It is conceded by appellant, quoting from the opinion in McKay v. Retail Automobile Salesmen's Local Union No. 1067, 16 Cal.2d 311, 319, 106 P.2d 373, 378, that, "under the law as it has developed in recent years, an intentional interference with the advantageous economic relations of others by the members of labor organizations is not tortious unless violence is used or the object sought to be accomplished has no reasonable relevance to labor conditions." (Italics added.)

[2] It is clearly set forth in the amended indictment that respondent Bolanos attempted to commit extortion by threatening to do an unlawful injury to the property of Mrs. E. P. Wood and the Table Linen Supply Company, it being specifically alleged that in order to accomplish such unlawful injury he would "cause and promote unrest, discord, dissatisfaction, strife, trouble, and labor strikes among the employees of said Mrs. E. P. Wood and said Table Linen Supply Company, and that, by reason thereof, he would disrupt and destroy the business and property of the said Mrs. E. P. Wood and the said Table Linen Supply Company, and thereby prevent the rendering of service to customers thereof, and thereby destroy the value of the plant, business and property," unless he received from Mrs. Wood the sum of $2,000 "for his own personal use and benefit."

Manifestly, it is an unlawful injury to inflict damage upon property in the manner alleged in the amended indictment.

"It was not necessary for the prosecution to set forth in the indictment the express manner in which * * * damage to property was to be brought about by defendants. It was held in People v. Sanders, 188 Cal. 744, 749, 207 P. 380, 382, that a distinction is to be drawn between indictments which directly charge a defendant with a crime and those indictments which charge extortion through threats. In that case the defendant was charged with extortion by threatening to accuse the complainant of a crime, and in ruling that the exact crime threatened need not be set forth in the indictment the court said: 'In the latter class of cases no such technical accusation is required as in the former for several obvious reasons, some of which are that the indictment or information cannot go beyond the terms of the threatened accusations, and the accusations need only be such as to put the intended victim of the extortion in fear of being accused of some crime. The more vague and general the terms of the accusation, the better it would subserve the purpose of the accuser in magnifying the fears of his victim, and the better also it would serve to protect him in the event of the failure to accomplish his extortion, and of a prosecution for his attempted crime.' In People v. Lavine, 115 Cal.App. 289, 292, 1 P.2d 496, 497 [in which certiorari was denied by the Supreme Court of the United States, 286 U.S. 528, 52 S.Ct. 500, 76 L.Ed. 1270], the defendant was charged in the indictment with the crime of extortion in that he obtained the sum of $75,000 by threatening 'to expose certain secrets' concerning four persons named in the indictment. The indictment was held sufficient." People v. Peppercorn, 34 Cal. App.2d 603, 606, 94 P.2d 80, 81.

Respondent Bolanos places reliance upon the case of People v. Schmitz, 7 Cal.App. 330, 94 P. 407, 419, 15 L.R.A.,N.S., 717. That case is easily distinguishable from the one here under consideration. In the Schmitz case, although the indictment used the words "unlawful injury," facts were set forth showing that the threatened injury was not in fact unlawful. In the instant case, the facts alleged in the amended indictment are sufficient to show the threatened injuries to have been unlawful.

An analysis of the facts alleged in the amended indictment clearly indicates that it substantially conforms to the requirements of sections 950, 951 and 952 of the Penal Code; that the facts so alleged constitute a public offense, and that said indictment is not vulnerable to the charge that it is uncertain, indefinite and ambiguous.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed and the trial court is directed to overrule the demurrer.

SPENCE, Justice.

Petitioner seeks his release on habeas corpus.

On December 20, 1941, petitioner was arrested by the police department of the city of Richmond without the service of a warrant of arrest. On December 23, 1941, a complaint was filed in the justice's court charging that petitioner had committed the crime of murder in the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana. A warrant of arrest was thereupon issued. It appears that petitioner was then arrested under said warrant and that he was brought before the justice's court on said December 23, 1941. No examination was had but a commitment was signed by the justice committing petitioner "until he can be tried or examined."

Petitioner filed his petition herein on January 2, 1942. The writ was issued and the return was thereafter filed on January 12, 1942. The district attorney relied upon section 1551 et seq. of the Penal Code in justification of the detention of the petitioner.

Petitioner contends that he is entitled to his release upon two grounds: first, that the complaint was insufficient; and second, that he has not been given an examination and that his examination has been delayed more than six days without his consent. It appears unnecessary to discuss the first ground as we believe that petitioner is entitled to his release upon the second ground.

Section 1551.2 of the Penal Code provides that, "Proceedings for the commitment of a person charged under sections 1551 and 1551.1 of this code shall be similar to those provided in this code for the commitment of a person charged with a public offense in this State * * *." Section 861 of the Penal Code provides, "The examination must be completed at one session, unless the magistrate, for good cause shown by affidavit, postpone it. The postponement cannot be for more than two days at each time, nor more than six days in all, unless by consent or on motion of the defendant."

In Ex Parte Rosenblat, 51 Cal. 285, at page 287, the court said: "We are inclined to the belief that a person thus arrested, with a view to his being surrendered on requisition expected to arrive, is entitled to his discharge if his examination is not brought on before the magistrate within six days." While the quoted portion of the opinion in the cited case was dicta, we see no escape from the conclusions stated therein under the code sections above mentioned.

The petitioner is discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Warren Steel, Judge.

Action by Annie S. Wright against the Redwood Theatres, Incorporated, and others, to recover damages arising out of personal injuries sustained when the plaintiff slipped while walking on a sidewalk in the vicinity of a theater operated by one of the defendants. Judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Hearing denied; HOUSER and CARTER, JJ., dissenting.

Carlin & Fuidge, of Marysville, for appellant.

Butler, Van Dyke & Harris, of Sacramento, for respondents.

TUTTLE, Justice.

This action was brought to recover damages arising out of personal injuries. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the supplemental complaint without leave to amend. From a judgment for defendants, this appeal is now prosecuted.

On April 18, 1939, plaintiff was walking on a sidewalk in the city of Marysville, in the vicinity of the State Theatre, and while so walking, plaintiff slipped upon some slippery substance and was injured.

On November 8, 1939, plaintiff filed an action against Redwood Theatres, Inc., a corporation, and Harry Brown. The complaint alleged substantially as follows: "That defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., was a Nevada corporation doing business in California, and that through its agents and employees it was operating the State Theatre in Marysville; that defendant Harry Brown was the manager of that theatre; that plaintiff had received injuries on the 18th day of April, 1939, while walking on the sidewalk in the vicinity of that theatre; that the two named defendants had negligently caused a slippery substance to be placed on the sidewalk along which plaintiff was walking and in front of the theatre, upon which substance plaintiff slipped, fell, and was injured."

To this complaint defendants filed an answer, denying all the foregoing allegations, but admitting the corporate capacity of defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., and that defendant Brown was the manager of State Theatre.

The case came on for trial. Witnesses were sworn, exhibits were introduced, and plaintiff rested; whereupon, the defendants moved for a nonsuit as to each of them. Thereupon, the case was reopened, one witness was recalled and testified further on the part of plaintiff. Thereupon, counsel for plaintiff moved the court for permission to amend her complaint "to conform with the proof and to file an amended and supplemental complaint, by substituting the National Theatres Syndicate of California as a party defendant, in the place and stead of Redwood Theatres, Inc." Thereupon, the minutes show that the trial court granted a nonsuit as to both defendants, and also granted the motion of plaintiff to file an amended and supplemental complaint, bringing in, for the first time, the respondent herein, as party defendant.

The demurrer to the supplemental complaint set up, as a bar, section 340, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which limits the time for commencing such an action to one year after the injury, which in this instance, and as alleged in said complaint, occurred on April 18, 1939.

The supplemental complaint was filed August 23, 1940. It set forth facts which, appellant contends, now estop defendants from availing themselves of the statute of limitations. Those allegations are as follows:

"That subsequent to the 18th day of April, 1939, and prior to the commencement of the herein action, plaintiff caused negotiations to be commenced looking toward the settlement of her injuries and damages with certain persons acting for and in behalf of, and under the authorization of said defendant corporations; that said persons allowed counsel for plaintiff to believe that defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., was not only the owner, but the operator of said theatre as well, when in truth and in fact, it was well known to said person and to said defendant corporations at said time and at all times herein mentioned, and unknown to plaintiff or her counsel, that while defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., or its assignee, Marysville Theatres, Inc., a corporation, was the owner of the real property and the improvements thereon constituting said theatre, that defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California was the lessee and operator of the business therein conducted.

"That George M. Mann is the president of defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., and the president of defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California, a corporation; that L. S. Hamm is the secretary of defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., a corporation, and of defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California, a corporation; that M. C. Sousa is the treasurer of defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., and of defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California, a corporation; that said defendant corporation and each thereof maintain a joint office located in the same building with the same telephone number in the City of San Francisco; that the major portion of the stock of said defendant corporations and each of them is owned by said George M. Mann; that service of original summons and complaint herein was made on the aforesaid M. C. Sousa who, as aforesaid, is an officer of both said defendant corporations; that at all times during the pendency of the action on the original complaint herein, defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California and the officers thereof well knew of the existence of said action, of the cause of action therein contained, and of the error in which it and they had allowed plaintiff to fall.

"That upon issue being joined on the original complaint the cause was duly noticed to be set on February 15, 1940, and would have been tried prior to April 18, 1940, but upon the request of counsel for defendant, and to suit his convenience, and for no other reason, the matter was set for trial and trial was had on the 20th day of May, 1940, at which time, and no sooner, did plaintiff discover that the lessee and operator of said building and the entity primarily liable herein is the defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California.

"That by reason of the premises defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California induced plaintiff to rely, and intended that plaintiff should rely, and she did rely on the apparent fact that defendant Redwood Theatres, Inc., was the operator of said business; that all the foregoing occurred and transpired prior to the 17th day of April, 1940; that plaintiff will suffer damage by reason of said conduct on the part of said defendant National Theatres Syndicate of California if said defendant be allowed to plead the bar of the Statute of Limitations, which in fair dealing and good conscience it should not be allowed so to do."

[1] It is the rule that: "If one by fraudulent acts or misrepresentations induces another to delay bringing suit upon his cause of action until after the expiration of the statutory period, he is estopped to take advantage of the defense that the cause of action is barred. To have this effect it must appear that the misrepresentation was one of fact, unless there exists a confidential relationship between the parties, that the misrepresentation was relied on, and that diligence to ascertain the truth was used." 16 Cal.Jur., pp. 576-577, sec. 172.

In Robbins v. Law, 48 Cal.App. 555-562, 192 P. 118, 121, it is said: "Where no confidential relation exists, it is the duty of one setting up the estoppel to show, not only reliance upon the fraudulent misrepresentation, but also diligence in using the means at command to ascertain the truth, or by inquiry. In this connection it must appear that in relying upon it he acted as a reasonably prudent person would act, and was not guilty of negligence or carelessness. Thus it is held in Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 P. 670, that where the statute of limitations runs from the date of the discovery of the fraud the statute will commence to run from the date that the fraud should have been discovered by a man of ordinary prudence under the circumstances and with the means of knowledge readily available to him. See, also, 25 Cyc. 1216, 1213, and cases cited; 16 Cyc. 738, and cases cited."

[2] In the case before us defendants are claimed to be estopped, not by any misrepresentations they may have made, but by their failure to disclose the facts. In other words, estoppel is based upon their silence, and the following principle of law is therefore involved: "An estoppel may arise also from silence as well as from words or conduct. But this is only where there is a duty to speak, and where the party upon whom such duty rests has an opportunity to speak, and, knowing that the circumstances require him to speak, remains silent. The ground upon which the estoppel in such case rests is that the conduct of the party constitutes an implied representation of the truth of the state of facts in question. And as in other cases, there must be something wilful or culpable in the silence, which allows another to place himself in an unfavorable position on the faith or understanding of a fact which the person remaining silent can contradict; and the circumstances attending the entire transaction must be such as to make it reasonably probable that the person seeking to set up the estoppel has suffered prejudice by the other's unreasonable acquiescence." 10 Cal. Jur., sec. 16, pp. 631, 632.

In Verdugo Canon Water Co. v. Verdugo, 152 Cal. 655-674, 93 P. 1021, 1029, it is said: "A mere passive acquiescence where one is under no duty to speak does not raise an estoppel."

As stated in the case of Newhall v. Hatch, 134 Cal. 269-274, 66 P. 266, 268, 55 L.R.A. 673: "Mere silence on the part of a party will not create an estoppel unless he was under some obligation to speak, and a party invoking such estoppel must show that it was the duty of the other to speak, and that he has not only been induced to act by reason of such silence, but that the other had reasonable cause to believe that he would so act."

[3] Turning to the facts alleged, we do not believe them sufficient to establish an estoppel. Plaintiff sued the Redwood Theatre, alleging that it negligently caused a slippery substance to be placed upon the sidewalk in front of the State Theatre. After the one year statute of limitations had run, the trial was had. It was then disclosed that said theatre was operated by National Theatres, and plaintiff concluded that she had commenced an action against the wrong party. To excuse her mistake, she states that defendants "allowed" her to believe that Redwood Theatres operated the theatre. It is not charged that plaintiff was led to believe such fact by any positive act of defendants, nor is it alleged that the question was ever put to either defendants as to which corporation was operating the theatre. The defendants were under no duty to volunteer the information. "It is a general principle that if the means of knowledge be at hand, and equally available to both parties, and the subject-matter be open to inspection of both alike, and there be no fiduciary or confidential relation, and no warranty of the facts, the injured party must show that he has availed himself of the means of information existing at the time of the transaction before he will be heard to say that he was deceived by the misrepresentations of the other party. The fraud must have been practiced under such circumstances as to leave a reasonable inference that the injured party was deceived, and if the circumstances attending the transaction are such as to put a reasonable person upon inquiry, there can be no presumption of deceit." Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 17-20-21, 21 P. 534, 535, 12 Am.St. Rep. 126.

Here, the means of knowledge open to plaintiff was open at all times. A mere inquiry would suffice. The case of Phillips v. Aluminum Company of America, 256 Pa. 205, 100 A. 750, 751, while not involving estoppel, has the following to say concerning the duty to speak in a situation where the suit has been brought against the wrong party: "Defendant might have volunteered the statement that the wrong party had been sued, and for that matter it might have disclaimed all responsibility in connection therewith. But, as this was prior to the practice act of May 14, 1915 (P.L. 483), we cannot say that defendant was under any legal duty to give such notice."

[4] Furthermore, the answer of defendants Redwood Theatres and Brown, filed January 31, 1940, which was several months prior to the running of the statute, denied that Redwood Theatres operated the State Theatre. Appellant questions the foregoing statement, claiming that the denial is a negative pregnant. We believe the denial was plain enough to put the fact in issue. This should have put plaintiff upon inquiry regarding the real situation.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Automobiles ⇐150, 245(39)

Generally, failure of automobile driver to look at all in order to discover an object in the road in front of him constitutes negligence as a matter of law; but, where driver testifies that she did in fact look, whether she looked with proper care becomes a question for the determination of the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dudley S. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Vernon Leader against Eleanor Estelle Atkinson and others for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, who was a police officer, when struck by defendants' automobile. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed.

Hearing denied; CARTER, J., dissenting.

Parker & Stanbury, Harry D. Parker, Raymond G. Stanbury, and White McGee, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph L. Fainer and Thomas Connell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action to recover damages for injuries which he suffered when struck by defendants' automobile. The driver of the car, defendant Eleanor Atkinson, who has since become Mrs. Wallis, was a minor at the time of the accident. The other two defendants are the parents of Mrs. Wallis, both of whom signed their daughter's application for a driver's license. Plaintiff recovered a judgment, from which defendants have appealed.

Between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock in the evening of January 19, 1940, an accident occurred involving two automobiles on the north side of Venice Boulevard near its intersection with Vineyard Boulevard in the city of Los Angeles. As a result of this accident the two automobiles were left on the north side of the boulevard so that other cars passing used the south half of the boulevard. Plaintiff, a police officer, went to the scene of the accident with Officer Heinemann. They parked their car close to the curb on the south side of Venice Boulevard, facing west. Officer Heinemann began taking pictures and at the time plaintiff was injured was thus engaged, standing near the front ends of the wrecked cars. There was a sharp conflict in the testimony concerning a number of the circumstances, and especially concerning the actions of plaintiff at the time he was struck by defendants' car. Plaintiff testified he was in the center of the street directing traffic with a flashlight. A witness presented by defendants testified that plaintiff left the curbing and walked without pausing until he came in contact with the left front fender of defendants' car.

[1-4] It is contended that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "It is the duty of the driver of an automobile where the view is obstructed to see persons on the road in front of his automobile." This instruction is so prejudicially erroneous as to require a reversal of the judgment. As a general rule it is the function of the jury to determine whether a driver of a motor car has been negligent in failing to see an object in the road in front of him in time to avoid striking it. The matter becomes a question of law for the court only in cases where the object in the road is so plainly visible that reasonable minds could not differ as to the duty of the driver to have seen it. Prato v. Snyder, 12 Cal.App.2d 88, 96, 55 P.2d 255. From the evidence presented in the case under review the jury could have concluded that the boulevard was dark and was partly obstructed by other vehicles in such manner as to divert the attention of the driver of defendants' car; and that the spotlight of the police car was turned on the wrecked cars in such manner as to confuse the vision of the drivers of vehicles passing by. If the jury had credited the testimony of defendants it could have concluded that plaintiff walked without stopping from the police car to the center of the street; that upon his arrival at the center of the street he was struck by the car driven by Mrs. Wallis; and that Mrs. Wallis could not properly be charged with negligence in failing to see him in time to avoid striking him. Although it is a general rule that the failure to look at all constitutes negligence as a matter of law, where, as in the present case, the driver testifies that she did in fact look, the question whether she looked with proper care becomes a question for the determination of the jury. The criticised instruction made it the unqualified obligation of the driver of defendants' car to see plaintiff in front of her automobile. The instruction took from the jury the right to determine whether from all the circumstances shown in evidence defendant driver could see plaintiff in time to avoid striking him. In effect the court instructed the jury that defendant driver was guilty of negligence as a matter of law if she did not see plaintiff on the boulevard in front of her car.

The judgment is reversed.

When language is used concerning a person or his affairs which from its nature necessarily must or presumably will, as its natural and proximate consequence, occasion him pecuniary loss, its publication prima facie constitutes cause of action and prima facie constitutes a wrong without allegation or evidence of damage other than that which is implied or presumed from fact of publication, and such language is "libelous per se".

Action for libel by W. J. Harris against the Curtis Publishing Company and others.

From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an action for libel. At the conclusion of the defendants' case they moved for a directed verdict on the grounds that the complaint does not state a cause of action, that the evidence is not sufficient to show that the article in question is a libel upon the plaintiff, and that the evidence discloses without conflict that the article in question was privileged in that it was a communication without malice to a person interested by another also interested. This motion was granted and a verdict in accordance with such a direction was returned by the jury. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment which followed.

The first question requiring consideration is whether the complaint states a cause of action. So far as material here, the complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a painter and decorator doing business in the city of Laguna Beach and is the president of the school board of that city; that the defendants maliciously and knowing it to be false and unprivileged and with the intent and design to injure, disgrace and defame the plaintiff and to bring him to discredit and obloquy, published the article in question; that the plaintiff has always conducted himself in his business and in his official position with honesty and fidelity and with concern for the welfare and proper ideals of citizenship of the school children of said city, and has at all times enjoyed the esteem and respect of his fellow citizens; that said publication was false and defamatory and unprivileged and by means thereof the defendant is and has been greatly injured and prejudiced in his reputation and has also lost gains and profit which would otherwise have accrued to him in his business to his damage in the sum of $20,000; that said publication was knowingly false, defamatory and unprivileged and was made by the defendants through ill will and malice toward plaintiff and with the intent to injure him in his professional standing and reputation and to discredit and defame him, to bring him into public discredit, contempt and ridicule, by reason whereof he asks for exemplary and punitive damages in the sum of $20,000; and that a timely demand for a retraction was duly served upon one of the defendants pursuant to section 48a of the Civil Code, but no retraction was forthcoming within the time allowed by that section. The article in question, as set forth in the complaint, appeared in the December 2, 1939, issue of the Saturday Evening Post as one of a number of articles under the heading "We See by the Papers." The article reads as follows: "Laguna Beach, Calif.: Schools in this Southern California beach town are in their sixth semester without a students' savings-bank system. Such systems, with the children operating their own banks, making deposits and withdrawals and using regular bank as main depositories, are usual in about 2,000 California public schools. They were started thirty years ago by the Bank of America, to teach children thrift and ordinary banking procedure. But a few weeks after being established here in 1937, the local school board ordered them out under a policy of 'not permitting any organization to use the schools for advertising purposes.' Carl E. Benson, plumber and board member, who introduced the resolution, said recently: 'I think it's wrong to let big corporations into our schools.' W. J. Harris, painter and decorator, board president, addressing the Rotary Club here, said: 'Why should kids save, anyway? We are going to have old-age pensions, and kids should spend their money and let the government take care of them when they are old.' Laguna Beach includes several hundred Communists, some of whom are movie stars who commute the fifty-seven miles daily to Hollywood."

[1, 2] "Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing * * * which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injury him in his occupation." Civ.Code, sec. 45. A publication falling within the terms of this statute is a libel per se, and in such a case it is unnecessary to allege in the complaint matters of innuendo, inducement or special damage. Bates v. Campbell, 213 Cal. 438, 2 P.2d 383. Where the publication is not libelous per se, the matters referred to must be alleged in order to state a cause of action. Grand v. Dreyfus, 122 Cal. 58, 54 P. 389; Vedovi

v. Watson & Taylor, 104 Cal.App. 80, 285 P. 418; Edwards v. San Jose Printing & Pub. Soc., 99 Cal. 431, 34 P. 128, 37 Am.St. Rep. 70; Pollock v. Evening Herald Pub. Co., 28 Cal.App. 786, 154 P. 30.

[3, 4] The complaint here alleges nothing in the line of innuendo, inducement or special damage and its sufficiency depends upon whether or not the publication in question is libelous per se. In Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 11 P. 713, it was held that in interpreting the language of a publication charged to be a libel a court should construe the words used in the light of the whole scope and apparent object of the writer, and considering not only the actual language used but the sense and meaning which may fairly be presumed to have been conveyed to the readers. In Rosenberg v. J. C. Penney Co., 30 Cal.App.2d 609, 86 P.2d 696, 702, the court quotes with approval the rule thus laid down in Newell on Slander and Libel: "'When language is used concerning a person or his affairs which from its nature necessarily must, or presumably will as its natural and proximate consequence, occasion him pecuniary loss, its publication prima facie constitutes a cause of action and prima facie constitutes a wrong without any allegation or evidence of damage other than that which is implied or presumed from the fact of publication; and this is all that is meant by the terms "actionable per se", etc. Therefore the real practical test by which to determine whether special damage must be alleged and proven in order to make out a cause of action for defamation is whether the language is such as necessarily must or naturally and presumably will occasion pecuniary damage to the person of whom it is spoken.'"

In Noral v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 40 Cal.App.2d 348, 104 P.2d 860, 863, the court said: "Charges of libel against a publication which has reported or commented upon matters involving public policy should be viewed with caution. It is in such matters that the freedom of the press is of paramount concern. Without such freedom, the march of progress might be stayed or the venom of alien cultures might stealthily undermine cherished landmarks. 'It is far better for the public welfare that some occasional consequential injury to an individual, arising from general censure of his profession, his party, or his sect, should go without remedy, than that free discussion on the great questions of politics, or morals, or faith, should be checked by the dread of embittered and boundless litigation.' Ryckman v. Delavan, 25 Wend., N. Y., 186, 199."

[5] In construing the effect of language alleged to be libelous it is also necessary to consider the publication as a whole. Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 214 P. 968.

[6] Applying these rules to the publication before us we are of the opinion that it is not libelous per se. The article as a whole is a narration of asserted facts with respect to the absence of a students' savings bank system in the Laguna Beach schools and the policy of the board under which such a savings system was ordered out of the schools after having been once established. The portion which the appellant claims to be libelous per se as to him is the latter part, in which he is stated to have said: "Why should kids save, anyway? We are going to have old-age pensions, and kids should spend their money and let the Government take care of them when they are old," and the final sentence to the effect that Laguna Beach contains several hundred Communists, some of whom are movie stars who commute to Hollywood. In support of his contention that this matter is libelous per se, it is first argued that the statement attributed to the appellant had a natural tendency to injure his reputation generally and with respect to his occupation since he was no mere citizen but the president of a school board and, as such, supervisor of the daily conduct of hundreds of children, and that in addition to its presumed effect there is evidence of its actual effect in his own testimony that he recalled many instances, after the publication of the article "where people that I had been on hailing signs with, simply turned their heads the other way when they saw me coming down the street." Regardless of any question as to the sufficiency of this evidence we are here concerned only with the allegations of the complaint. With respect to the final sentence of the published article it is further argued that it, read in connection with the rest of the article, was libelous per se because it was intended thereby to refer to the appellant as a Communist, as shown by the fact that the statement previously attributed to him expresses a view which would be approved by the average Communist.

Viewed as a whole, the article in question is a criticism of the policy of this school board in eliminating the students' savings bank system. Inferentially, at least, the reasons for that policy are criticized, including one which may be implied from the statement attributed to the appellant to the effect that children should spend their money and let the government take care of them in their old age. That statement is, in itself, but the expression of a political or economic point of view and it is a part of an entire article which is a comment upon a matter of public policy. Moreover, the point of view thus attributed to the appellant was one which was, at the time, quite prevalent. That point of view had recently found widespread expression in this state through popular movements of very considerable strength as, for example, in the "Epic" campaign with its program of production for use and extensive pension systems, in the Townsend plan with its clubs in every locality, and in the so-called "Ham and Eggs" campaign of the year before. The views attributed to the appellant were closely associated with the general views widely spread through California through these movements, as well as by other means, and they are practically identical with a part of the points of view represented by those movements. On the day this is written the newspapers report that a justice of the peace in a city a few miles from Laguna Beach has just held that the state law requiring grown sons and daughters to support their parents is unconstitutional, saying: "It is the duty of the state to care for indigent persons." The point of view to which we have been referring was not entirely absent in the national scene at and prior to the time this article was published, where it found much encouragement in the general attitude, policies and teachings of the national government as these were interpreted and accepted by a large part of our population.

With these circumstances in mind and considering the article as a whole, the criticized portions should be construed in the light of the apparent object of the writer and the meaning that would naturally be conveyed to the readers, with the effect upon them that may reasonably be anticipated. We are unable to hold that in commenting upon such a question of public policy the inclusion of a statement attributing to a public official economic views of a sort which were then held and accepted by a large part of our population is, in itself and per se, a holding of that person up to hatred, contempt or ridicule or that it would presumably cause him to be shunned or avoided, or that it necessarily must or presumably will have a natural tendency to injure him, and much less that it will presumably and as a proximate consequence cause him pecuniary loss. In our opinion, this case is a good example of the class of cases where a mere setting forth of the language used is not sufficient and where a further explanation by way of innuendo, inducement and allegation of special damage is required in order to disclose just how and why it is claimed that the language alleged to be libelous has injuriously affected the complainant in a legal sense.

The appellant himself recognizes that matters of broad general policy were involved in the publication in question since he alleges in his complaint that at all times as president of this school board he has had, "concern for the welfare and proper ideals of citizenship of the school children." In Snavely v. Booth, 6 W.W.Harr. 378, 36 Del. 378, 176 A. 649, 654, the court said: "We have been referred to no authority, nor have we been able, in an extended search, to find authority, holding that criticism of mere opinion or theory is actionable defamation." The statement in question not only related to a matter of public policy of general interest but it was not of such a character that injury must be presumed from the language itself and without the necessity for explanation and specific application.

[7] With respect to the final sentence of the published article it does not necessarily or presumably appear that it refers to this appellant. The article, as a whole, refers to the city of Laguna Beach as well as to its school system. It makes a general reference to the entire school board, and a specific reference to things allegedly said by the appellant and also by another member of that board, and follows this by another general statement. The fact that the concluding sentence is in such general terms is a further indication that the intent and purpose of the article was to criticize a point of view and policy being carried out in that community rather than to attack any individual. Not only is there no direct charge that the appellant is a Communist, whatever the precise meaning intended by that word which has very generally been loosely applied to persons of almost every conceivable point of view, but such a charge is not necessarily to be implied. If it could be so implied there would still be a question whether that alone is libelous per se. The necessity for pleading innuendoes where the charge is that a person has been accused of being a Communist seems to be recognized in Gallagher v. Chavalas, 48 Cal.App.2d ——, 119 P.2d 408, and in the cases there cited. Moreover, a complaint for libel is insufficient where the publication does not defame an ascertainable person. Noral v. Hearst Publications, Inc., supra.

The precise question here presented is new, which is not surprising since attacked publications are usually not alike nor even similar, and since there have been so few cases involving an attack upon political or economic opinions or theories, especially where they were not accompanied by charges of criminal or traitorous acts. Naturally each case of this nature must be considered in reference to its own facts and surrounding circumstances. We conclude, upon the particular facts here involved, that this publication was not libelous per se and that the complaint failed to state a cause of action.

[8-10] Nor do we think the appellant is in any better position if the complaint be held sufficient, since the evidence disclosed without substantial conflict that the publication was privileged under section 47 (3) of the Civil Code. The answer alleged, among other things, that this publication was privileged under this section; that it was published in the honest belief that all statements therein were true; and that there was no malice or intent to injure the plaintiff. That section of the code provides that a privileged publication is one made "In a communication, without malice, to a person interested therein, * * * by one who is also interested." The malice referred to in this statute must be express or actual. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 P. 530. While such malice may not be "inferred from the communication or publication" (sec. 48, Civ.Code), it has been held that actual malice may be inferred "where the charge is false and is libelous per se and the defendant publishes it without having probable cause for believing it to be true." Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 P. 1, 6.

[11] It is first contended that this publication was not a communication between interested persons within the meaning of this statute. It has been held that a newspaper publication concerning one holding public office comes within the purview of this statute. Snively v. Record Publishing Co., supra. The appellant argues that this was so held in that case only as to comments concerning a local officer by a newspaper published and circulated in that particular community. He then cites several Wisconsin cases as holding that a newspaper having a wide circulation had no direct or legitimate interest in certain conduct of an officer in a small community in which there was but "an inconsequential portion of its circulation" and argues that a similar rule should be here applied. In those cases there was a direct attack upon the personal fitness of the plaintiff for a local office which was largely and mainly circulated among persons who resided elsewhere and who had no direct interest in the way the office was conducted. Assuming that the same rule would be applied in this state it does not follow that such rule should be so extended as to be made applicable in the instant case.

[12, 13] There is a wide difference between a publication respecting a matter of purely local concern which is mainly circulated outside the interested area and to people having no interest therein, and one involving a matter of public policy or economic theory which, while arising in a local community, is directly connected with and may vitally affect the habits, modes of living and economic views of people throughout the nation. There is a marked distinction between the making of such a purely local attack and a comment upon political views and policies the effect of which cannot, from their nature, be confined to any locality. There was evidence here that the respondents were interested in the educational systems of the nation and the various states, and in the opinions and theories used in connection with the education and training of our young people and that some of the readers of the Post were also interested in such matters. We may take judicial notice of the fact that the overwhelming majority of the citizens of this country are interested in such matters and in questions which affect the education and proper training of our youth. Regardless of individual views thereon, the question of whether or not thrift should be taught or encouraged in the schools is one of practically universal interest and not a local matter of interest only to the inhabitants of any particular community. If the matter of whether or not one is a Communist is material here it is equally a matter of general rather than purely local interest. Without further discussion, we hold that this publication was a communication between interested persons within the meaning of the statute.

[14] The appellant next contends that actual or express malice appears because the evidence discloses a lack of probable cause for believing the statements contained in the publication to be true, and because a similar statement was republished in the January 20, 1940, issue of the Post. It is argued that lack of probable cause is shown by evidence that the Bank of America, in reply to a letter of inquiry from the editor of the Post, requested that the matter be dropped; that the reporter sent by the Post to investigate the matter, interviewed but five people; that this reporter wrote and sent in the article just as it was published except that the last sentence thereof consisted of a statement from an official of the Bank of America as to their object in setting up school banks, and that the editor of the Post eliminated that sentence and substituted the final sentence as it was published; and that when he sent the article in this reporter wrote a letter to the editor in which he suggested that on account of its trivial background they might not want to use the article, and further stated that "While the board members are 'radical' and 'liberal' * * * they are not Communists."

The things just mentioned are not sufficient to establish a lack of probable cause for believing that the statements published were true. Moreover, there is evidence that no one connected with the defendants was personally acquainted with the appellant or had any ill will toward him or desire or intent to injure him; that the statements in question were honestly believed to be based upon information received from reliable sources, and were reasonably and honestly believed to be true; that no one connected with the publication had knowledge of any facts which would cause him to question the truth of the statements made in the article or the reliability of the sources of information; and that a very considerable investigation was made before the article was published.

With regard to the origin of the article and the investigation made, the evidence is as follows. In June, 1939, the editor of the Post received a letter from a lady in Laguna Beach referring to the absence of a savings plan in the schools of that city and stating that a letter from the school board had been made public in which a bank was requested to desist from all activities in that direction as "some of the board members were opposed to large corporations and they didn't believe in saving, either." The editor replied to the lady expressing interest, requesting a clipping or other information about the matter, and stating that it should be worth an editorial. On July 14, 1939, this lady replied, enclosing a clipping from a local newspaper. This clipping stated that a resident of Laguna Beach had written to the Bank of America asking why that city was the only city of its size on the south coast which did not have school savings, and then set forth what purported to be a copy of a part of a letter in reply written by that bank which contained the statement, after a reference to the fact that they had been asked to discontinue the savings system, "The reasons given me were that several of the school board members were 'opposed to large corporations and one was opposed to saving in any and all forms'." On July 20, 1939, the editor of the Post wrote to the bank and after referring to the portion of the bank's letter appearing in this clipping, stated that before commenting on the matter editorially he would like to know whether the matter in the letter was an accurate statement of the attitude of a majority of the Board of Education. He also stated that he was writing to this appellant asking him the same question, and that while he could appreciate the bank's desire not to stir the matter up it was a matter which, if true, "demands national publicity." The bank replied that it did not wish to embarrass the board members, who were their neighbors and friends, "because their ideas and opinions were not wholly in accord with ours" and suggested that the matter be dropped. On July 20, 1939, the editor also wrote to this appellant calling his attention to the clipping he had received and stating that before commenting on the matter editorially they would be glad to have his statement as to whether his views and the views of the majority of the board had been accurately represented in the clipping. The appellant testified that he received this letter and that he never replied thereto. On August 23, 1939, the editor wrote to a reporter in San Francisco who had previously written for the Post and asked him to go to Laguna Beach and investigate this matter. On August 28, 1939, this reporter sent in the article as above described, which was accompanied by a letter which stated that in the article he had set out the uncontrovertible facts. The final paragraph of this letter stated that there were in Laguna Beach "400 or so communists—or in many cases so-called communists" and that "a few movie stars commute the 57 miles to Hollywood daily."

The evidence not only discloses a rather extensive investigation for the purpose of learning the truth of the statements which were later made concerning the appellant, but that evidence in its entirety discloses, without substantial conflict, that the respondents had probable cause for believing that the statements attributed to the appellant had been made by him. They were so informed directly and indirectly after a considerable effort to learn the truth, including a direct inquiry made to the appellant who refused to answer, although a denial on his part would in all probability have prevented the publication at least insofar as it concerned him.

[15,16] It is further contended that actual malice appears because, so it is said, a similar statement was republished in the January 20, 1940, issue of the Post. In that issue, under the heading "Children and Money," an article from the December issue of the Journal of the National Educational Association was reprinted with the following comment: "How the usual Students' Savings Bank System was barred from the schools of Laguna Beach, California, one ground being that "kids should spend their money and let the Government take care of them when they are old' was described here recently." This appellant was not mentioned in that article and we agree with the observation of the trial court "if there was malice on the part of Mr. Stout, I am inclined to think he would not have overlooked the opportunity to have mentioned Mr. Harris by name in the January 20th article. Actually, he disregarded the name 'Harris' in that article and that is pretty good evidence to me that Mr. Harris as an individual did not mean very much to him." The article of January 20, 1940, is a further indication that respondents' sole interest was in the broad question of thrift in the schools and that any reference to individuals was merely incidental and without any feeling against or intent to injure or to reflect upon any certain person. In Siemon v. Finkle, 190 Cal. 611, 213 P. 954, 957, the court said: "The malice referred to by this section of the Civil Code [Sec. 47, subd. 3] is malice in the popular conception of the term; that is to say, as a desire or disposition to injure another founded upon spite or ill will." In our opinion, the only reasonable inference which may be drawn from the evidence in its entirety is that the communication here in question was one made without malice to a person interested therein by one who was also interested. This being true, there was no question in that regard which should have been submitted to the jury.

[17] Appellant's final contention is that the court erred in excluding evidence of the financial resources of the respondents, it being argued that such evidence was admissible on the issue of punitive or exemplary damages. Section 48a of the Civil Code provides that no more than actual damages shall be recovered in an action of this nature unless a retraction be demanded by serving a notice specifying the statements claimed to be libelous and requesting that the same be withdrawn, and unless such a retraction is not published in the manner provided after such a request for withdrawal is made. The appellant contends that a letter written by his counsel to the respondents was a substantial compliance on his part with this section, and that no retraction or withdrawal having been published within the time allowed the evidence in question was admissible. On December 22, 1939, appellant's counsel wrote a letter to the respondents calling attention to the publication in question, stating that he was advised by the appellant that there was not a word of truth in the statement attributed to him in the article, that the appellant felt that the publication was particularly damaging to him because of his official position and responsibilities in the educational field, and then saying: "No mere retraction, therefore, for a statement of this kind could possibly atone for the outrage committed by such unwarranted publication. I am instructed by Mr. Harris to say that unless proper and substantial compensation is made by you, that he will appeal to the courts for satisfaction and vindication." This is the only demand or request made upon the respondents and it clearly appears that it contains no request for a retraction or that the published matter be withdrawn as provided for in the statute. On the other hand, it rather clearly appears from this letter that no retraction was desired and that nothing less than financial compensation would be accepted. No substantial compliance with the statute appears and the court's ruling was proper.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

BRACEY et al. v. GRAY et al.

Civ. 6681.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 22, 1942.

1. Mortgages ⇐38(1)

In action to recover realty and damages for its detention, conflicting evidence supported finding that plaintiffs were owners of realty and entitled to its possession, as against contention that transfer under which plaintiffs claimed title was in fact a mortgage rather than a deed.

2. Mortgages ⇐138

A properly executed trust deed is effective to convey legal title to trustee, so far as it is necessary to convey it to purchaser at trustee's sale, free of all right or estate of trustor or anyone claiming under or through trustor.

3. Homestead ⇐95
Mortgages ⇐372(1)

A conveyance by trustee under trust deed relates back to estate of trustor at time trustor executed trust deed and transfers to purchaser entire estate then vested in trustor, thereby completely extinguishing homestead declaration filed subsequent to trust deed.

4. Homestead ⇐128

Where trust deed was valid lien on realty when single woman acquired title to realty, homestead declaration was filed after such woman was subsequently married, and her husband executed quitclaim deed to parties claiming title through trustee's sale under trust deed, no homestead rights could be asserted against such parties, and judgment could be entered in their favor, in their action to recover realty and damages for its detention, against wife, without any judgment being entered against husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; Warren Steel, Judge Assigned.

Action by Arthur Bracey and others against John Gray and others to recover possession of realty and damages for its detention. From adverse orders and judgments, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

John Gray and Dora Stuart Gray, in pro. per., for appellants.

Coyle E. Bybee, of Chico, for respondents.

TUTTLE, Justice.

Plaintiffs brought this action to recover possession of certain real property, and damages arising out of its detention. Upon the stipulation of defendant John Gray and plaintiffs, the action was dismissed as to him. The cause was afterward tried, and on January 17, 1939, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs and against defendants. On March 9, a new trial was granted as to defendant Dora Stuart Gray. Thereafter, and on May 1, 1939, judgment was entered in said action against defendant Dora Stuart Gray for restitution of the premises. Defendants appeal from said judgments, and from an order of the court denying their motion to vacate the judgment last rendered. They also appeal from an order granting their motion for new trial which was entered January 17, 1939. The case is before us upon a bill of exceptions.

The premises in question were owned on November 1, 1928, by one Alice Anderson who, on said date, executed a deed of trust covering the same, to Title Insurance and Trust Company, as trustee, for the benefit of State Mutual Building and Loan Association, to secure the payment of $2,250. Thereafter, said Alice Anderson conveyed the property to Dora Stuart, a single woman, and who subsequently married defendant John Gray, and who is now Dora Stuart Gray, another defendant herein. Upon default in the payment of said indebtedness, the said trustee sold said property under said deed of trust. At such sale, said association became the purchaser thereof. On July 5, 1935, said association, for the sum of $1,500, executed a quitclaim deed to said property, to plaintiffs.

[1] The chief contention made by appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to establish any title or right to possession in plaintiffs, for the reason that it shows the transfer to plaintiffs to have been a mortgage. While there is a conflict in the evidence upon the question, we are satisfied that there is ample testimony to support the finding that plaintiffs were the owners and entitled to the possession of the property. Arthur Bracey testified in part as follows:

"My wife's niece came—Dora Stuart Gray—she came and said they had lost it—the property described in the deed. That was in June, 1935. We talked to her and kinder found out that there was something in it. We wanted to find out for sure there was something in it. Whether the property was down there or not. Sometimes talk but there is nothing to it. So we went to the Grass Lake Bank and found out we could get the money to buy it and we got in touch with a man named Parker through Mr. Mellencamp and he got in touch with Los Angeles, the Building and Loan Association, and we got the deal through. Mr. Parker was president of the bank in Chico. Mr. Mellencamp handled the transaction for us. We borrowed the money from the bank at Grass Lake and gave a mortgage on our farm in Waterloo Township. I kind of half-way think this quitclaim deed was sent to us directly from the State Mutual Building and Loan Association. It either came that way or through Mr. Mellencamp. We received it about July 15th, 1935. We took care of the recording of it in Butte County. We sent it and paid the fee. The deed came to the bank and was delivered to me. Question: Did you purchase this property outright for yourself and Mrs. Bracey? Answer: Well, we bought it. Question: You bought it for yourself? Answer: Yes. Question: Did you purchase this property outright for yourself? Answer: We intended to sell it. Question: You later intended to sell the property? Is that what you mean? Answer: Yes sir. Question: When you bought this property did you buy it for anyone else? Answer: No, no. Question: Was this property then for yourself and wife? Answer: Yes sir. Question: Has anyone else got any interest in this property? Answer: No, not the slightest. Question: State whether or not you bought the property as an investment? Answer: No, we didn't do that. We bought it. If them people wanted to buy it back, or someone else, why we would sell it. Question: Who do you mean? Answer: Why, the Grays. Question: Did you buy this property for the Grays? Answer: Oh, no, no. We never had any agreement verbal or otherwise between us relative to borrowing the $1,500. It was not borrowed for them. There was no conversation between us and Dora Stuart Gray and John Gray that we would purchase the property for them. They nor either of the Grays are indebted to us in any sum. The quitclaim deed was not taken as security for any debt of the Grays. They did not owe us any money. I did not know the Grays existed before this property deal came up. There has never been any agreement between the Grays and us that they should assume our obligations to the Farmers' State Bank at Grass Lake. We do not hold this quitclaim deed from the State Mutual Building and Loan Association in trust for the Grays. There was no agreement between the Grays and us that they should pay our obligation to the Farmers' State Bank."

His wife corroborated his version of the transaction.

The action was dismissed as to defendant John Gray on December 21, 1938, and in consideration thereof said defendant executed and delivered to respondents a quitclaim deed to the property involved. This should have, and did end the litigation, so far as that defendant was concerned. The case was tried on December 28th, and judgment was entered against appellants on January 17, 1939. Thereafter, appellant, Dora Stuart Gray moved for a new trial, and the motion was granted. The case was again tried on March 9, 1939. The latter appeared with counsel. John Gray was not a party, and did not participate in said trial. Judgment was entered as set forth in the first paragraph hereof.

[2-4] The position of appellants seems to be that the court had no jurisdiction to enter the judgment of May 1st. It is contended that, as there was a homestead declared upon the property, the husband was a necessary party, and that judgment should have also been ordered against him. The deed of trust was a valid lien upon the property when appellant Dora Stuart Gray acquired the property as a single woman. The homestead declaration was filed after she was married. A properly executed deed of trust is effective to convey the legal title to the trustee, so far as it is necessary to convey it to the purchaser at the trustee's sale, free of all right or estate of the trustor, or anyone claiming under or through her. The conveyance of the trustee relates back to the estate of the trustor at the time she executed the trust deed, and transfers to the purchaser the entire estate then vested in the trustor, thereby completely extinguishing the homestead which was filed subsequent to the deed of trust. That is the precise situation here. 13 Cal.

Jur. § 83, page 512. Not only is any assertion of appellants' homestead right precluded by law, but appellant John Gray has no rights which he could assert, for the reason that he had, previous to trial, conveyed his interest in the property to respondents. The contention is without merit.

Numerous other points are urged as grounds for reversal, but we do not deem them worthy of extended comment. Respondents established the fact that they were the legal owners of the property, and entitled to the possession thereof.

The appeal is devoid of any substantial merit, and, accordingly, the orders and judgments are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action by Nackey S. Meanley against Charles J. McColgan, as Franchise Tax Commissioner, etc., to recover income taxes paid under protest. From a judgment against plaintiff after sustaining of defendant's general demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Irve C. Boldman, of San Diego, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney and Valentine Brooks, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount of deficiency assessments of personal income taxes paid by her under protest for the taxable years 1935 and 1936. The defendant Franchise Tax Commissioner filed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was sustained without leave to amend. From the judgment subsequently entered plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The amended complaint alleged that Nackie H. Scripps died testate on November 16, 1930; that by her will, duly admitted to probate, certain shares of stock were bequeathed to plaintiff subject to the provision that "the bequests contained in this paragraph are subject to the condition that the legatees taking the same shall pay to my aunt, Alice J. Scull, during the lifetime of Alice J. Scull, the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars per month, payable monthly"; that plaintiff was also named as residuary legatee; that, pursuant to this provision, the stock was duly distributed to plaintiff; that Alice J. Scull, on the date of the testatrix's death, was eighty-three years of age; that the value of the life interest was fixed in the estate at $6,025.14; that the dividends received by plaintiff from the stock bequeathed to her have been far in excess of $150 per month; that plaintiff has paid that sum to the annuitant each month; that for the taxable year 1935 plaintiff received in dividends the sum of $11,265 from the stock and paid the annuitant the sum of $1,800; that for the taxable year 1936 plaintiff received the sum of $14,400 in dividends from the stock and paid the annuitant the sum of $1,800; that in her income tax reports for those two years plaintiff claimed a deduction for the $1,800 paid each year to the annuitant; that the commissioner refused to allow these deductions; that the tax thereon was paid under protest and this action instituted.

The legal problem involved can be stated as follows: Where property is bequeathed to a legatee on condition that the legatee pay a third person an annuity for life of $1,800 a year, and the terms of the bequest are such that the annuity must be paid whether or not the income of the trust is sufficient to pay the annuity, and the legatee accepts the legacy and pays to the annuitant $1,800 each year, can the legatee deduct that $1,800 from the total income from the legacy in computing her state income tax?

Appellant, in her opening brief, recognizes that the question is not whether the $1,800 should be taxed, but whether it should be taxed to the annuitant or to appellant. It is argued that the $1,800 should be taxed to the annuitant and not to appellant. She states that the federal government has permitted her the $1,800 deduction. It is urged that appellant has no beneficial interest in the $1,800 paid to Miss Scull; that appellant is the mere collector or conduit through which the $1,800 passes to Miss Scull; that it is the policy of the act to tax the person having the beneficial interest in the income. Several Board of Tax Appeal cases are cited which undoubtedly contain language which supports appellant, but they all appear to be cases where either the annuity was to be paid out of the income of the legacy (in the instant case appellant was required to pay the $1,800 to Miss Scull whether or not the legacy produced that amount of income), or cases where the annuity was based on a contract.

[1] Respondent Franchise Tax Commissioner urges that, where a legatee accepts a legacy which requires her to pay a third person an annuity regardless of whether the legacy produces such income, the total income from the legacy is taxable to the legatee and not to the annuitant. This conclusion follows, according to respondent, from the provisions of section 7(b) of the Personal Income Tax Act, as that section read in 1935 and 1936. The section then provided that: "The following items shall not be included in gross income and shall be exempt from taxation under this act: * * * (3) The value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or inheritance (but the income from such property shall be included in gross income)." Stats. of 1935, page 1090, at page 1094, Deering's Gen.Laws, 1935 Supp., Act 8494, pages 1968, 1972. It is urged that identical language in the federal statute from which the above section was copied, has been interpreted to exempt the recipient of the income and to require the tax to be levied on the payor. We agree with these contentions.

In Burnet v. Whitehouse, 283 U.S. 148, 51 S.Ct. 374, 75 L.Ed. 916, 73 A.L.R. 1534, a will directed the executors to pay a fixed annuity to an heir whether there was income from the estate or not. The court held that, although the annuity was actually paid from income, the heir could not be required to pay a tax on the portion received by him because the annuity was a bequest and therefore exempt. The court distinguished its earlier decision in Irwin v. Gavit, 268 U.S. 161, 45 S.Ct. 475, 69 L. Ed. 897, in which it had been held that income from a trust created by will was taxable to the recipient, on the ground that in that case the heir was to receive income only if income was earned. The Burnet case stands squarely for the proposition that where the annuitant is to receive his payment regardless of whether income is earned, the annuity constitutes a bequest within the meaning of the income tax law, and the payment is not taxable to the annuitant. There is no escape from the conclusion that under the rule of the Burnet case, supra, the payment to Miss Scull not being dependent on the devised stock earning income, could not be taxed to her.

The next step was taken by the Supreme Court in Helvering v. Pardee, 290 U.S. 365, 370, 54 S.Ct. 221, 78 L.Ed. 365. In that case, by will, trustees were directed to pay an annuity of $50,000 a year to the wife of the testator. The payment of this amount was made a charge on the principal of the estate if the income therefrom was not sufficient. The trustees paid the amount from income and sought to deduct the same from the trust's income tax. The Supreme Court held that the trust could not deduct the income. It was pointed out that such income was not taxable to the annuitant under the rule of the Burnet case, supra, and that it must, therefore, be taxable to the trust.

[2-4] Under the rules of these cases, the payments to Miss Scull not being dependent upon whether the stock bequeathed to appellant earned income, but being an absolute charge on appellant, the $1,800 paid to Miss Scull cannot be claimed by appellant for the years in question as a deduction. These cases were all decided prior to 1935 when the state income tax law was adopted. The provisions of our statute applicable to the present problem were copied from the federal statute. Under such circumstances the federal decisions constitute not only argumentative authority, but are conclusive on the proper interpretation of our statute. Holmes v. McColgan, 17 Cal.2d 426, 110 P.2d 428; Union Oil Associates v. Johnson, 2 Cal.2d 727, 43 P.2d 291, 98 A.L.R. 1499. It should be pointed out that in 1937 the state act was amended to expressly provide that payments are taxable to the annuitant if they are actually made from income. Stats. of 1937, page 1831, 1844, section 12(d)(2), Deering's Gen.Laws, 1937, Act 8494. This amendment is not retroactive, and does not affect the taxable years 1935–1936 here involved.

[5] In her reply brief appellant advances another argument which requires mention. It is urged that if the payments to Miss Scull can be held to be property "acquired by * * * bequest, devise, or inheritance," within the meaning of section 7(b)(3) of the Personal Income Tax Act, supra, the entire value of that gift was received by her prior to the years here involved. This argument is predicated on the following reasoning: The annuity to Miss Scull was appraised in the estate for inheritance tax purposes at $6,025.14. She was paid at the rate of $1,800 a year. She actually received more than $6,025.14 prior to the effective date of the Income Tax Act in 1935. It is therefore urged that she received the full value of her gift, tax free, before the taxable years here in question. This argument is predicated upon the provisions of section 7(b)(2) of the 1935 act. This provision was copied directly from an amendment to the federal act added in 1934, Revenue Act 1934, § 22(b)(2), 26 U.S.C.A. Int.Rev.Code, § 22(b)(2). So far as pertinent here, that section provides as follows: "Amounts received as an annuity under an annuity or endowment contract shall be included in gross income; except that there shall be excluded from gross income the excess of the amount received in the taxable year over an amount equal to 3 per centum of the aggregate premiums or consideration paid for such annuity (whether or not paid during such year), until the aggregate amount excluded from gross income under this act in respect of such annuity increased by the amount which would have been excluded from gross income in respect of such annuity had this act been in effect continuously from and after the date at which payments under such annuity were first received equals the aggregate premiums or consideration paid for such annuity."

Under this section the annuitant receives the capital value of his annuity, tax free, but is taxable on the income thereof, arbitrarily fixed at 3 per cent. The payor of the annuity is taxable on the balance as on a capital investment. But when the capital value of the annuity has been paid to the annuitant, the entire amount of each payment is thereafter taxable to the annuitant.

The complete answer to appellant's arguments predicated on this section is that the section has no application to annuities created by will, but applies, by its very terms, only to purchased contractual annuities.

As will be observed, the section above-quoted provides that: "Amounts received as an annuity under an annuity or endowment contract" (italics added) shall be included in gross income as therein provided. The section refers to the "aggregate premiums or consideration paid for such annuity." By its very terms, the section clearly demonstrates that it was intended to apply only to annuities arising under contracts. The provision, as clearly demonstrated by the report of the Federal Ways and Means Committee in 1934, was intended to reach a specific abuse, namely, the large scale investment of assets in annuities which were not taxed under pre-existing law until the purchase price was fully recovered. The section has no application to annuities created by will, where such abuse obviously could not exist. This is clearly established by such decisions as Irwin v. Gavit, supra; Burnet v. Whitehouse, supra; see, also, Helvering v. Butterworth, 290 U.S. 365, 54 S.Ct. 221, 78 L. Ed. 365; Helvering v. Schaupp, 8 Cir., 71 F.2d 736; Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Widener, 3 Cir., 33 F.2d 833; Codman v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1 Cir., 50 F.2d 763.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Where written agreement for sale of four presses to corporation was never amended or modified so as to release corporation from obligation to pay for all such presses, but contract was intended to and did remain in full force and effect at all times, there was no valid "novation" and hence no valid written contract between seller and another corporation, which exchanged two presses owned by it to buyer for two of purchased presses. Where a corporation exchanged two presses to another corporation for two presses purchased by it from individual, who subsequently delivered such presses to first corporation at buyer's direction, there was no valid contract between such corporation and seller, as there was no "consideration" for any promise by it to pay for presses so delivered, because seller was already legally obligated to make such delivery and buyer was already legally obligated to pay seller for presses delivered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Henry G. Jorgensen, Judge.

Action by Carl A. Rietz against the Hovden Food Products Corporation for the purchase price of two presses. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

John Milton Thompson, of Monterey, and Orrick, Dahlquist, Neff & Herrington, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Mueller & Westover, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, Justice.

Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for the alleged purchase price of two presses. Defendant appeals from said judgment.

Defendant presents numerous contentions on this appeal but the determinative question under the unusual situation presented by the record is whether there was any valid written contract between the plaintiff and defendant for the purchase of said presses.

Plaintiff was engaged in the manufacture and sale of machinery under the fictitious name of Process Machinery Company. Defendant was a corporation engaged in fish canning at Monterey. The president of the defendant corporation, hereinafter called the Hovden Company, was K. Hovden, who was also the president of Mazama Fisheries Corporation, hereinafter called the Mazama Company. The last mentioned corporation was organized for the purpose of acquiring the "Mazama" and operating said vessel in the fish reduction industry at Neah Bay, Washington.

In April, 1936, plaintiff entered into a written contract with the Mazama Company, by which it agreed to sell and deliver to said corporation four "presses" and one "disintegrator." The entire purchase price was $13,650, which was payable $3,412.50 upon the execution of the agreement, and the balance in equal monthly installments commencing on July 15, 1936, and ending on October 15, 1936. Delivery was to be made on or before May 22, 1936.

The above mentioned machinery was ordered for installation on the "Mazama" and said machinery was to be shipped to the Commercial Boiler Works in Seattle for that purpose. In May, 1936, it developed that plaintiff would be unable to make delivery of said equipment by May 22nd as provided in the written agreement. The northern fishing season was to open shortly and the Mazama Company arranged with the Hovden Company to obtain from the Hovden Company two presses which the Hovden Company had acquired a short time before. In return, the Mazama Company agreed with the Hovden Company to cause two of the four presses covered by its written contract with plaintiff to be delivered by plaintiff to the Hovden Company as soon as said presses were completed. This arrangement appears to have been agreeable to all concerned.

Pursuant to this arrangement the Hovden Company shipped its two presses from its plant at Monterey to Seattle for installation on the "Mazama" and the Mazama Company instructed plaintiff to deliver to the Hovden Company at plaintiff's plant in Oakland two of the four new presses covered by the written contract between plaintiff and the Mazama Company. Two new presses were thereafter shipped by plaintiff to Seattle and the two remaining new presses were delivered by plaintiff on June 15, 1936, to the Hovden Company at plaintiff's plant in Oakland. These last mentioned new presses were installed in the Hovden Company's Monterey plant in place of the two presses which it had removed and sent to Seattle for installation on the "Mazama."

The Mazama Company made the initial payment upon the written contract and also paid in advance the payment due on July 15, 1936, making a total payment of $5,971.87 upon said written contract. Thereafter the Mazama Company appears to have had financial difficulties. It did not make the payment due on August 15, 1936, or any further payment. Later in 1936, it was adjudicated a bankrupt. Plaintiff assigned, "for the purposes of collection only" its claim against the Mazama Company and plaintiff's assignee sought his remedy on the written agreement in the bankruptcy court. He was unsuccessful, and in 1937, plaintiff charged off as a bad debt in his income tax return the entire balance due on this written contract with the Mazama Company. It was not until February, 1940, that plaintiff filed his complaint in this action seeking to recover the alleged purchase price of two presses from the Hovden Company.

This action was brought upon the theory that a valid written contract for the purchase of said two presses was entered into between plaintiff and the Hovden Company in June, 1936. The claim that such contract existed was based solely upon two letters, one written by an employee of plaintiff on June 1, 1936, and one written in reply thereto by an employee of the Hovden Company on June 3, 1936. After the above mentioned arrangement for the exchange of two presses had been made between the Mazama Company and the Hovden Company, plaintiff instructed his employee Harris that he "should ship two of these to the Commercial Boiler Works and that the Hovden Food P lucts would call with a truck for the other two, and they would go to Monterey."

The first of the two letters above mentioned was written by Harris, plaintiff's employee, on June 1, 1936, and read in part as follows: "On June 12th we will bill four presses to the Commercial Boiler Works, Seattle, shipping two of them to Seattle and holding two for your truck to take to Monterey. If this is not as you understand it, please notify the writer, otherwise we will deliver according to this schedule."

To this letter, Wood, an employee of the Hovden Company, sent a reply under date of June 3rd, which read in part as follows: "We note that there appears to be some confusion in the matter of the four presses. * * * In regard to the second paragraph of your letter, you will bill two presses only to the Mazama Fisheries Corporation, care Commercial Boiler Works, Seattle, Washington, and bill ourselves at Monterey for the other two, and we will arrange to have a truck call on June 15th to pick up these two presses if they will be ready by that time. Kindly advise."

The position of plaintiff in this case is based entirely upon the use of the word "bill" in these letters and particularly in the last mentioned letter written by the employee of the Hovden Company. Plaintiff apparently takes the position that the word "bill" has a plain and unambiguous meaning and that said last mentioned letter constituted a written authorization to plaintiff to charge the two presses to the Hovden Company upon delivery of said presses. Defendant takes the position that the word "bill" has more than one accepted meaning; that it is frequently used with respect to delivery or shipping instructions (Illinois Fuel Co. v. Mobile & Ohio Ry. Co., 319 Mo. 899, 8 S.W.2d 834), and that it clearly appears from said correspondence that the parties were not discussing charges or payment but were merely discussing delivery or shipping instructions. In this connection, it may be stated that on cross-examination, plaintiff was questioned concerning said correspondence and the use of the word "bill" by his employee Harris in the letter of June 1st. He testified: "That was Mr. Harris' letter there and that is his wording. I had no control over that. He has quite obviously slipped in his verbiage. He used the wrong words." Harris testified that he had nothing to do with charging for the presses and that "All I was instructed to do was where to ship them and I sent the bill of lading for the last two presses to Hovden and I shot two of them up north with a bill of lading."

The trial court sustained objections to a direct question relating to the sense in which the word "bill" was used in said correspondence, saying "* * * the letter is the best evidence, and it is a simple word that the court can understand." There was other evidence, however, tending to show the sense in which said word was used. It appeared that no bill or statement was ever sent to the Hovden Company for said two presses; that the books of the plaintiff showed the purchase price of all the equipment to be a charge against the Mazama Company only; that the books of the Mazama Company showed the entire obligation to be owing by it to plaintiff; that plaintiff had assigned for collection his claim for the entire unpaid balance under his written agreement with the Mazama Company; that plaintiff had furnished all information for the purpose of the attempted recapture of all four presses and that a written petition for that purpose had been filed in the bankruptcy proceeding setting forth as an existing obligation of the Mazama Company the entire unpaid purchase price for said equipment; that plaintiff had testified in said proceeding that "there was no other purchaser other than the Mazama Fisheries Corporation"; that plaintiff had charged off in his income tax return as a bad debt owing by the Mazama Company the entire unpaid balance of the purchase price; and that the correspondence and other business dealings between plaintiff and the Hovden Company during the several years following delivery of said two presses, including acknowledgment in full of payment of the account of the Hovden Company with plaintiff, shows that neither plaintiff nor the Hovden Company considered that the amount of the purchase price of the presses to be a charge against the Hovden Company.

The trial court did not find specifically that any written contract had been entered into by plaintiff and the Hovden Company, but did find certain facts in the nature of probative facts with respect to said correspondence. Furthermore, there were no findings on the issue of the bar of the statute of limitations. The trial court entered judgment against the Hovden Company for an amount equal to the full price of the two presses based upon the price per press which had been agreed upon at the time of the making of the written contract between plaintiff and the Mazama Company.

We believe that it is apparent from what has been said that this litigation was the result of an afterthought which developed when it appeared that plaintiff had suffered a loss by reason of the bankruptcy of the Mazama Company. The result of the judgment is to place upon the Hovden Company the obligation for the full price of the two presses which it had accepted, by agreement with the Mazama Company, in exchange for its two presses which it had delivered to the Mazama Company. Said exchange was made as a matter of accommodation to the Mazama Company and was necessitated by plaintiff's failure to deliver the four presses within the time required in his written agreement with the Mazama Company. Immediately after making said exchange in 1936, plaintiff's employee wrote to the Hovden Company on behalf of plaintiff thanking the Hovden Company for its "courtesy extended on this equipment," but almost four years later, plaintiff instituted this action based upon the ambiguous wording of the above mentioned correspondence of June, 1936.

[1, 2] Regardless of the sense in which said employees may have intended to use the word "bill" at any place in said correspondence, we are of the opinion that there was no valid written contract between plaintiff and the Hovden Company. There was nothing in said correspondence or in any other evidence in the record to show that the written agreement between plaintiff and the Mazama Company was ever amended or modified so as to release the Mazama Company from its obligation to pay for all four presses but, on the contrary, the uncontradicted evidence showed that said contract was intended to remain and did remain at all times in full force and effect. There was therefore no valid novation, Civil Code, sec. 1531; United States Gypsum Co. v. Snyder-Ashe Co., 139 Cal.App. 731, 34 P.2d 767; Blumer v. Madden, 128 Cal.App. 22, 16 P.2d 319; Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Wallace, 58 Cal.App. 625, 209 P. 78; American Paper-Bag Co. v. Van Nortwick, 7 Cir., 52 F. 752, 3 C.C.A. 274; Williston on Contracts, Rev.Ed., sec. 1869, page 5253, and there was no consideration for any alleged promise on the part of the Hovden Company to pay for said presses as plaintiff was already under a legal obligation to make delivery of said presses at the direction of the Mazama Company and the Mazama Company was already under the legal obligation to pay plaintiff for the same. Tipton v. Tipton, 133 Cal.App. 500, 24 P.2d 525; Ellison v. Jackson Water Co., 12 Cal. 542; Parrino v. Rallis, 116 Cal.App. 364, 2 P.2d 515.

We have thus far discussed this appeal solely from the standpoint of whether or not there was a valid written contract on the part of the Hovden Company to pay for said presses. Defendant also contends that there could be no implied contract under the circumstances. Plaintiff does not answer this contention but rests upon the claim that there was a valid written contract by reason of said correspondence. We therefore deem it unnecessary to discuss this last mentioned contention of defendant further than to state that in our opinion, said contention must be sustained.

The views which we have expressed necessitate a reversal of the judgment and it appears unnecessary to discuss the remaining contentions of defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Divorce ⇐145

Denial of plaintiff's requests for continuances because of plaintiff's absence on day when divorce suit was called for trial and for purpose of taking depositions, the latter of which requests was not made until conclusion of trial, was not an abuse of discretion, where plaintiff had shown no interest in the case and, by reasonable diligence, could have shown before conclusion of trial that a proper ground for continuance existed on day when case was set for trial.

2. Divorce ⇐145

Courts are liberal in granting continuances in divorce suits because of public interest in preserving integrity of the marriage status, but the law requires that parties be held not only to the exercise of good faith, but also to exercise of due diligence with respect to continuances.

3. Divorce ⇐145

An application for a continuance in a divorce suit need only be made at the earliest practicable date.

4. Divorce ⇐151

Denial of plaintiff's motion for new trial in divorce suit on ground that plaintiff's requests for continuances were improperly overruled was not an abuse of discretion, where plaintiff failed to take advantage of opportunity to make a proper showing for a continuance before trial was completed.

5. Action ⇐6

Where in divorce suit cross-complaint asked for declaratory judgment that parties had never been husband and wife and expressly asked that plaintiff be enjoined from assuming or using the name in which suit was originally commenced, enjoining plaintiff from using such name was not reversible error.

6. Divorce ⇐286

Suit for divorce by Angie V. Gale against William V. Gale, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Hearing denied; TRAYNOR, J., dissenting.

McWILLIAMS, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant and cross-complainant. The principal questions involved are whether or not the trial court abused its discretion in refusing a continuance of the trial by reason of the absence of the appellant and, subsequently, in refusing a motion for a new trial based on the same ground. The respondent following the service upon him of a complaint for divorce promptly filed an answer in which he denied all the allegations of the complaint including the allegation of the marriage of the parties. The case was originally set for trial for April 17, 1940. By reason of the illness of the appellant the trial was continued to April 30. On that date appellant's attorney presented to the court a telegram received by him from one Frank T. Doyle, an attorney in New Orleans, in which city Mrs. Gale was then residing, which telegram stated that appellant was still ill and suggested that the action be dismissed without prejudice and re-filed when appellant had recovered. Pursuant to the suggestion the case was dropped from the calendar.

On October 24, 1940, an amended answer and also a cross-complaint were filed on behalf of respondent. The cross-complaint alleged that the appellant and cross-defendant was claiming to be the wife of the cross-complainant and that her claim was without foundation although conceding that the parties had lived together over a period of years. This had occurred, according to the pleading of respondent, in California and Louisiana which states do not recognize common-law marriages. The cross-complainant asked for a declaratory judgment decreeing that the parties were not and never had been husband and wife, and enjoining appellant from using the name of Angie V. Gale in which name she had brought suit. Cross-complainant also asked that his title be quieted to certain real and also to personal property including the sum of approximately $13,000 in cash, most of which property, both real and personal, stood in the names of the parties in joint tenancy. An answer to the cross-complaint was filed on December 2, 1940. On December 12, respondent and cross-complainant filed a notice of motion to set the case for trial. On December 19, appellant's attorney, Roland T. Williams, filed a notice of motion for an order permitting him to withdraw as her attorney. The notice of motion was supported by an affidavit in which he recited the history of the litigation. The affidavit also set forth the fact that since the case had been dropped from the calendar on April 30 of that year he had received no word from his client, although numerous letters and telegrams had been sent by him to her. On November 28, affiant said, he wrote to Attorney Doyle at New Orleans requesting his cooperation in securing answers from appellant to his letters. On November 28, the affidavit recited, affiant wrote to one Leo W. Seal, a resident of Mississippi and the brother-in-law of the appellant, informing Seal of the urgent necessity of cooperation by her. This message, according to a reply which Williams said he had received from Seal on December 7, was delivered to appellant.

At the hearing of the motion to set, an early trial date was requested. The court's attention was called to the notice of motion of Attorney Williams to withdraw from the case and to the fact that that motion had been set for hearing on January 19; also to the fact that plaintiff was still residing in New Orleans and to the resulting difficulty of effecting service on her in the event that Williams' motion was granted. The possibility was also explained to the court of Dr. Gale, respondent, being called into service in the medical corps of the army owing to his having theretofore held a commission in that corps. The case was thereupon set for trial for January 3. Notice of trial was sent to Attorney Williams by mail on December 23. The notice was received by him on the following day. On December 26, Williams telegraphed to his client in New Orleans that the case was set for trial for January 3, adding "Advise at once."

When the case was called for trial on January 3, Attorney Williams asked for a continuance on the ground of the absence of appellant. He supported his application with a telegram received by him from Attorney Doyle of New Orleans which merely stated that it would be impossible for Mrs. Gale to be in California until April or May but giving no reason therefor, and inquiring whether it would be possible to have the case dismissed without prejudice. The request for a continuance was denied and the case proceeded to trial. The taking of testimony began on Friday, January 3, and was concluded on Tuesday, January 7. At the conclusion of the trial and before the final submission of the case, counsel for Mrs. Gale requested a continuance for the purpose of taking her deposition and also the deposition of Mr. Seal. The motion was denied on the ground that appellant had had ample opportunity to take the depositions prior to the trial. Judgment was rendered in favor of respondent and cross-complainant on January 16. By its decision the court found, and by its judgment decreed, that the parties were not and never had been husband and wife. It also found and decreed that there was no community property, and that with one minor exception appellant had no right, title or interest in or to any of the real or personal property described in the cross-complaint.

A motion for a new trial was thereafter made by appellant. It was supported by a number of affidavits, including affidavits by appellant and her physician, to the effect that between December 20 and the 31st she had been ill and confined to her bed, and that by January 1 she was only well enough to call at the residence of Attorney Doyle, who lived across the street from her, for the purpose of apprising him that her case was set for trial for the following day. The showing made by appellant with respect to her illness was uncontradicted by respondent, whose reply affidavit was limited in its scope to a consideration of the history of the litigation. The motion for a new trial was denied. This ruling appellant assigns as error.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that no sufficient showing of abuse of discretion by the trial court has been made, either in its denial of the continuance requested or in the denial of the motion for a new trial, as to justify the interference of this court. In so holding we have in mind that in divorce actions courts are liberal in granting continuances because of the interest of the public in preserving the integrity of the marriage status. But the law also requires that parties be held not only to the exercise of good faith but also to the exercise of due diligence. Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 179, 30 P. 298, 16 L.R.A. 660. The situation must be considered in the light of appellant's complete lack of interest in her case as that lack of interest is shown in the affidavit of her own attorney offered in support of his application for leave to withdraw from the case and which, we may assume, the court took into consideration in passing on the motion. Moreover even though appellant by reason of her illness may not have had the opportunity to have made a proper showing for a continuance on the day her case came on for trial on January 3, it would appear that such showing could, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have been made before the taking of the evidence was concluded on January 7. Had a proper showing been made by that time it may reasonably be assumed that the court would have granted a continuance since the law only requires that an application for a continuance be made at the earliest practicable date.

[4] With respect to the denial of the motion for a new trial we are also of the opinion that no showing has been made that will justify us in interfering with the action of the trial court. Since, as pointed out above, appellant could have made a proper showing for a continuance before the trial was completed, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in denying a new trial after appellant had failed to take advantage of that opportunity.

[5] Certain relatively minor contentions are also advanced by appellant. Thus she claims that the court erred in enjoining her from using the name in which the action was originally begun by her. Since the cross-complaint expressly asked that appellant be enjoined from assuming or using the name of Angie V. Gale as well as asking for general equitable relief, we are of the opinion that, in view of the state of the pleadings and the circumstances shown on the trial, no reversible error was committed by the trial court in granting this relief.

[6] With respect to the status of the property referred to in the pleadings which was decreed to belong to respondent, the question whether or not it was his separate property was a matter to be determined by the trial court which heard the testimony. With its conclusion on that subject we may not interfere.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; A. L. Pierovich, Judge.

Action by Harvey Sallee and others against John J. Daneri, as administrator of the estate of Merle Wetmore, and another, wherein a cross-complaint was filed. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied; SHENK, HOUSER, and CARTER, JJ., dissenting.

Frank L. Murphy, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Allen L. Martin, of Jackson, and Leon French, of San Francisco, for respondent Jones.

Snyder & Snyder, of Jackson, for respondent John J. Daneri.

THOMPSON, Acting Presiding Justice.

This is a suit to recover damages for alleged injury to land which is now in the possession of appellants who are remaindermen by virtue of the will and the decree of distribution in the matter of the Estate of Clara N. Wetmore, deceased.

The appellants allege two causes of action. The first cause is against the administrator of the Estate of Merle Wetmore, deceased. Mr. Wetmore was the husband of Clara N. Wetmore. He went into possession of the premises involved in this suit in March, 1919, as a life tenant, remaining thereon until his death, which occurred February 19, 1939. It is alleged that Merle Wetmore committed acts constituting waste and injury to the inheritance by failing to cultivate and maintain the land and premises in accordance with good husbandry in Amador County. Appellants alleged that Mr. Wetmore permitted the farm to grow to weeds; that he cut down, removed and sold trees; that he failed to make necessary and reasonable repairs to the buildings, so that they became dilapidated; that he permitted strangers to come upon the property and to cut down the trees and sell the wood.

The second cause of action alleged that Joseph R. Jones was permitted to wrongfully enter upon the premises without appellants' consent and to cut down trees and convert the timber to his own use.

The portion of the complaint which is based on a demand for treble damages was stricken out and a claim only for ordinary damages remains.

A cross-complaint was filed by respondent Jones which alleges conversion by appellants of a quantity of cut wood belonging to him and situated upon the premises at the time of possession thereof by appellants. By stipulation of counsel, these damages were fixed at $1,200.

The trial court entered judgment against the appellants and in favor of respondents, John J. Daneri and cross-complainant Joseph R. Jones. It was ordered that respondent Daneri have judgment against appellants for his costs of suit and that respondent Jones recover upon his cross-complaint against appellants $1,200 damages, together with his costs of suit.

The findings of the court determine that Merle Wetmore, the life tenant, did not commit any act upon the land resulting in injury to the inheritance or causing a depreciation of the market value of such property; that Merle Wetmore did not neglect to properly cultivate the land nor did he permit the farm property to grow to weeds or allow the pasture land to be overgrown with brush, or unlawfully permit the cutting and sale of trees. On the contrary the court found that Mr. Wetmore followed the usage and custom of the district in keeping with good husbandry, in his cultivation and care of the property.

It is further found that Joseph R. Jones entered upon the premises of appellants by permission of Merle Wetmore and that with his consent he cut down a number of growing trees situated on the land; that the cutting of these trees was not wrongfully or wantonly committed and did not constitute acts of waste on the part of Jones, but on the contrary that such cutting of trees resulted in the improvement of the property, and was consistent with the usage and custom of the district in accordance with good husbandry, and actually resulted in an increase in the value of the land. It is found that on March 1, 1939, at which time appellants were in possession of the premises, that Jones was the owner of a quantity of cut wood of the value of $1,200, which was stored on the premises with consent of Merle Wetmore. The court further found that on March 1, 1939, while appellants were in possession and control of the cut wood they converted the same to their own use, to the damage of cross-complainant Jones in the sum of $1,200.

This appeal from the judgment in favor of respondents raises the question as to whether Merle Wetmore, as the life tenant of the property, committed acts which were detrimental to the inheritance within the meaning of section 818 of the Civil Code, and therefore compensable in damages.

A life tenant, under the provisions of section 818 of the Civil Code, may use the land in the "same manner" that the owner of a fee simple may use it, provided that he does not thereby injure the inheritance. The provisions of that section read as follows:

"The owner of a life estate may use the land in the same manner as the owner of a fee-simple, except that he must do no act to the injury of the inheritance."

[1-3] The plain meaning of the foregoing language indicates that the life tenant possesses a somewhat free hand in the manner in which he uses the land, and his right of enjoyment is limited only by such action as results in injury to the inheritance. Injury to the inheritance, which under the common law would be termed "waste" can only be proved, with the possible exception of a few instances, by evidence of acts which injuriously affect the market value of the property. The owner of an estate in reversion may not subject a life tenant to damages for every act which does not meet with the approval of the reversioner. Section 818 of the Civil Code requires that there be an injury to the "inheritance." As indicated, the question as to whether the tenant has committed acts of waste or injury to the inheritance is determined by proof only of conduct which has resulted in substantial depreciation of the market value of the land. Richards v. Silveria, 97 Cal.App. 166, 275 P. 478. The burden of proving depreciation in market value of the land, as a result of the alleged wrongful acts of waste rests upon the remainderman, who must establish that fact by satisfactory evidence, even though a life tenant may not use what might appear to be the best of care in the cultivation and care of the property.

[4] We are of the opinion that, although Merle Wetmore, the life tenant, may have failed to maintain the buildings in first-class repair, there is substantial evidence in support of the finding that the cutting of timber had the effect of improving the land rather than to depreciate its value, and that appellants have therefore failed to prove that any such act on his part resulted in decreasing the market value of the inheritance.

Evidence bearing upon the market value of appellants' property was introduced by the testimony of George A. Kirkwood, the State Inheritance Tax Appraiser for Amador County and by the testimony of Thomas W. Burke, a rancher, who owned considerable property in Amador County.

Mr. Kirkwood testified that he appraised this farm land in 1930, as a part of the Estate of Eleanor Easton, deceased. He said that the land was worth in 1939, which is the time involved in this suit, the same value that it was when he first appraised it in 1930. This value he fixed at $25 an acre for the open farm land and $10 an acre for the wooded land. He stated that, in his opinion, the cutting and removing of the timber and the clearing of the land increased its market value. The testimony of Mr. Kirkwood is in part as follows:

"Q. You appraised that same land in 1930, in the estate of Eleanor Easton? A. I did, yes sir.

"Q. At that time what did you fix as the market value of the different classes of land there? A. As near as I remember about the same as I did now.

"Q. Twenty-five dollars for open farm land and ten dollars for what we generally speak of as wooded land? A. Yes.

"Q. Mr. Kirkwood, have you observed that some wood has been cut off of that land? A. Yes, I noticed those.

"Q. Would that, the cutting and removing of that wood and clearing of that land decrease the market value of the land or would it increase the market value of the land? A. I would say it increased it."

Mr. Burke, who stated he was familiar with land values in the farming district, testified as follows:

"Q. What effect did the cutting of that wood off on that land, if any, did it depress the value or increase it? A. No, it increased the value of it in my estimation."

On cross-examination Mr. Burke testified that "Land without wood is more valuable, has more value in my estimation" in spite of the fact that such wood was worth $2 a tier on the ground.

[5] We are aware of the fact that respondents' evidence bearing upon the relative market value of the premises in question, as evaluated in 1919, at which time Merle Wetmore became the life tenant, as compared with the market value in 1939, is far from conclusive. The appraisals made by Mr. Kirkwood were not for the purpose of assessing taxes and apparently were not based upon thorough investigation. The testimony given by Mr. Burke is not entirely satisfactory since he admitted that he had not dealt in sales of farm land for a number of years, and his appraisal of $20 per acre for ranch land in that vicinity was at variance with the appraisals upon such land which were made by Mr. Kirkwood. However, the opinions and conclusions of Mr. Gordon and Mr. Barsotti, two witnesses who testified for appellants, is also subject to the same criticism. Mr. Gordon made his appraisal for loan purposes only. The evidence offered by appellants, bearing upon the market value of this farm land, had the mere effect of creating a conflict in this respect.

The conflict was resolved in favor of respondents, and we are bound by the conclusion of the trial court in that regard. We cannot assume that the deteriorated condition of the buildings on the premises necessarily depreciated the market value of the property, where substantial testimony was introduced indicating that the cutting of timber and the clearing of the land resulted in an increase of that market value. The evidence is also far from convincing regarding the condition of the buildings at the time Merle Wetmore went into possession of the property as life tenant. It is true that there is some evidence indicating that the land was not properly cleared after the cutting of timber thereon, but there were also a number of witnesses who testified to the clearing of the land. The evidence in that respect was also conflicting. There appears to be substantial evidence to support the findings that Merle Wetmore in accordance with good husbandry followed the usage and custom in his cultivation and care of the land and property employed by farmers in that vicinity.

It follows that since we must assume Merle Wetmore, the life tenant, committed no act detrimental to the inheritance, but on the contrary, that the property and the inheritance benefited by the cutting of timber and the clearing of the land, the sale of this timber by Merle Wetmore was not a wrongful act subjecting him to damages, and the contract between the respondent Jones and Merle Wetmore was therefore valid and inforcible.

Although we still follow the rule of the common law as applied in England in regard to "waste" as affecting the "inheritance," the strictness of the enforcement of that rule is not applicable in this country because of the difference in the conditions which exist, especially with respect to the cutting of timber. The cutting of timber in this country has in many instances the effect of improving the inheritance, by converting woodland into arable soil. 21 A. L.R. 1015, section VIII.

[6] It follows from our conclusions that Merle Wetmore did have the right to sell timber to respondent Jones, and that Jones was rightfully upon the property for the purpose of cutting such timber. This being true, Jones had the right to store the cut timber upon the premises, and the appellants were not within their rights in taking possession of this personal property and converting the same to their own use. The respondent Jones was entitled to recover damages upon his cross-complaint for the value of the converted wood.

There is substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court. The appellants have failed to prove an injury to the inheritance within the meaning of section 818 of the Civil Code.

Because of our foregoing conclusions, we deem it unnecessary to answer other issues raised on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 11991.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 28, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 27, 1942.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)

Trial court's finding of facts on conflicting evidence is binding on appellate court.

2. Mortgages ⇐270, 319(3)

In action to set aside trust deed and trustee's sale thereunder and to quiet title to property covered thereby, evidence sustained finding that one of defendants gave trustee over $5,000 in consideration of assignment by trustee of note and beneficial interest under deed of trust in property covered thereby, and that there had been no agreement that such payment should be in satisfaction or discharge of deed of trust.

3. Mortgages ⇐38(1)

The principle that transaction will be deemed to create mortgage where its purpose is to create lien on property as security for payment of lien, regardless of language used in instruments executed, did not apply where trial court found sufficient evidence, not inherently improbable, that one of defendants had paid trustee a certain sum in consideration of assignment by trustee of note and beneficial interest under deed of trust and that there had been no agreement that the payment should be in satisfaction of deed of trust.

4. Usury ⇐117

Where trial court found on sufficient evidence that one of defendants had paid trustee a certain sum in consideration of assignment of note and beneficial interest under deed of trust, and that there was no agreement that payment was made in satisfaction of deed of trust, claim of plaintiff, suing to set aside deed of trust and trustee's sale thereunder, that transaction amounted to a loan at usurious rate of interest which must therefore be held to be void, could not be sustained.

5. Appeal and error ⇐995

Where trial court's findings on conflicting evidence were sustained by substantial evidence, appellant's contention that testimony of one of appellees was inherently improbable, and should therefore be disregarded by appellate court, was proper one for consideration of trial court, but, having been rejected by trial court, could not avail in appellate court.

6. Mortgages ⇐270

In action to set aside a trust deed and trustee's sale thereunder, contention that there was no consideration for assignment of trust deed, and therefore no right to foreclose thereunder, could not be sustained, in view of testimony that, because title to property had not been searched before purchase of property was consummated, the assignment of trust deed was then taken as measure of precaution.

7. Mortgages ⇐268

Where purchaser of property took assignment of deed of trust, there was no "merger" of the two where no merger was intended; question of merger being one of intention.

McWILLIAMS, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to set aside a trust deed and the trustee's sale that occurred thereunder, and also to quiet the title to the property covered by the trust deed. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendants and plaintiff appealed.

The property involved had been acquired by appellant in 1933. At that time it was encumbered by the deed of trust referred to under which the Beverly Hills National Bank and Trust Co. was the trustee. On June 19, 1939, appellant conveyed the property subject to the deed of trust to one Neal V. Dow who, appellant claims, took the property as its trustee. The indebtedness, to secure which the deed of trust had been given, not having been paid when it fell due, the trustee gave notice of its intention to sell the property on January 18, 1940.

[1] On January 17, the day before the sale was scheduled to occur, a Miss Wilhelminia E. Stowell, the assistant secretary of appellant, called upon J. Thomas Russell, one of the respondents, in regard to the impending sale. The purpose of her visit and the conversation that ensued is a matter of dispute between the parties. Appellant in its brief correctly states that the question as to what occurred at that interview presents substantially the only conflict in the evidence in the case. Appellant contends that at the interview between Russell and Miss Stowell she informed Russell of the pendency of the foreclosure proceeding and requested on behalf of appellant, of which her brother was president and manager, that he loan a sufficient sum to pay off the indebtedness, offering as security for such loan a deed to the encumbered property. Miss Stowell explained in her testimony that appellant was a closed corporation and that she had authority from her brother to refinance the loan. According to Miss Stowell, Russell inquired of her when the loan would be repaid. Her answer was that she might have the money in a few days or that she might not have it for thirty days or possibly for a year. She further testified that Russell agreed to make the loan and stated that his fee for his services in so doing would be $100. Russell's version of the conversation between them was altogether different. He testified that Miss Stowell informed him that the property which she said was then occupied by her sister, a Mrs. Fitch and her husband, was to be sold on foreclosure sale the following day. She explained that Neal V. Dow who held title to the property was unable to prevent the sale. She expressed a desire, according to Russell's testimony, to buy the property for her sister, Mrs. Fitch. She told Russell that the property was worth between $15,000 and $20,000. She further stated, according to Russell, that she was expecting to receive $20,000 from an escrow in the near future and that if Russell would pay off the mortgage indebtedness and thereby prevent the sale she would procure a deed to the property from Dow, the record owner, and would thereafter buy the property from Russell at a price that exceeded the mortgage indebtedness by $1,500. Russell testified that he accepted the proposition of Miss Stowell. Although Russell at that time had not seen the property he had the opinion of its value as given him by Miss Stowell. In addition he testified that he had inquired as to its value from a friend, W. T. Stockman by name, who had told him that the property was worth nine or ten thousand dollars. The lower court accepted Russell's version of what occurred at this interview and by its finding to that effect we are of course bound. That finding is largely determinative of the case.

Following the conversation between Russell and Miss Stowell, the former, who according to his testimony had had but little experience in such matters, called in one Hutson, a friend of his who was in the real estate business, to assist in closing the deal. The mortgage indebtedness which then amounted to $5058.64 was paid to the bank by Russell on January 18, the day on which the sale was scheduled to occur. He also, at the suggestion of Hutson, then requested and was given an assignment of the trust deed and of the note which it secured. A deed from Dow running to Julia Burke Moore, the nominee of Russell, as grantee, was delivered to him. An escrow was also opened with the bank under which Miss Stowell agreed to purchase the property from Julia Burke Moore within thirty days for the sum of $6,615.64, being $1,500 in excess of the amount of the mortgage indebtedness plus estimated escrow charges and other incidental expenses. Miss Stowell did not perform the conditions of the escrow and it lapsed.

On February 22, 1940, Miss Moore, the grantee, served a demand for possession of the property on its occupants, Miss Stowell and Mr. and Mrs. Fitch. Possession being refused an ejectment action was begun by Miss Moore. An answer was filed on behalf of appellant which alleged that the sum paid to the bank by Russell on January 18, had been paid as a loan and that the deed from Dow to Moore was in legal effect a mortgage to secure the repayment of the sum paid by him to the bank. The alleged connection of appellant with the property appears to grow out of an unrecorded deed to appellant that was executed by Dow on the same day that appellant had deeded the property to Dow. The lower court found that appellant did not inform any of the respondents of the execution or of the existence of this deed prior to the commencement of this action. That court also found it was not true that appellant was the owner of the property at the time this action was commenced.

Following the filing by appellant of its answer, Russell, whose experience on the subject involved in the litigation concededly was limited notwithstanding the fact that he was an attorney, called in W. J. Stockman, a more experienced attorney, to assist him with the litigation. Stockman advised a foreclosure by trustee's sale. The trustee originally named in the trust deed having expressed a desire to be relieved of its duties as trustee and having refused to proceed with a sale, an order of court was secured whereby Stockman was substituted as trustee. He thereupon gave notice that a sale under the trust deed would be held on September 3. On the day appointed and before the property was offered for sale, appellant caused a notice to be read aloud, notifying those present that the deed of trust under which the property was being sold "had been fully paid, satisfied and discharged" by the original payment made by Russell on January 18, and also notifying the persons present that appellant was the owner of the property covered by the deed of trust. The property was bought in by respondent T. C. Laubisch who bid $8,000 therefor. The lower court found that at the time of this sale the obligation secured by the deed of trust had not been paid and was in default. The trustee's deed to Laubisch contained the usual recitals to the effect that the requirements of the trust deed relative to a sale on foreclosure had been complied with. The deed of trust itself contained the customary provisions making the recitals in any deed given by the trustee following a foreclosure sale conclusive proof of the truthfulness of its recitals with reference to matters or facts affecting the regularity or validity of the sale.

The lower court found on adequate evidence that appellant had been in possession of the property from January 17, 1940 but that it had made no offer or tender either to Laubisch, Russell, or Moore, to do equity prior to the commencement of this action.

[2] Appellant's first contention is that two of the findings made by the lower court are not supported by the evidence. One of those findings is to the effect that Russell had paid the trustee the $5,058.64 in consideration of the assignment by the trustee of the note and its beneficial interest under the deed of trust in and to the property covered thereby. The other finding objected to is to the effect that there had been no agreement that the said sum should be paid to the trustee in satisfaction, or payment, or discharge of the deed of trust. This contention of appellant with reference to those two findings is submitted by it without argument on a mere reference to the testimony taken on the trial. In the circumstances it is sufficient to say that in our opinion the findings are fully supported by the evidence.

[3] Appellant's principal contention upon which, in its different aspects, appellant's case on appeal is largely based, is that the payment by Russell to the Beverly Hills National Bank and Trust Co., the original trustee, amounted to a loan and that the deed from Dow to Moore was in legal effect but a mortgage given to secure the loan. Appellant cites numerous cases which hold in substance that when the purpose and effect of a transaction is to create a lien on certain property as security for the payment of a loan the transaction will be held to constitute a mortgage regardless of the language used by the parties in the instruments executed by them. The principle of law referred to is of course a settled one. However, it has no application to the situation here presented in view of the testimony and the findings of the lower court. The contention is based upon the testimony given by Miss Stowell which was rejected by that court which made findings in accordance with the opposing testimony of Russell.

[4] All of the subsidiary arguments which are made by appellant and which are predicated upon an acceptance of the testimony of Miss Stowell must likewise fall for the same reason. Thus, the claim of appellant that the transaction between Miss Stowell and Russell amounting, as he says, to a loan of money at a usurious rate of interest which must therefore be held to be void, cannot be allowed. The same is true of the contention that the deed taken by Julia Burke Moore being in legal effect but a mortgage her only remedy was its foreclosure.

[5] Appellant is not aided in its argument by its insistence that the testimony of Russell that he had purchased the property is inherently improbable and that it should therefore be disregarded by this court. That argument was a proper one for the consideration of the lower court. But having been rejected by that court it cannot avail in this court. We may add that not only was the testimony given by and on behalf of respondents with respect to the questioned transaction not inherently improbable but that in certain material respects it constitutes a much more reasonable explanation of that transaction than does the testimony offered on behalf of appellant.

[6] Appellant argues that there was no consideration for the assignment of the trust deed and that therefore neither Russell nor Julia Burke Moore had the right to foreclose. Hence, says appellant, Laubisch has no title to the property involved. But testimony was given that since the title to the property had not been searched before the transaction was consummated an assignment of the trust deed was then taken as a measure of precaution. In view of this testimony appellant's contention must fall.

[7] Appellant's last contention is that when on January 18, 1940, the deed from Dow and the assignment of the deed of trust were given to Julia Burke Moore, the two merged. The answer to this contention appears from a consideration of the circumstances of the case which indicate clearly that no such merger was intended. It is, of course, a long settled principle of law that the matter of merger in circumstances such as those here presented is a question of the intent of the parties. 18 Cal.Jur. 75.

Civ. 2739.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 27, 1942.

1. Injunction ⇐61(2), 114(3)

Where parties have covenanted not to engage in any competing business, injunction will ordinarily issue only against parties to the covenant or their privies, and one who is in no sense a party cannot properly be restrained from carrying on the competing business, though he may properly be restrained from aiding the covenanter in violating the covenant, from employing the covenanter in a way involving breach of the covenant, or from engaging in a competing business in partnership with or as agent or employee of the covenanter.

2. Injunction ⇐61(2)

Where a contract agreeing not to engage in a competing business is valid, the court may enjoin the party allegedly violating the terms of the contract not only from violating the terms of the contract but also from employing or combining with others to accomplish the same result.

3. Corporations ⇐1
Injunction ⇐114(2)

The rule that a stranger to a restrictive covenant not to engage in a competing business can properly be enjoined from engaging in business with a covenanter so as to result in a breach of the covenant applies to corporations, but ordinarily a corporation should not be enjoined from conducting a business independently of the covenanter unless the circumstances are such that the corporation must be regarded as the alter ego of the covenanter or a mere instrumentality by means of which the covenanter seeks to evade the covenant.

4. Torts ⇐12

An action will lie for unjustifiably inducing a breach of contract.

5. Injunction ⇐114(2)

A contracting party may enjoin a stranger to the contract from unlawfully interfering with his business or his rights under the contract where the acts complained of would result in irreparable damage for which he has no adequate remedy at law.

6. Injunction ⇐210

Generally, the power of a court over its orders and decrees in suits for injunctive relief is the same as that which it exercises over its other orders or decrees as a court of equity. Code Civ.Proc. § 526.

7. Injunction ⇐189

Where trial court enjoined defendants from violating agreement with plaintiff not to engage in rock and gravel or concrete manufacturing business within certain area and from being in codefendants' employ in erection of rock plant and from assisting them and enjoined codefendants from employing either defendant in connection with rock plant or its business and from aiding or abetting defendants to violate agreement, trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to enjoin codefendants from operating or proceeding with construction of plant and from selling or agreeing to sell any sand, rock, or gravel products therefrom, in view of evidence supporting trial court's determination that codefendants did not conspire with defendants to breach agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Arthur L. Mundo, Judge.

Action by the H. G. Fenton Material Company against Paul Challet and others to enjoin defendants from operating or constructing a certain rock and gravel plant and from selling rock or gravel therefrom. From a judgment granting plaintiff partial injunctive relief, plaintiff appeals.

GRIFFIN, Justice.

This is an action by plaintiff and appellant H. G. Fenton Material Company, a corporation, against defendants and respondents Paul Challet and Germaine Challet, husband and wife, and G. W. Billings and A. W. Billings, to enjoin respondents from operating or constructing a certain rock and gravel plant and from selling rock or gravel therefrom. Appellant, for a long time prior to the commencement of this action, had been engaged in the business of producing sand, rock and gravel for building and construction purposes and in operating several such plants in San Diego County. Some time prior to July 23, 1938, the respondents Paul Challet and Germaine Challet, under the name and style of Challet Concrete Service of San Diego, were engaged in a similar business in that county and were operating at a plant located in Otay Valley. Appellant and the Challets on July 23, 1938, entered into a written agreement appertaining to the sale of the Challet property and a ready-mix cement plant located thereon. Clause VI of the contract, signed by both Mr. and Mrs. Challet, is the important provision, as far as this appeal is concerned, and reads as follows: "Seller, as a part of his sale, sells to Buyer and the Buyer purchases from the Seller the whole of the rock, sand, concrete and materials business now and heretofore operated by Seller, including the good will and full benefit thereof and Seller hereby covenants, promises and agrees to and with the Buyer that he will not either directly or indirectly, alone or with others, enter upon or engage in the rock, sand, gravel or concrete manufacturing business within the county of San Diego or city of San Diego, in the State of California, so long as the Buyer, or any person deriving title to the good will from him, carries on a like business therein, nor in any event, within a period of ten years from this date. Seller further agrees to submit no bid or bids on outside public works, contracts or projects where in so doing he would be in direct competition with the Buyer, within San Diego County, within the period of time above specified."

After the execution of the contract the possession of the premises and plant were surrendered to the appellant and the respondents Challet retired from the business. It is apparent from the evidence that notwithstanding the covenants so made by the respondents Challet, on or about October 25, 1939, and with the intention of engaging in the rock, sand, gravel and concrete manufacturing business within the county of San Diego in competition with the appellant, they purchased for $2,000, in Mrs. Challet's name, a tract of land containing such a deposit of rock, sand and gravel. The tract was near to one of the plants of the appellant. Mrs. Challet claims that the money with which she purchased the property was her separate funds. The respondents Billings had been engaged in the trucking business in San Diego County since 1930. They claimed that for several years they had contemplated going into the sand and gravel business in order to find work for their trucks, and had bought a steam shovel and bunkers about two years prior to the commencement of the present action; that a few months prior to March, 1940, one of the respondents, A. W. Billings, heard that Mrs. Challet had purchased the gravel land in Otay Valley; that he called upon her for the purpose of negotiating a lease of the land; that no one invited him to contact her and he had not previously discussed with either Mr. or Mrs. Challet the possible use of the land; that he made a proposition to them to lease the land for the purpose of erecting a plant thereon and producing sand and gravel; that a few days later the lease was entered into; that before the execution of the lease, there was no discussion between the parties as to the employment of Paul Challet or in regard to any connection on his part with the enterprise. The lease was dated March 30, 1940, extended over a period of 99 years, and designated Germaine Challet as the lessor and Billings Truck Company, a copartnership, as the lessee. By its terms Mrs. Challet leased the property for the purpose of the lessees' taking out, producing and removing sand, gravel, rock and other products thereof, and for which the lessees agreed to pay her 7½ cents for each yard of sand, gravel, rock and other material removed from the land as rental thereof. The Challets borrowed $3,000 on certain property they owned, and Mrs. Challet loaned that sum to the respondents Billings to be used in the erection of the plant. This obligation was secured by a chattel mortgage on the plant and machinery. A note and mortgage representing that indebtedness was taken in the name of Frank Conde, the father of Mrs. Challet, which was later assigned to Mrs. Challet.

At the time of the trial of the case, the respondent Paul Challet was in the employ of the Billings, supervising the construction of the plant. The respondents all claim that no interest whatever was assigned or given to Paul Challet in the business or enterprise, and that his entire remuneration was agreed to be $40 per week; that the Billings Truck Company paid the salaries and wages of the men employed and all of the expenses of construction and for the machinery. On or about May 20, 1940, the respondents mutually agreed to cancel the lease and in lieu thereof entered into an agreement whereby Mrs. Challet should sell and transfer the leased land and deliver title to the Billings. This agreement was consummated. The consideration was a down payment of $200 and a further sum of $14,800 to be paid in amounts of $200 per month. The unpaid balance was secured by a deed of trust covering the land so sold.

A. W. Billings testified that the cost of the lease was too great, and, therefore, decided to purchase the land outright. The trial court found generally that the transaction on the part of the Challets was entered into with the intent of wrongfully profiting from their violation of the provisions of the contract which they had theretofore made with the appellant; that at the time of the commencement of the action the plant was being erected by the Billings with the intention of competing with the plaintiff in the sand, rock, gravel and concrete manufacturing business in the county of San Diego; that prior to March 30, 1940, the Billings examined and had full knowledge of the agreement between appellant and the Challets and particularly paragraph VI thereof, but specifically concluded that "no conspiracy existed between the defendants." From these facts and findings above mentioned the court concluded that the agreement between the appellant and the respondents Challet, which imposed restrictions against those particular respondents engaging in the rock, sand, gravel and concrete manufacturing business, was in all respects fair, reasonable, valid and binding; and that those defendants (Challets) were not entitled, directly or indirectly, alone or with others, to engage in such business in the county of San Diego for a period of ten years, so long as plaintiff was carrying on a similar business therein; that the appellant was entitled to a decree enjoining the respondents Challet from any violation of the provisions of clause VI of the contract and from being in the employ of the respondents Billings in the erection of the rock plant and from assisting them in any way relating to such business.

As to the respondents Billings, the court found that the appellant was entitled to an injunction enjoining them from employing either of the respondents Challet in connection with either the rock plant or its business, and from aiding or abetting such respondents in any way to violate the provisions of their contract with the appellant. Judgment was entered accordingly. The court refused to enlarge the terms of the injunction as against the respondents Billings as requested and refused, particularly, to enjoin them from marketing the products of the respondents Billings in that class of competition with the appellant which was prohibited by the terms of appellant's agreement with the respondents Challet. It is in this respect that they complain of the judgment.

Appellant argues that all of the respondents acted in concert and collusion to wrongfully and unlawfully destroy appellant's contract rights, notwithstanding the fact that the trial court concluded from the evidence that no conspiracy had been proved or established. It is rather difficult for this court to reconcile the conclusion that there was no conspiracy with the findings above quoted.

From an examination of the oral opinion of the trial court, printed in the record, it appears that appellant was denied any further relief than that given, under the impression that appellant could and should "when this plant is constructed, and when it begins to operate * * * in competition with Mr. Fenton" resort to some action in damages rather than injunction, "arising from a breach of this contract."

[1-3] The authorities of the various states are not uniform on the subject but it is the general rule that injunction will ordinarily issue only against parties to the agreement or those in privity with them. One who is in no sense a party to the covenant cannot properly be restrained from carrying on such competing business although he may properly be restrained from aiding the covenanter in violating the covenant or from employing the covenanter in such a way as would involve a breach of the covenant or from engaging in a competing business, in partnership with, or as an agent or employee of the seller. The court may, where the contract is valid, enjoin the party complained of not only from violating its terms but also from employing or combining with others to accomplish the same result. The rule that a stranger to a restrictive covenant can properly be enjoined from engaging in business with a covenanter so as to result in a breach of the covenant applies to corporations. Ordinarily, however, the corporation should not be enjoined from conducting a business independently of the covenanter, unless the circumstances are such that the corporation is to be regarded as the alter ego of the covenanter or a mere instrumentality by means of which the covenanter seeks to evade the agreement. 28 Am.Jur. 298, sec. 104.

[4, 5] It has recently been held that in California an action will lie for unjustifiably inducing a breach of contract (Imperial Ice Co. v. Rossier, 18 Cal.2d 33, 112 P. 2d 631), and that a contracting party may enjoin a stranger to the contract from unlawfully interfering with his business or his rights under the contract where the acts complained of would result in irreparable damage for which he has no adequate remedy at law. California Grape Control Board, Ltd., v. California Produce Corporation, Ltd., 4 Cal.App.2d 242, 40 P.2d 846.

Assuming without deciding that respondents Billings, not being parties to the contract of sale of the good will of a business, may also be enjoined against competitive operation of the business in question (Fleckenstein Bros. Co. v. Fleckenstein, 66 N.J.Eq. 252, 57 A. 1025, 1028; Thompson v. Andrus, 73 Mich. 551, 41 N. W. 683, 686), we have only the question before us to determine on this appeal whether, under the evidence, the trial court was justified in denying appellant the additional relief sought as against the respondents Billings, i. e., (1) from operating or proceeding further with the construction of the plant; (2) selling or agreeing to sell any sand, rock or gravel products therefrom.

Section 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides when an injunction may be granted and when an injunction cannot be granted.

[6] As a general rule, the power of a court over its orders and decrees in injunction is the same as that which it, as a court of equity, exercises over its other orders or decrees. De Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 157; 28 Am.Jur., page 486, sec. 315; Wholesale Tobacco Dealers Bureau v. National Candy & Tobacco Co., 11 Cal.2d 634, 662, 82 P.2d 3, 118 A.L.R. 486; Vesper v. Forest Lawn Cemetery Ass'n, 20 Cal. App.2d 157, 67 P.2d 368; Willis v. Lauridson, 161 Cal. 106, 118 P. 530.

In Slade v. Sullivan, 17 Cal. 102, the trial court denied an application for injunctive relief. In upholding that order the Supreme Court said: "We do not see upon what ground we could interfere with the decision in this case. The prayer for an injunction was addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and we cannot perceive that there was any abuse of discretion in refusing to grant it. * * * It does not appear that any of the injuries, for which, if committed, he will be entitled to recover, may not be compensated in damages, and under the circumstances, we cannot undertake to say that an injunction was improperly refused."

[7] While the evidence in this case might well support an opposite conclusion, it cannot be said that the failure of the trial court to include as a part of the injunctive decree the additional relief sought was an abuse of discretion, especially as there is evidence supporting the specific determination that G. W. and A. W. Billings did not conspire with their codefendants to breach the contract.

FISCHER et al. v. HENDLER.

Civ. 12000.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 27, 1942.

1. Easements ⇐16

At common law where owner of two tenements sells one the purchaser takes the tenement with all of benefits that appear at time of sale to belong to it as between it and the property which vendor retains.

2. Easements ⇐16

The elements necessary to create an "easement by implied grant" are a separation of the title, before separation takes place the use which gives rise to easement must be so long continued and so obvious as to show that it was intended to be permanent, and easement must be reasonably necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of land granted. Civ.Code, § 1104.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Easement by Implied Grant".

3. Easements ⇐36(1)

In action by purchasers of building against vendor's grantor as owner of adjacent lot to restrain interference with easement by implied grant for passage of surface waters through opening in cement curb, purchasers were not required to show that drain was the only method possible to carry excess water from their land or that because of such absolute necessity grantor must have been deemed to have intended to include the right of way in the grant, but the showing that drain was reasonably necessary for beneficial use of the land granted was sufficient. Civ.Code, § 1104.

4. Easements ⇐36(3)

Evidence that grantor owned two adjacent lots and graded and cemented the back yard of one so that surface and rainwater would flow through the opening in curbing onto the adjacent lot, that drainage system was used continuously by the grantor for five years prior to separation of title and was used for two and a half years thereafter by grantee's transferees, and that when grantor closed the opening the water accumulated in other lot, causing the yard and its facilities to become less accessible to ordinary use, established an "easement by implied grant" in favor of transferees. Civ.Code, § 1104.

5. Easements ⇐15

The rule of easements created by implied grant applies to city lots as well as to rural property. Civ.Code, § 1104.

6. Damages ⇐62(1)

One suffering injury by carelessness of another must go to some trouble to avoid or lessen the damage if a temporary expedient or slight expense will do so, but a person who is suffering from a continuous nuisance need not take active measures involving considerable expense which may or may not be practical as a means of minimizing the damage.

7. Damages ⇐62(3)

A reasonable amount of compensation for damages resulting from obstruction of easement by implied grant for drainage of surface water onto adjacent lot was not improperly awarded on ground that plaintiffs neglected to minimize the damage by removing the standing water, where plaintiffs reopened the hole in cement curb at various times in attempt to avoid damage done by the standing water, and plaintiffs were not required to incur the considerable expense of removing the cement and changing the grade of the yard so that excess water would drain off onto street.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Action by Samuel Fischer and others against Victoria Hendler for an injunction to restrain defendant from interfering with an easement and to recover damages. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Sidney Sampson and Sidney J. Unickel, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cecil Vinnicof, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

Defendant appeals from a judgment declaring plaintiffs to be the owners of an easement created by implied grant, enjoining her from interfering with the use of the easement and awarding damages in favor of plaintiffs in the sum of $165 plus costs.

The facts of the case are undisputed and appear from the stipulation to be as follows: In July, 1932, defendant owned two adjoining parcels of real property situated in the city of Los Angeles and designated as lots 18 and 19 of block "K" of the Forest Heights Tract. She constructed a four-unit dwelling on lot 18 and a four-car garage at the rear of the same lot. The remainder of the backyard was graded and cemented in such a way that it sloped down toward a small opening in a cement curb and wooden fence which had been erected on the boundary line between the two pieces of property; the yard was constructed by defendant in this manner so that rain and excess surface waters would flow from lot 18 onto lot 19. In March, 1937, defendant sold lot 18, together with the improvements thereon, to a purchaser who immediately transferred the property to plaintiffs. At all times during the aforementioned conveyances the cement surface of the backyard of lot 18 and the hole in the curb remained open and visible. For the succeeding two and one-half years defendant allowed the surface waters from lot 18 to drain through the opening onto lot 19 which she had retained, but in September, 1939, defendant closed the opening in the curb thus preventing the passage of water from plaintiffs' property onto her lot. This action caused the surface waters to flood the four-car garage and fence on lot 18. Plaintiffs thereafter opened the hole in the cement curb, and at various intervals between September, 1939, and February, 1941, the parties were engaged in reclosing and reopening the hole. Finally in the latter month plaintiffs instituted the present action for an injunction and for damages in the sum of $300. The court decreed that plaintiffs were the owners of an easement created by implied grant for the passage of all surface waters through the opening. The judgment entered in favor of plaintiffs restrained defendant from obstructing or closing the opening in the curb, ordered her to open the passageway and to permit the passage of surface waters from lot 18 onto lot 19 and awarded plaintiffs damages in the sum of $165 plus costs. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

The basis for the judgment entered by the trial court was its conclusion that respondents were the "owners of an easement created by implied grant for the passage of all surface waters through an opening approximately eight inches wide and six inches high in a cement curb and wooden fence erected on the border of Lot 18. * * *" Appellant argues that no easement was created by implied grant because it was not necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property, and therefore the conclusion of the lower court was erroneous.

[1] Subsequent to 1932 when appellant owned both parcels of property she allowed the surface and rain waters to drain from lot 18, the dominant estate, to lot 19, the servient estate, through the opening in the curb which she had constructed. In 1937, she sold the dominant estate and retained the servient estate. The common-law rule was to the effect that where the owner of two tenements sells one of them the purchaser takes the tenement with all of the benefits that appear at the time of the sale to belong to it as beween it and the property which the vendor retains. 9 Cal.Jur. 957, and cases cited therein. This rule is embodied in section 1104 of the Civil Code which provides:

"A transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and creates in favor thereof an easement to use other real property of the person whose estate is transferred in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred, for the benefit thereof, at the time when the transfer was agreed upon or completed."

[2, 3] Under the code section the courts of this state have set forth certain elements necessary to create an easement by implied grant. The following things are required: (1) A separation of the title; (2) before the separation takes place the use which gives rise to the easement shall have been so long continued and so obvious as to show that it was intended to be permanent; and (3) the easement shall be reasonably necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land granted. Beem v. Reichman, 36 Cal.App. 258, 263 and 264, 171 P. 972; Grimmesey v. Kirtlan, 93 Cal.App. 658, 664, 270 P. 243; 9 Cal. Jur. 958. We are referring here to an easement implied in the grant of severance of the dominant and servient estates as outlined in section 1104 of the Civil Code, as distinguished from a necessary easement, or "way of necessity." As to the former the authorities uniformly hold to the three essentials above noted when that question has been directly presented. There is little, if any, difference between the expression "reasonably necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land granted" and the expression found in the code section "for the benefit thereof." In the case here the respondents successfully proved that the easement claimed was "reasonably necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land granted" and thus met the code requirement that it was "for the benefit thereof." They were not required to show that the drain was the only method possible to carry excess water from their land, or that, because of such absolute necessity, the grantor must have been deemed to have intended to include the right of way in the grant. Relying upon the showing of the apparent and obvious use of the drain for a long period of time preceding the severance, they met the terms of the statute by the proof that it was "reasonably" necessary (not absolutely necessary, nor merely convenient) for the beneficial use of the land granted. The distinction between an easement by implication arising out of apparent and continued use, and an easement by necessity is clearly shown in 17 Am.Jur. 948, 959; 28 C.J.S., Easements, §§ 33, 34, pp. 691, 695; 9 Cal.Jur. 957, 967–969.

[4] The undisputed facts of the instant case show that all of these required elements are present. (1) Appellant owned both lots until 1937 when she separated title by transferring lot 18 to respondents' predecessor in interest. (2) In 1932 appellant graded and cemented the backyard of lot 18 so that the surface and rain water would flow through the opening in the curbing onto lot 19. This construction was of a permanent character and the drainage system was used continuously by appellant for five years prior to the separation of title. Such long continued use plus the fact that the grading and the opening in the curb were obvious and visible at all times indicates unquestionably appellant's intention that it should be permanent. (3) The drainage system involved had been used for a period of seven and one-half years, and the evidence shows that when appellant closed the opening in the curb the water accumulated in the backyard of lot 18 thereby causing the yard and its facilities to become less accessible to ordinary use. We must conclude, therefore, that the easement was necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the parcel sold in the form which it assumed at the time of the transfer. Grimmesey v. Kirtlan, supra.

[5] Appellant's argument that the owner of a city lot is not required to accept surface or waste waters from the adjoining property is not applicable. The rule of easements created by implied grant applies to city lots as well as to rural property. A. Hamburger & Sons, Inc., v. Lemboeck, 20 Cal.App.2d 565, 67 P.2d 380. In view of the evidence discussed above it is clear that the purchaser took the property with the benefits that appeared at the time of the sale to belong to it as between it and the lot which the vendor retained. (Jersey Farm Company v. Atlanta Realty Company, 164 Cal. 412, 129 P. 593), and that the trial court did not err in concluding that respondents were the owners of an easement created by implied grant.

[6, 7] Appellant also argues that the trial court erred in allowing respondents damages in view of the fact that they neglected to fulfill their duty to minimize the damage by removing the standing water. We cannot agree with this contention. One who suffers injury by the carelessness of another must go to some trouble to avoid or lessen the damage if a temporary expedient or slight expense will do so, but a person who is suffering from a continuous nuisance is not compelled to take active measures involving considerable expense which may or may not be practical as a means of minimizing the damage. Joerger v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 207 Cal. 8, 28, 276 P. 1017. In view of this rule respondents fulfilled their duty when they reopened the hole in the curb at various times in an attempt to avoid the damage done by the standing water. They could not be expected to incur the considerable expense of removing the cement and changing the grade of the yard so that the excess water would drain off onto the street. The trial court did not commit error, therefore, in awarding respondents a reasonable amount of compensation for the damages which they suffered as a result of the actions of appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

LISERANY et al. v. OVALLE et al.

Civ. 11843.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 26, 1942.

1. Judgment ⇐199(3)

If evidence produced would reasonably support verdict of jury, it is error to grant a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto.

2. Wills ⇐55(6)

Testimony that testator was practically always drunk when observed by witnesses prior to date of execution of will, and that in witnesses' opinion testator was not of sound mind when in such condition, was not sufficient to support an inference that testator was either drunk or lacked testamentary capacity when he executed will.

3. Wills ⇐52(1)

In absence of proof that intemperate use of liquor by testator has actually destroyed testamentary capacity, no presumption will be indulged, however long continued the habit is shown to have been, that testamentary capacity has thus been destroyed.

4. Wills ⇐55(1)

In will contest, evidence that testator was sober and of sound mind when will was made could not be overcome by proof offered as to testator's condition at a previous time, and such proof, even in absence of evidence of competency, would not have been sufficient to overcome legal presumption that testator was competent when will was executed.

5. Wills ⇐52(3)

"Insanity" exists as a matter of law, with respect to mental capacity to execute a will, only from the time it is shown to exist, and proof of subsequent insanity will not create or carry a presumption of its past existence.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Insanity".

6. Wills ⇐55(1)

In will contest, evidence did not support verdict that testator was not of sound and disposing mind when will was executed.

7. Wills ⇐166(1)

In will contest, evidence that beneficiaries under will, who were not related to testator, had become testator's tenants and had prepared meals for testator and kept testator's flat clean and that testator had taken beneficiaries for rides in his automobile would not have supported a finding of "undue influence".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Undue Influence".

8. Wills ⇐166(12)

To establish "undue influence" with respect to the execution of a will, evidence must be produced that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act, but such evidence itself need not be direct.

9. Wills ⇐166(12)

"Undue influence" with respect to the execution of a will may be established by circumstantial evidence, but evidence must do more than raise a suspicion, and it must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with claim that will was spontaneous act of alleged testator.

10. Wills ⇐166(1)

In action to set aside a will on ground of undue influence, it is necessary to show that the influence was such as, in effect, to destroy testator's free agency and substitute for his own another person's will.

11. Wills ⇐155(1)

Mere general influence, however strong and controlling, not bearing upon the testamentary act, is not sufficient to establish "undue influence", which must be influence used directly to procure will and must amount to coercion destroying free agency of testator.

12. Wills ⇐155(1)

A mere opportunity to influence testator's mind, even coupled with an interest or a motive to do so, is not sufficient to establish "undue influence".

13. Wills ⇐163(2)

Even if evidence in a will contest had shown the existence of a confidential relationship between testator and beneficiaries under will, such fact would not, standing alone, have shifted the burden to proponents to show a lack of undue influence.

14. Wills ⇐163(2)

A presumption of undue influence arises from proof of the exercise of a confidential relation between testator and a beneficiary, coupled with activity on beneficiary's part in preparation of will, but the confidential relation alone is not sufficient to show "undue influence".

15. Wills ⇐82

A will giving testator's entire estate to beneficiaries who were not related to testator could not be attacked by testator's collateral relatives on ground that will was unnatural in omitting to provide for them, especially where relatives had not seen testator for many years.

16. Wills ⇐166(1)

That a will was prepared from directions given by testator to his attorney when no one else was present was strong evidence that will was testator's voluntary act.

Will contest proceedings in the matter of the estate of Alvin W. Shields, deceased, between Eleanor Liserany and others, contestants, and Adeline Ovalle and others, proponents. DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the contestants of the decedent's will from a judgment of nonsuit granted by the trial court on the issue of undue influence and a judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the issue of the unsoundness of mind of the testator at the time of the execution of the will.

The contestants are first cousins of the testator and his nearest living relatives. No provision was made for any of them in the will, the testator leaving his entire estate to the respondents Ovalle who are husband and wife and not related to the testator.

The will was executed on February 28, 1936. It was prepared by Alfred Voyce, an attorney at law, from directions given to Voyce a few days before by the testator when Voyce called upon the testator at his home where the testator was recovering from a serious attack of chronic bronchitis. Voyce was at that time the attorney for the testator in the administration of the estate of his deceased wife, and no one else was present at the time that the instructions were given for the preparation of his will. It may be remarked in this connection that while Voyce subsequently became one of the attorneys for the Ovalles as proponents of the will, there is not a scintilla of evidence that he was attorney for the Ovalles in any matter at the time of the execution of the will. He had at that time only met them casually, having been introduced to them by the testator a short time before. This is mentioned because of the claim advanced by appellants in their brief that the will was prepared by the Ovalles' attorney. The claim finds no support in the evidence and need not be further mentioned.

Appellants on the issue of the lack of testamentary capacity rely upon the evidence of Catherine Spencer and John Alvin Spencer her son as to the mental condition of the testator at a time prior to the execution of the will and upon the admitted insanity of the testator commencing about the month of August, 1936, as a result of which the testator was first confined in the Park Sanitarium, a private hospital for the treatment of nervous and mental cases, and later adjudged insane and committed to a state hospital where he remained until the time of his death, and upon the evidence of Dr. Gobar, a witness called by the proponents, as to the condition of the testator commencing in June, 1936, when Dr. Gobar was first called to attend him.

The evidence of the witnesses Spencer is to the effect that for a number of years prior to 1936 the testator had been a habitual drunkard, that at the time of his wife's death on August 25, 1935, he had been drunk and his house was filthy and full of fleas, that he remained so drunk that he could not attend his wife's funeral; that thereafter for a period of a week John Alvin Spencer took the testator for rides in his automobile, that the testator was always drunk on these occasions and had hallucinations that cars were coming up behind them when no cars were there, that Spencer was driving too close to the curb when such was not the fact and that he was endangering the safety of pedestrians when no pedestrians were present; that one night during this period the testator came to the Spencers' home, he was drunk and said he was afraid of the dark and they allowed him to spend the night with them; that during this period he was dishevelled, dirty, didn't shave and didn't take care of himself; he was a changed man. John Alvin Spencer did not see the testator after August or September, 1935. During the period when John Alvin Spencer saw the testator after his wife's death he was always drunk or partially drunk, and during that period it was his opinion that he was not of sound mind.

Catherine Spencer's observation of the testator extended over a longer period of time. In 1933 when her husband died the testator was too drunk to go to his funeral, and for many months before he had been under the influence of liquor; about that time a change came over him and he attended to very little business; since 1933 the use of intoxicating liquors affected Mr. Shields mentally; he wandered around the streets much dishevelled, asking people for money. After his wife's death this witness saw the testator every other day or so for two months; his house was in a terrible condition; most of the time he was under the influence of liquor; when she spoke to him everything was so confused by him that she was hardly able to know what he was talking about; one day he was telling her about people coming in the back way, how cats had been bothering him getting in the window. Her visits continued until about December, 1935, and once in January, 1936, she saw the testator walking along the street toward a place where he used to buy liquor. He had pajamas on, one leg rolled up, bedroom slippers and an overcoat. It was her opinion that he was insane "because he was continuously under the influence of liquor" and of the other facts to which she had testified.

Dr. Gobar's testimony is here referred to because, while he was called as a witness for proponents, appellants rely on his testimony on this appeal to argue that it supports an inference that the testator was suffering from senile dementia at and prior to the date of the execution of his will. Dr. Gobar was called to treat the testator in June of 1936. He was suffering from sclerosis of the liver and had fluid in the abdominal cavity or dropsy. He was very weak and not competent to transact any business when the doctor first saw him because of his extreme illness. He made a good recovery and was sitting up part time in two or three weeks. He told the doctor that he had been drinking wine considerably before his sickness began. From the doctor's observation he testified that after the first stage of the testator's illness had passed he was of sound mind until about the middle of August, at which time he began seeing things, talked to his father, mother, brother and aunt, all long dead, as if they were present. At that time he was suffering from senile dementia which is a depreciation of the brain tissue brought on in his case by sclerosis of the liver and arteriosclerosis. These are all progressive diseases which develop over a considerable period of time. The depreciation of the brain tissue may, however, in a terminal case develop very rapidly; "the brain holds up to a certain point and then through lack of nutrition it suddenly gives way * * * a case of this character goes a certain period, and then there is a sudden breakdown as a result of the groundwork having been laid before * * * and sooner or later some organ has to give. * * * In this case it happened to be the brain."

[1] We approach the consideration of the effect of this evidence in view of the established rule that if the evidence produced would reasonably support the verdict of the jury it is error to grant a motion for a judgment non obstante. In re Estate of Nelson, 134 Cal.App. 561, 25 P.2d 871; In re Estate of Arnold, 16 Cal.2d 573, 107 P.2d 25.

[2] Taking the evidence of the witnesses Spencer as to the condition of the testator prior to the date of the execution of the will, it is to be observed that its effect was that the testator during the periods covered by their testimony was practically always drunk when they had seen him and when in that condition he was in their opinion not of sound mind. This was not enough to support an inference that at the later time when he executed his will he was either drunk or lacked testamentary capacity. In re Estate of Fisher, 202 Cal. 205, 259 P. 755; In re Estate of Putnam, 1 Cal.2d 162, 34 P.2d 148; In re Estate of Arnold, supra; In re Estate of Garvey, 38 Cal.App.2d 449, 101 P.2d 551.

It was said in Re Estate of Fisher, supra, 202 Cal. at page 212, 259 P. at page 758: "Proof that decedent was 'incompetent' or 'insane' when so intoxicated that it was necessary to arrest him or upon occasions when, in the words of the witness, he 'only needed another drink to put him down and out,' is entirely insufficient to show that decedent never enjoyed lucid intervals during which he was competent to execute a will. The witness himself testified that the decedent was not released from jail until sober and that he was not insane when sober."

In connection with the sentence last quoted, it is to be remarked that on cross-examination the witness Catherine Spencer testified that she was in court on the day that the testator was appointed administrator of his wife's estate, she saw him sworn and examined, and he was not intoxicated that day, he was sober.

[3] It is likewise said in Re Estate of Fisher, supra, 202 Cal. at page 209, 259 P. at page 757: "In the absence of proof that the intemperate use has actually destroyed testamentary capacity, no presumption will be indulged, however long continued the habit is shown to have been, that it has thus been destroyed." And again on page 210 of 202 Cal., on page 757 of 259 P.: "It [proof of a commitment for inebriacy] is not, however, even prima facie evidence that the use of alcoholic liquors has caused a permanent impairment of the mental faculties and a loss of self-control which persists after the temporary effects of the liquor have passed away, nor will it be presumed from the fact that the subject of the commitment was a victim of the liquor habit at the time of the commitment that such habit persisted thereafter. It is only in those cases where the mental disease has become settled that the mental disorder is presumed to continue."

In Re Estate of Arnold, supra, a much stronger case was presented for the contestant. There a physician who had treated the testator for a period of six years for being drunk over 200 times testified that when he saw him during that period he was always drunk, that he was suffering from chronic alcholism and that he was of unsound mind. The court said of this testimony at page 585 of 16 Cal.2d, at page 31 of 107 P.2d: "He referred to Arnold drunk and not Arnold sober. This evidence falls far short of that required to prove that Arnold was mentally incompetent to make a valid will. In fact it is no evidence of the unsoundness of mind of a sober individual."

[4] The evidence was that when the testator made this will he had not had a drink for several weeks, that he was sober and of sound mind. In view of the rules laid down by the cases cited, including those quoted from supra, this evidence of the testator's competency not only could not be overcome by the proof offered as to the testator's condition at a previous period, but even in the absence of such evidence of competency it would not have been sufficient to overcome the legal presumption that he was competent at the time that he executed his will.

[5] Of the testimony of testator's condition after he executed his will appellants attempt to seize upon an isolated portion of Dr. Gobar's testimony, that senile dementia and the other inducing ailments from which the testator suffered are progressive and the result of physical changes that take place over a considerable period of time, to argue that the testator must have been incompetent on February 28, 1936, at the time when his will was executed. This ignores the rest of Dr. Gobar's testimony completely. It will not do to wrench a fragment of the testimony from its context. Dr. Gobar's testimony above recited was that the testator was competent from a week or ten days after he first saw him to some time in August when the cumulative effects of his condition suddenly culminated in his becoming insane. "Insanity exists as a matter of law only from the time it is shown to exist and proof of subsequent insanity will not create nor carry a presumption of its past existence." In re Estate of Perkins, 195 Cal. 699, 235 P. 45, 46; In re Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 235, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann.Cas. 795; In re Estate of Finkler, 3 Cal.2d 584, 595, 596, 46 P.2d 149.

[6] It was not proved by any evidence that the testator when sober lacked testamentary capacity at any time prior to the date of the execution of his will, the only evidence on the subject was that at the time of its execution he possessed testamentary capacity and continued to possess it, except for a brief temporary incapacity caused by the extreme weakness brought on by a severe illness in June, 1936, until at least some time in August of that year.

There being no evidence to support the jury's verdict that the testator was not of sound and disposing mind at the time the will was executed, the judgment notwithstanding, the verdict must be affirmed.

[7-12] On the issue of undue influence it was shown that the Ovalles became tenants of the testator in September, 1935. They occupied the upper flat and the testator occupied the lower one in a building owned by the testator. They felt sorry for the testator and cleaned up his flat which was very dirty, kept it clean thereafter and used to prepare some of his meals. The testator took them for rides in his automobile. The Ovalles were not related to the testator and he had never known them before they rented his flat. Neither of the Ovalles was present when the testator directed Voyce to prepare the will nor when it was executed. Shields did not tell them that the will had been executed in their favor until the May following its execution. A cousin of Mrs. Ovalle was a witness to the will. Her testimony was that she was paying a friendly visit to the testator because he had been ill and he asked her to act as a witness to the will. There is nothing in this evidence to support a finding of undue influence.

"Evidence must be produced that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act, but this evidence itself need not be direct. Circumstantial evidence is sufficient. It must, however, do more than raise a suspicion. It must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testator." In re McDevitt's Estate, 95 Cal. 17, 33, 30 P. 101, 106; In re Estate of Leahy, 5 Cal.2d 301, 304, 54 P.2d 704.

"In an action to set aside a will of a deceased person on the ground of undue influence, it is necessary to show that the influence was such as, in effect, to destroy the testator's free agency and substitute for his own another person's will. [In re] Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 563, 69 P. 294. Evidence must be produced that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act. In re McDevitt's Estate, 95 Cal. 17, 33, 30 P. 101. Mere general influence, however strong and controlling, not to bear upon the testamentary act, is not enough; it must be influence used directly to procure the will, and must amount to coercion destroying free agency on the part of the testator. [In re] Estate of Keegan, 139 Cal. 123, 127, 72 P. 828. It is further held that mere opportunity to influence the mind of the testator, even coupled with an interest or a motive to do so, is not sufficient. [In re] Estate of Easton, 140 Cal.App. 367, 371, 35 P.2d 614." In re Estate of Arnold, supra, 16 Cal.2d page 577, 107 P.2d page 27.

[13, 14] It is claimed, however, that the evidence showed that the Ovalles stood in a confidential relationship to the testator and this shifted the burden to them to show a lack of undue influence. We do not agree that such a confidential relationship was shown but conceding that it was this did not, standing alone, shift the burden to the proponents.

"In the Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 381, 384, 168 P. 561, 563, we find the applicable rule stated in the following concise language: 'As suggested in [Matter of] Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 257, 261, 104 P. (6), 8, a "presumption of undue influence" arises from proof of the exercise of a confidential relation between the testator and such a beneficiary, "coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will." The confidential relation alone is not sufficient. There must be activity on the part of the beneficiary in the matter of the preparation of the will'." In re Estate of Arnold, supra, 16 Cal.2d page 581, 107 P.2d page 29.

[15] The claim that the will was unnatural in omitting to provide for contestants is equally unfounded. None of them had seen the testator since 1920 when they met at the funeral of a relative except for two or three chance meetings on the streets of San Francisco. They practically had lost all contact with one another for a great many years. They were all collateral relatives and not in any legal sense the natural recipients of the testator's bounty. In re Estate of McDonnell, 109 Cal.App. 577, 293 P. 651; In re Estate of Nolan, 25 Cal.App.2d 738, 742, 78 P.2d 456; In re Estate of Finkler, supra, 3 Cal.2d pages 597, 598, 46 P.2d 149; In re Estate of Leahy, supra, 5 Cal.2d page 303, 54 P.2d 704.

[16] The fact that the will was prepared from directions given by the testator to his attorney when no one else was present is very strong evidence that it was the testator's voluntary act. In re Estate of Unger, 188 Cal. 714, 206 P. 1003; 26 Cal.Jur. 728.

Civ. 13238.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 27, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 27, 1942.

1. Execution ⇐73

For issuance of a writ of execution on a judgment more than five years after it was entered, judgment creditor need not file an affidavit showing reasons for his failure to have caused to be issued an execution within five years after entry of the judgment before it became outlawed by limitation. Code Civ.Proc. § 336, subd. 1; §§ 681, 685.

2. Execution ⇐73

Under statute relating to enforcement of judgment after lapse of five years from date of its entry by leave of court upon motion, the failure of judgment creditor to file an affidavit stating reasons for his not having caused to be issued an execution within the period of five years after entry of judgment does not deprive trial court of power to order the issuance of a writ of execution after five years have elapsed from date of entry of judgment, but the failure to file such an affidavit will justify denying the application for a writ of execution. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 681, 685.

3. Execution ⇐73

That judgment debtor has had property subject to execution during five years following entry of judgment is not a ground for refusal of order for issuance of a writ of execution pursuant to statute relating to enforcement of judgment after lapse of five years from date of its entry by leave of court upon motion. Code Civ.Proc. § 685.

4. Execution ⇐73

The mere lapse of time is not a sufficient reason for denying an order for issuance of a writ of execution pursuant to statute relating to enforcement of judgment after lapse of five years from date of its entry by leave of court upon motion. Code Civ.Proc. § 685.

5. Execution ⇐75

Where judgment creditor for 7½ years, during portion of which time judgment debtor possessed property upon which execution might have been levied, failed to take any steps to collect the judgment and during such intervening period, judgment debtor and his wife commingled their community property with wife's separate property and incurred personal indebtedness in connection with such property, but delay of judgment creditor operated in favor of judgment debtor rather than to his detriment, the issuance of a writ of execution on such judgment was not an abuse of discretion. Code Civ.Proc. § 685.

6. Appeal and error ⇐843(1)

Where appellant presented a stipulation to the appellate court waiving a question presented in prior appeal wherein a rehearing was granted, the appellate court would not discuss such question.

McCOMB, Justice.

From an order directing that an execution issue pursuant to section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, more than five years after the entry of judgment, defendant John C. Brouwer appeals. The order was granted upon the motion of Sally Williams, the assignee of a money judgment in favor of plaintiff.

So far as material here these are the essential facts:

January 10, 1929, the appealing defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt. June 27, 1929, plaintiff obtained a default judgment against appealing defendant in the sum of $2,082.22, together with costs amounting to the sum of $22. Thereafter partial payments in the sums of $485.21 and $165.18 were made upon the judgment. December 16, 1932, the judgment was assigned to Sally Williams. On the same day a writ of execution was issued and caused to be levied upon the property of John C. Brouwer, the appealing defendant. Thereafter Mr. Brouwer applied to this court for a writ of mandate requiring the superior court to quash the writ of execution which had been issued. This court issued such an order and also ordered the superior court "to desist from all attempt to enforce" the judgment "against petitioner John C. Brouwer until he is finally either granted or denied a discharge as a bankrupt in the bankruptcy proceeding now pending, and until the proper presentation of proof of such final grant or denial to" the superior court. (Brouwer v. Superior Court, 130 Cal.App. 163, 168, 19 P.2d 834.)

February 6, 1933, a special master heard the application of appealing defendant for his discharge in bankruptcy and made and filed a report recommending that such application be denied. His report contained the following findings:

"(1) That said bankrupt committed an offense punishable by imprisonment, as provided by said Bankruptcy Act, in that said bankrupt made a false oath and rendered a false account in and in relation to this proceeding in bankruptcy, in that he knowingly and fraudulently omitted from schedule B and from his schedules in bankruptcy, a statement of his ownership of an equitable interest owned by him in said Chrysler automobile.

"(2) That said bankrupt committed an offense punishable by imprisonment, as provided by said Bankruptcy Act, in that the bankrupt knowingly and fraudulently concealed from M. L. Rabbitt, his trustee in bankruptcy, duly appointed on the 31st day of January, 1929, and duly qualified on the 4th day of February, 1929, his said equitable interest in said Chrysler automobile, and further find that on examination of said bankrupt, he stated that he did not own any interest in said automobile and continued to so make said claim for some considerable time after the qualification of said trustee herein.

"(3) That said bankrupt committed an offense punishable by imprisonment, as provided in said Bankruptcy Act, in that said bankrupt knowingly and fraudulently concealed from his trustee in bankruptcy, duly appointed on the 31st day of January, 1929, and duly qualified on the 4th day of February, 1929, the sum of $600.00, and in this respect, that at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy herein, and at the time of the adjudication herein, said bankrupt was the owner of the sum of $600.00, and that he knowingly and fraudulently failed to list same in the schedule of his assets and failed to turn the same over to his said trustee in bankruptcy for some considerable time after the qualification of said trustee, and further find that in an examination in open court he stated that he did not have any money or property other than listed in his schedules."

This report was confirmed on February 27, 1933, by the United States District Court, and, no appeal having been taken therefrom, the order became final and a copy of the order was filed in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County May 19, 1933.

September 30, 1940, plaintiff's assignee instituted the present proceeding, which resulted in the trial court's making an order on March 5, 1941, directing the issuance of a writ of execution against the property of the appealing defendant.

It is necessary for us to determine two questions, which will be stated and answer hereunder seriatim.

[1] First: Is it a prerequisite for an order for the issuance of a writ of execution pursuant to the provisions of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the judgment creditor file an affidavit showing reasons for his failure to proceed under section 681 of the Code of Civil Procedure before the judgment became outlawed by the limitation in subdivision

1, section 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure?

This question must be answered in the negative. Section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1933 reads as follows:

"In all cases the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, and after due notice to the judgment debtor accompanied by an affidavit or affidavits setting forth the reasons for failure to proceed in compliance with the provisions of section 681 of this code. The failure to set forth such reasons as shall, in the discretion of the court, be sufficient, shall be ground for the denial of the motion." (Italics added.)

[2] It is the law in California that the italicized portion of the foregoing provision of the Code of Civil Procedure means that the failure of the judgment creditor to file an affidavit setting forth the reasons why he has not proceeded in compliance with the provisions of section 681 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that is, his not having caused to be issued an execution within the period of five years after the entry of judgment, does not deprive the trial court of power to order the issuance of a writ of execution after five years has elapsed from the date of the entry of judgment, but that the failure to file such an affidavit will constitute a valid reason for denying the application for a writ of execution. (Peers v. Stoll, 32 Cal.App. 2d 511, 513, 90 P.2d 119 (a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court in this case); McClelland v. Shaw, 23 Cal.App.2d 107, 110, 72 P.2d 225, et seq.; see, also, Passow v. Bell, 27 Cal.App.2d 360, 361, 81 P.2d 224.)

The majority opinion in Williams v. Goodin, 17 Cal.App.2d 62, 61 P.2d 507, does not state a contrary rule. In Williams v. Goodin the trial court had denied a motion for the issuance of a writ of execution after more than five years had elapsed from the date of the entry of the judgment. Therefore, if we assume that in such case there was no showing by the judgment creditor of the reason for his failure to have a writ of execution sooner issued, the trial court's action was merely in accordance with the provisions of section 685, supra, to the effect that the failure to file a proper affidavit "setting forth the reasons for failure to proceed in compliance with the provisions of section 681" of the Code of Civil Procedure, shall constitute sufficient reason for the denial of the application for a writ of execution.

Second: Did the trial court abuse its discretion in ordering the issuance of a writ of execution, where the evidence disclosed that the judgment creditor for seven and one-half years failed to take any steps to collect the judgment, during which time the appealing defendant and his wife co-mingled their community property with the wife's separate property and incurred a personal indebtedness amounting to $17,000 in connection with such property?

[3, 4] This question must also be answered in the negative and is governed by the following pertinent rules of law:

(1) That the judgment debtor has had property subject to execution during the five-year period following the entry of judgment is not a ground for refusal of an order for the issuance of a writ of execution pursuant to the provisions of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (McClelland v. Shaw, 23 Cal.App.2d 107, 113, 72 P.2d 225.)

(2) The mere lapse of time is not a sufficient reason for denying an order for the issuance of a writ of execution pursuant to section 685, supra (McClelland v. Shaw, supra, 23 Cal.App.2d page 111, 72 P.2d 225).

[5] The facts in the instant case disclose that the judgment creditor allowed seven and one-half years to pass, during a portion of which time the judgment debtor possessed property upon which an execution might have been levied. Under the rules above stated it is clear that these facts alone would not have justified the trial court in denying plaintiff's assignee an order under the provisions of section 685, supra. So far as appears from the record, the delay upon the judgment creditor's part operated in favor of appealing defendant rather than to his detriment.

[6] Since the appealing defendant has presented a stipulation in this court waiving the question presented in Butcher v. Brouwer, 48 Cal.App.2d 650, 120 P.2d 506, 510, in which case we granted a rehearing, the matter there considered is not discussed in this opinion.

For the foregoing reasons the order is affirmed.

VOJKOVICH v. URSICH et al.

Civ. 13225.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 22, 1942.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 16, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 19, 1942.

1. Seamen ⇐29(5)

Plaintiff having elected to proceed under the Jones Act to recover for injuries resulting from defendants' alleged negligence in failing to furnish him a safe place to work on their fishing vessel, it was immaterial, on the question of jurisdiction, that he might have proceeded under the general maritime law in a federal court, since in an action under the Jones Act the injured seaman may recover not only for injuries due to negligence but also for injuries caused by defective condition of vessel or appliances, where defect is due to negligence. Federal Employers' Liability Act § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51; Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

2. Seamen ⇐29(5)

Injured seaman's allegation, in complaint in action under the Jones Act, that defendants negligently kept, maintained, and operated an ice blower in hold of fishing vessel without any protecting guard to prevent employees on vessel from coming in contact with revolving fan and other moving parts of blower while working, was sufficient to charge defendants with negligence in maintaining defective equipment or appliances, and it was not necessary to allege that injury was occasioned by the negligence of an officer, agent, or employee of defendants. Federal Employers' Liability Act § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51; Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

3. Admiralty ⇐20

Where an injury occurs on land, state workmen's compensation laws apply, and the maritime law does not operate, but, where it occurs on navigable waters, the jurisdiction of admiralty is prima facie exclusive.

4. Admiralty ⇐20

Where an injury occurs on navigable waters and in the performance of a maritime contract, it is within the exclusive jurisdiction of admiralty unless the contract is of merely local concern, its performance has no direct effect on navigation or commerce, and application of state law would not necessarily work material prejudice to any characteristic feature of the general maritime law or interfere with the proper uniformity of that law, and state workmen's compensation laws are applicable to maritime service on navigable waters only when the service is within those three exceptions.

5. Admiralty ⇐20

Where an injury occurs on navigable waters but in the performance of a nonmaritime contract, it is, at least prima facie, local and within the operation of state workmen's compensation laws.

6. Seamen ⇐2

Plaintiff, who was employed as a tuna fisherman to go on the high seas and was actually aiding in preparation for voyage to Mexico at time of injury which occurred on navigable waters, was a "seaman" entitled to all of the benefits of the Jones Act, and hence the Superior Court had jurisdiction of his action for damages under that act, and his exclusive remedy was not with the Industrial Accident Commission. Federal Employers' Liability Act § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51; Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Seaman".

7. Seamen ⇐2

The term "seaman" within the Jones Act includes all those on board a vessel whose labor contributes to the accomplishment of the main objective of the voyage. Federal Employers' Liability Act § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51; Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

8. Seamen ⇐29(2)

Under the Jones Act, an employer is not held absolutely responsible to furnish employees with a safe place in which to work, but is only bound to exercise reasonable care to see that the place is reasonably safe. Federal Employers' Liability Act § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51; Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

9. Seamen ⊂=29(5)

In seaman's action under the Jones Act to recover for injuries allegedly resulting from defendants' negligence in failing to furnish a safe place to work on their fishing vessel, instructions that a vessel owner must supply a safe place to work and must furnish and maintain equipment and appliances reasonably free from defects were erroneous as placing on defendants a heavier duty than is imposed by the applicable law. Federal Employers' Liability Act § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51; Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688.

10. Appeal and error ⊂=1172(1)

Where record disclosed substantial evidence which, had the jury been properly instructed, would have been sufficient to sustain a verdict in plaintiff's favor, an order denying defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was affirmed though judgment was reversed.

Apeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Goodwin J. Knight, Judge.

Action by Mike Vojkovich against Louis Ursich and others under the Jones Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688, to recover damages for injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, defendants appeal.

Judgment reversed and order affirmed.

Lasher B. Gallagher, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ames Peterson and Hugh Kelley, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Plaintiff commenced this action to recover damages for injuries resulting from the negligence of defendants in failing to furnish plaintiff a safe place in which to work on their fishing vessel, "Dauntless." Defendants have appealed from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

At the time of his injury plaintiff, who was employed by defendants as a fisherman, was engaged in distributing ice in the hold of the "Dauntless," which was moored to a dock in San Pedro harbor. Crushed ice from a crusher located on the dock was conveyed through a gravity pipe to a device known as an ice blower which was suspended in the hold of the vessel. By means of a revolving fan in the ice blower ice was discharged from an aperture in the front of the blower to various parts of the hold. It was the duty of plaintiff and another fisherman to turn the blower in order to direct the flow of crushed ice so that it would be evenly distributed throughout the hold. Having completely filled the hold with ice, plaintiff shouted to an employee on the ice crushing machine to shut off the electric current which actuated the fan in the ice blower. Although the current was shut off at that time, the fan of the blower continued for some time to revolve of its own motion. Plaintiff, who was seated on the hatch coaming, with his feet encased in rubber boots about a foot above the surface of the ice in the hold, started to cross the ice to the opposite side of the hatch where the ice blower was located for the purpose of disconnecting the switch plug. He slipped on the ice and fell forward, involuntarily extending both hands to help break his fall. One of his hands went into the aperture of the blower and came in contact with the revolving fan and was injured.

The action was brought under the provisions of the Jones Act (46 U.S.C.A. § 688; sec. 33 of the Merchant Marine Act), which provides that any seaman who is injured in the course of his employment may, at his election, maintain an action for damages at law, and that in such action all statutes of the United States modifying or extending the common law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees shall apply. The alleged negligence of defendants consisted in the furnishing of an ice blower to be used by plaintiff with an unguarded aperture. Defendants contend that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in crossing the ice in the hold when he could have walked around the hatch on the deck of the vessel.

Prior to the enactment of the Jones Act a vessel and her owner were liable under the general maritime law in the event a seaman became sick or was wounded in the service of the ship, whether through negligence or accidentally, to the extent of the seaman's maintenance and cure, and were liable for injuries received by a seaman because of the unseaworthiness of the ship and her appliances. But a seaman could not recover for injuries sustained by the negligence of the master or any member of the crew. Pacific Steamship Co. v. Peterson, 278 U.S. 130, 49 S.Ct. 75, 73 L.Ed. 220. The Jones Act was enacted to permit a seaman to maintain an ordinary common law action for damages based on negligence, by reference, however, making such action subject to the provisions of section 1 of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51, relating to actions by railroad employees for personal injuries. That section provides: "Every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce * * * shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier * * * for such injury * * * resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment."

[1, 2] It is contended by defendants that the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of the matter which is the subject of the present litigation, since, it is argued, the injury was occasioned by an alleged defective appliance appurtenant to the ship (i. e., because of the unseaworthiness of the vessel). Although plaintiff had the right to file an action in the federal courts, he was given the option in the Jones Act of pursuing in the state courts a common law remedy based on negligence. Since plaintiff elected to proceed under the alternative afforded by the Jones Act, it is immaterial that he might have availed himself of the existing remedy by proceeding under the general maritime law. It has been held that in an action under the Jones Act the injured seaman may recover not only for injuries due to negligence but also for injuries caused by the defective condition of the vessel or appliances appurtenant thereto where such defect is due to negligence. Stevens v. R. O'Brien & Co., 1 Cir., 62 F.2d 632. Defendants further contend that even if the action is properly based on the Jones Act the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it is not alleged that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of any officer, agent or employee of defendants. Such an allegation was unnecessary, for it is provided by section 1 of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, which by reference is made applicable to actions under the Jones Act, that recovery may be had for injuries caused by any "defect or insufficiency, due to its [the carrier's or employer's] negligence, in its * * * appliances, machinery * * * boats, wharves, or other equipment." It is alleged in the complaint that "defendants negligently kept, maintained and operated an ice blower in the hold of said vessel without any guard or any contrivance to protect and prevent persons on said vessel and employed by defendants and while working in the course of their employment from coming in contact with the revolving fan and other moving parts of said blower." This allegation is sufficient to charge negligence on the part of defendants in maintaining defective equipment or appliances.

[3-7] It is argued by defendants that if the state tribunals can exercise jurisdiction of the subject matter of the litigation the exclusive remedy is with the Industrial Accident Commission and not in the superior court. The rules for determining whether a particular case falls within the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission or a court administering the maritime law are set forth in Teahan v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 210 Cal. 342, 346, 292 P. 120, 122, as follows: "1. If an injury occurs on land, the maritime law does not operate. 2. If it occurs on navigable waters, the jurisdiction of admiralty is prima facie exclusive. 3. If an injury occurs on navigable waters and in the performance of a maritime contract, it is certainly within the exclusive jurisdiction of admiralty unless (a) the contract is of merely local concern; and (b) its performance has no direct effect upon navigation or commerce; and (c) the application of the state law 'would not necessarily work material prejudice to any characteristic feature of the general maritime law, or interfere with the proper harmony or uniformity of that law in its international or interstate relations.' 4. State Workmen's Compensation Laws, contractual in character, are applicable to maritime service on navigable waters, when, and only when, the service is within exceptions (a), (b), and (c) above. 5. If, however, the injury occurs on navigable waters, but in the performance of a nonmaritime contract, it is, at least prima facie, local and within the operation of state laws. If there are any exceptions to this rule, they are yet to be developed." Plaintiff's employment with defendants was not local but was such as to characterize him as a "seaman" within the meaning of the Jones Act. The accident occurred on navigable waters. Plaintiff was employed as a tuna fisherman to go upon the high seas and was actually aiding in the preparation for the voyage. When the ship's articles were signed the vessel was preparing to depart for Mexico. The term "seaman" includes all those on board a vessel whose labor contributes to the accomplishment of the main objective of the voyage. Osland v. Star Fish & Oyster Co., 5 Cir., 107 F.2d 113; Domandich v. Doratich, 165 Wash. 315, 5 P.2d 310. In both of the cited cases a fisherman was held to be a seaman entitled to all the benefits of the Jones Act. We are satisfied that the superior court has jurisdiction of the action.

The judgment must be reversed because of the errors of the trial court in giving the following instructions to the jury:

"Owner of vessel must supply safe place to work.

"A seaman injured at sea may recover indemnity, not only for injuries due to an unseaworthy vessel or defective equipment, but for injuries due to the negligence of one in authority over him, or to any defective condition of the vessel.

"The owners of a vessel are bound to furnish and maintain equipment and appliances reasonably free from defects, as well as reasonably proper and suitable for the special kind of work being done.

"A shipowner which equips its vessel with improper and dangerous appliances, even when proper ones cannot be obtained, does so at its own risk, and not at the risk of the seaman."

[8, 9] Under the Jones Act an employer is not held absolutely responsible to furnish employees with a safe place in which to work but is only bound to exercise reasonable care to see that the place is reasonably safe. Baltimore & Ohio S. W. R. Co. v. Carroll, 280 U.S. 491, 50 S.Ct. 182, 74 L.Ed. 566. It has been held that there is no absolute responsibility on the part of an employer to furnish reasonably safe equipment, his duty being merely to exercise reasonable care to that end. Seaboard A. L. R. Co. v. Horton, 233 U.S. 492, 34 S.Ct. 635, 58 L.Ed. 1062, L.R.A.1915C, 1. Upon receiving the instructions above set forth the jury might well have concluded that the employers were insurers of plaintiff's safety. The jury was not informed that defendants could be freed from responsibility upon proof that they had exercised reasonable care in providing proper equipment on their vessel for the use of their employees. Clearly the instructions placed upon defendants a heavier duty than the law applicable to the situation justifies.

[10] With respect to the appeal from the order denying defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the record discloses substantial evidence which, had the jury been properly instructed, would have been sufficient to sustain a verdict in plaintiff's favor.

The judgment is reversed. The order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is affirmed.

BAINE v. CONTINENTAL ASSUR. CO.

Civ. 12735.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 26, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 23, 1942.

1. Specific performance ⇐121(3)

In suit for specific performance of an exchange of policy clause in a life insurance policy, a stipulation that insured received a refund of a portion of the premium paid with his application because of a reduction in the premium on account of a denial of disability insurance, evidence that insurance company struck out portion of insured's application requesting disability insurance, wrote the insured that it refused to issue him accidental death coverage and disability benefits, and therefore reduced premium, and testimony that insurance company only issued disability insurance in the form of a separate rider and required a more rigid medical examination for disability than for ordinary life insurance, supported a finding that the insurance company denied disability insurance to the insured at the time of the issue of the original ordinary life policy.

2. Insurance ⇐144(1)

"Exchange of policy" provision of life insurance policy providing for change without medical examination for another policy of the same amount, but providing for a higher premium upon any form issued by the company at the time policy containing provision took effect, did not permit policy holder to ask for same policy with same premium unchanged except for the supplementary addition of a contract providing for additional insurance for disability.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Exchange of Policy".

3. Insurance ⇐144(1)

Where life insurance company declined to issue disability benefits with an ordinary life insurance policy and refunded premium difference, acceptance by insured of premium refund without protest, precluded a later demand for issuance of disability benefits based upon an exchange of policy clause in the original life policy.

4. Insurance ⇐400

In suit for specific performance of exchange of policy clause in life insurance policy wherein insured sought to have new policy issued containing disability benefits, the incontestability clause appearing in insured's policy did not preclude the affirmative defense by the insurance company that it had denied insured disability benefits at the time of issuance of the original policy because of an unfavorable family history as disclosed by the medical certificate.

5. Insurance ⇐400

A provision in a life policy to the effect that after being in force for a specified time it shall be incontestable precludes any defense after the stipulated period on account of false statements warranted to be true, even though such statements were fraudulently made, unless fraud is expressly or impliedly excepted from the effect of such provision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement L. Shinn, Judge.

Action by Harry M. Baine against the Continental Assurance Company for specific performance of an exchange of policy clause in a life insurance policy. From a judgment for the defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Isaac Martin Sackin, of Hollywood, for appellant.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Clarence B. Runkle, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent insurance company in an action for specific performance of an "Exchange of Policy" clause contained in a life insurance policy, made and delivered to appellant by respondent on June 18, 1927 at Los Angeles, said clause reading as follows:

"Exchange of Policy—At any time while in full force, provided the Insured is then less than sixty years of age, this policy may be changed without medical examination for a policy of the same amount upon any form issued by the Company at the time this policy takes effect and which provides for a higher rate of premium. Such change will be made upon written application therefor on the forms required by the Company and upon payment of a sum equal to the difference between the premium on the new policy and the premium paid on this policy, with interest at the rate of five and one-half per cent per annum from the due date of each payment to the date when the change is made. The new policy shall take effect as of the date of this policy and shall be based upon the same age of the Insured as this policy."

Pursuant to said recital, appellant on October 16, 1938, and again on January 11, 1939, requested respondent insurance company to exchange the ordinary life policy dated June 18, 1927, "for a new life policy with disability benefits" providing for a life income of $10 each month for each $1,000 of insurance. Respondent refused to make the requested exchange and on April 24, 1939, appellant instituted the instant action. It was stipulated at the trial that on the dates when such requests for exchange were made, appellant was less than sixty years of age; that a proper offer of payment was made by him and that his insurance policy was in full force and effect.

Respondent in its answer to the complaint herein alleged as an affirmative defense the fact that disability insurance was denied appellant at the time the original policy was issued because of unfavorable family history disclosed by the medical certificate attached to appellant's application for such policy.

With respect to this defense, it was found by the court that appellant's application for the policy, which was issued, "in addition to said life insurance policy also requested the issuance by defendant to plaintiff of certain disability and double indemnity benefits upon defendant's Disability Form L-398, which was a supplemental contract form to be added to the life insurance policy; that defendant refused to issue said supplemental form providing for disability and double indemnity benefits and did execute and deliver said life insurance policy without said additional benefits and the policy thus executed and delivered by defendant was received and accepted by plaintiff and at about the same time plaintiff received from defendant, as a refund, the difference between the premium originally tendered to cover both the life insurance and the supplemental contract for disability and double indemnity benefits and the premium on the life insurance policy only as such policy was actually executed and delivered."

It was found by the court also that at the time when said life policy was executed and delivered to appellant, respondent "had available for issuance at least twelve other forms of life insurance policies, each providing for a higher rate of premium than said policy, executed and delivered to plaintiff, and that at the same time defendant also had available for issuance seven different forms of riders or supplemental contracts which did not constitute separate policies themselves but which could be attached to life insurance policies to provide for additional insurance, to-wit: double indemnity for accidental death and various forms of disability benefits; that each of said supplemental contracts, or riders, provided for a premium for the benefits therein specified which was separate from and in addition to the premium charged by defendant for the life insurance provided in the several forms of policies to which such supplemental contracts or riders might be attached."

As a conclusion of law from the various facts found, the court concluded: "Plaintiff is entitled to exchange said policy for another policy executed on one of the other forms of life insurance policy available for issue by defendant in 1927 providing for Ten Thousand and No/100 ($10,000.00) Dollars of life insurance at a higher rate of premium, but he is not entitled to change said policy for another life insurance policy identical in terms and amount and premium but including as a supplemental contract a rider providing for additional insurance of a different kind, to-wit: disability benefits at an additional premium."

It is urged by appellant (1) that the finding of the trial court in accordance with said affirmative defense is not sustained by the evidence; (2) that said affirmative defense is barred by the incontestability clause of the policy; (3) that the court erred in creating a new contract for the parties by a forced construction of the explicit terms of the policy; and (4) that the insurance contract should be construed most strongly against the insurer, the author thereof.

[1] An examination of the record herein reveals evidence supporting the court's finding that disability insurance was denied appellant at the time the original ordinary life policy was issued. In the first place, it was stipulated at the trial that appellant received a refund from the respondent insurer, either at the time the original policy was delivered to him or thereafter, of the difference between $333.20 and $252.60 because of reduction in amount of premium on account of denial of disability insurance. In the second place, appellant's application for such original policy of insurance, a photostatic copy of which was introduced in evidence, reads in part as follows:

"I hereby apply * * * for a policy of insurance upon the Com'l Ordinary Life —N.P. Disability L-398 plan, with" (here follow three tables of disability benefits printed on the face of the application, to-wit:)

"1.	Double Indemnity for Accidental Death; and Disability benefits	(1% of face amount of policy monthly)
	Life Income of	(2% of face amount of policy monthly) or Disability Benefits	($10 per month for each $1,000 of Insurance
	Life Income of	($20 per month for each $1,000 of Insurance
"2.	Double Indemnity for loss of life by travel accident, and Disability Benefits	($10 per month for each $1,000 of Insurance
	Life Income of	($20 per month for each $1,000 of Insurance
"3.	Disability Benefits—Life Income of $10 per month for each $1,000 of Insurance for $10,000.00 with Premium of $333.20 payable annually."

Appellant placed a check mark before Table 1 in said application.

Both the agent, Lewis, and Miss Bender, as underwriter for the life department of the General Agent at Los Angeles for the respondent Insurer, testified that after the application left their hands, i.e., between the time it was mailed to the home office at Chicago and the time when the issued policy (to which was attached a photostatic copy of appellant's application) was returned to Miss Bender for delivery to appellant at Los Angeles, certain deletions were made in the application: horizontal pen and ink lines had been drawn through the words "N.P. Disability L398"; oblique lines had been drawn through the three indemnity and disability tables, and the figures $252.60 had been substituted therein for $333.20, the amount of the original premium. All of these deletions are plainly visible in the photostatic copy of the application attached to the original policy which was introduced in evidence at the trial herein.

In addition to this, there was introduced in evidence a letter dated October 28, 1938, from an associate actuary of insurer written in answer to an inquiry of appellant, reading in part as follows: "Our records indicate that on June 9, 1927 you made written application for an Ordinary Life policy in the amount of $10,000 and that in said application you applied for supplemental contract providing for accidental death coverage and disability Form L398. The total premium for such policy with such additional benefits was indicated in the application as $333.20. The Company declined to issue such rider providing accidental death coverage and disability benefits and policy was issued without the supplemental contract. The premium was thus reduced to $252.60 and the request for the rider was crossed out in the application. We suggest you refer to photo of application attached to policy #96633. This refusal of the Company to issue such rider is set forth in the application subsequently made by you for other policies.

"We are unable to agree with your interpretation of the policy contract. The Company's viewpoint remains the same as set out in our letter of last year."

Evidence was introduced by respondent to the effect that disability insurance is issued only in the form of a separate rider, and that a more rigid medical examination is required by the insurer for the issuance of disability insurance than for ordinary life insurance.

[2] The "Exchange of Policy" clause provides that "this policy may be changed without medical examination for a policy of the same amount upon any form issued by the Company at the time this policy takes effect and which provides for a higher rate of premium." (Emphasis added.) Obviously, it is not a reasonable construction of said clause to say that it entitled appellant to ask for the same form of policy, unchanged in any respect, bearing exactly the same rate of premium, but supplemented by the addition of a new and different contract providing for additional insurance of an entirely different type. Therefore, appellant's requests that respondent issue "a new life policy with disability benefits" did not meet the requirements of the "Exchange of Policy" clause.

[3] Moreover, having accepted without protest the refund of premium and the denial of respondent to issue disability benefits, appellant cannot make a demand ten or twelve years later for the issuance of disability benefits based upon the "Exchange of Policy" clause.

[4, 5] With respect to appellant's second point, it is the general rule that a provision in a life policy to the effect that after being in force for a specified time it shall be incontestable, precludes any defense after the stipulated period on account of false statements warranted to be true, even though such statements were fraudulently made, unless fraud is expressedly or impliedly excepted from the effect of such provision. 14 Cal.Jur. 531. This was the holding in Coodley v. New York Life Ins. Co., 9 Cal. 2d 269, 70 P.2d 602, cited by appellant, and this rule was followed in Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Margolis, 11 Cal.App.2d 382, 53 P.2d 1017, also cited by appellant.

Since there was sufficient evidence to support the findings and judgment and no errors appear in the record, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CENTRAL & SOUTHERN PAC. R. EMPLOYES' MUT. BEN ASS'N v. DURST et al.

Civ. No. 6713.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 22, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 19, 1942.

1. Husband and wife ⇐279(3)

A subsequent reconciliation, coupled with cohabitation in pursuance thereof, operates to avoid a separation agreement as to all features remaining executory, but the reconciliation must be permanent and must restore the former relations of the parties.

2. Interpleader ⇐29

In consolidated actions involving right to proceeds of insurance, wherein insured's executrix relied upon property settlement agreement under which beneficiary assigned insurance policies to insured, beneficiary had burden of proving her contention that there had been a reconciliation of the parties subsequent to execution of the property settlement agreement.

3. Husband and wife ⇐279(3)

A court may not indulge in a presumption of revocation of separation agreement by a reconciliation of the parties unless evidence offered to establish full resumption of marital relations is sufficient to satisfy mind of court that such was the parties' intent.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)

In consolidated actions involving question of whether beneficiary or insured's executrix was entitled to insurance proceeds, whether insured and beneficiary, who was his wife, were reconciled subsequent to separation and execution of property settlement agreement under which beneficiary assigned the insurance policies to insured was a question of fact for the trial judge.

5. Evidence ⇐271(16)

In consolidated actions involving question of whether insured's executrix or the beneficiary, who was insured's wife, was entitled to proceeds of life insurance, where wife claimed that, subsequent to separation of parties and execution of property settlement agreement under which she assigned insurance policies to insured, there had been a reconciliation, insured's declarations made subsequent to the separation to the effect that there would never be a reconciliation were improperly admitted, since they were self-serving in their nature.

6. Evidence ⇐271(1)

Generally, declarations of a party made out of court and in his own favor are not admissible in his behalf.

7. Evidence ⇐271(16)

The declarations of a person, since deceased, not against but in support of his own interests, are inadmissible in favor of those who claim rights which such declarations would uphold and sustain, and proof of intent comes within that rule.

8. Appeal and error ⇐1170(7)

In consolidated actions involving question of whether insured's executrix or the beneficiary, who was insured's wife, was entitled to proceeds of insurance, where wife claimed that there had been a reconciliation of parties subsequent to their separation and execution of property settlement agreement under which she assigned insurance policies to insured, error in admission of declarations made by insured subsequent to the separation, to effect that there would never be a reconciliation, resulted in a "miscarriage of justice" requiring reversal, notwithstanding trial court's statement that the executrix should prevail even though the evidence were excluded. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Miscarriage of Justice".

9. Evidence ⇐276
Trial ⇐75

In consolidated actions involving question of whether insured's executrix or the beneficiary, who was insured's wife, was entitled to proceeds of insurance, where wife claimed that there had been a reconciliation of the parties subsequent to their separation and execution of property settlement agreement under which she assigned the insurance policies to insured, declarations against interest made by insured after alleged reconciliation were admissible, and fact that wife introduced evidence thereof did not preclude her from objecting to evidence of other declarations by insured to effect that there would never be any reconciliation. Code Civ.Proc. § 1853; 1870, subd. 2.

10. Evidence ⇐271(16), 276

In consolidated actions involving question of whether insured's executrix or the beneficiary, who was insured's wife, was entitled to proceeds of insurance, where evidence was introduced of declarations made by insured subsequent to separation of insured from wife and execution of property settlement agreement under which wife assigned insurance policies to insured, codal provision relating to admissibility of acts or declarations of a deceased person was inapplicable. Code Civ.Proc. § 1870, subd. 4.

Evidence sustained finding that deceased husband prior to his death did not make gift of insurance policies to his wife.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; Herbert S. Gans, Judge Assigned.

Action to recover the proceeds of a policy of life insurance by Mrs. Ben Whitlow, as executrix of the estate of Charles W. Durst, deceased, against Carrie E. Durst, and an action in interpleader by the Central & Southern Pacific Railroad Employes' Mutual Benefit Association against Carrie E. Durst and Mrs. Ben Whitlow, as executrix of the estate of Charles W. Durst, deceased, to determine which of the defendants was entitled to the proceeds of a policy of insurance, wherein the defendants in the interpleader action filed cross-complaints, and wherein the two actions were consolidated for trial. From a judgment in favor of the executrix, the defendant Carrie E. Durst appeals.

Judgment reversed.

Hearing granted; CARTER, J., not participating.

J. Everett Barr, Tebbe & Correia, and Samuel Friedman, all of Yreka, for appellant.

Daniel S. Carlton, of Redding, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice.

These actions were brought to recover the proceeds from two policies of life insurance. In the first, the insurance carrier paid the amount of the policy, $4,000, to defendant, who was named beneficiary therein. In the second, the amount of the policy, $1,000, was paid into court by plaintiff insurer, who disclaimed any interest therein. The actions were consolidated for trial. Findings were made in favor of Mrs. Ben Whitlow, and judgment entered accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment.

The complaint in the first action was filed by Mrs. Ben Whitlow, executrix of the estate of Charles W. Durst, deceased. It alleges that Charles W. Durst and defendant were at all times husband and wife. It further alleges that said decedent took out a policy of life insurance for $4,000, naming Carrie E. Durst, defendant, as beneficiary therein. It is further alleged that on July 6, 1938, the parties to the action executed a property settlement agreement, in view of immediate separation, and that, under said agreement, Carrie E. Durst transferred to her husband all her right, title and interest in and to said insurance policy, and the amount payable thereunder. It is further alleged that upon the death of the husband, which occurred on August 11, 1938, the insurer paid the amount of the policy to defendant, and that the latter has no right or interest in the same.

The second action is in interpleader. The complaint alleges the issuance of a policy of insurance by plaintiff, Central and Southern Pacific Railroad Employes' Mutual Benefit Association, upon the life of Charles W. Durst, and in the sum of $1,000; that the beneficiary designated therein was the wife of the insured, Carrie E. Durst; that due proof of the death of the insured had been made; that the will of the insured was filed for probate, in which the proceeds from said policy, and a policy issued by Central and Southern Pacific Railroad Employes' Mutual Benefit Association were bequeathed and devised to the sister of the testator Mrs. Ben Whitlow, and that demand for the payment of said policy had been made by the beneficiary named therein. Pursuant to an interlocutory decree, the amount of said $1,000 policy was paid into court. Thereafter, in said action, Carrie E. Durst filed an answer and cross-complaint. By the latter pleading she seeks to have her title to said money quieted. Mrs. Whitlow also filed an answer and cross-complaint, setting up as a defense the property settlement agreement mentioned above, wherein the wife assigned both of said policies to her husband. Mrs. Durst filed an answer to the said cross-complaint, alleging that after the execution of said agreement, the parties thereto became reconciled.

The court found that the parties to said agreement were never reconciled. It also found that the husband did not make a gift of said policies to his wife.

It is the contention of the wife, appellant herein, that the evidence is insufficient to support either of said findings. She also claims reversible error in the admission of certain declarations made by the husband just prior to his death.

[1] The general rule governing the situation is thus stated in 9 Cal.Jur., section 165, pages 827 and 828: "Subsequent reconciliation coupled with cohabitation in pursuance thereof operates to avoid an agreement for separation, at least, as to all features remaining executory. The law attaches such consequence upon the theory that the consideration for the deed has failed, inasmuch as the maintenance of the wife thereupon becomes obligatory upon the husband. But to avoid a contract of separation, the reconciliation must be permanent and be followed by cohabitation. It must be a reconciliation that restores the former relations of the parties. Mere copulation without occupying the same habitation and dwelling there as husband and wife is by no means sufficient to sustain such a conclusion."

Another statement of the rule is found in 30 C.J., section 847, page 1066: "Strictly speaking, a contract of separation is annulled and avoided, not solely, or necessarily as a matter of law, by a subsequent reconciliation, cohabitation, or resumption of the marital relation, but rather by the intentional renunciation of the agreement which the reconciliation and resumption of the marital relation sometimes evidences. Subsequent cohabitation has the effect of avoiding the contract so far, and only so far, as it establishes an intention to renounce the agreement."

[2, 3] Also, the burden of proving that there was a reconciliation was upon appellant, and "Before a court may indulge in a presumption of revocation, however, the evidence offered to establish full resumption of marital relations must be sufficient to satisfy the mind of the court that such was the intent of the parties. (Emphasis added.)" Estate of Boeson, 201 Cal. 36, 42, 43, 255 P. 800, 802.

[4] Appellant and her husband had lived a tempestuous married life. He evidently had used intoxicating liquor to an excessive degree and his relations with other women had been anything but platonic. With this background, they decided to separate, and on July 5th the wife filed suit for divorce. The following day they executed a property settlement, to which we have referred. On August 11th following, Durst took his own life. The question is: What took place in respect to the marriage relations between them from the date of the agreement to the time of his death? Was there a resumption of such relations, with intent to live again as husband and wife? These are questions of fact for the sole determination of the trial judge. In support of her contention, appellant testified that on the evening of July 16th, her husband came to their home and promised to mend his ways. Appellant said that she would give him another chance, and she further testified that between that date and July 25th, they lived together as man and wife, occupying the same bed and having sexual intercourse. On the latter date appellant was called away from her home by his duties in connection with the Forest Service. She next saw her husband August 2nd, and he slept with her that night, and the nights of the 3rd and the 4th. He left the home on August 5th for Fort Bragg. She never saw him alive again. She discussed property matters with her husband on August 3rd, and her testimony in respect to what took place on that occasion is as follows: "The evening of the 5th of August before he left for a trip to the Coast, he discussed his insurance policies, and he asked me if I had made any change in mine, and I told him no, that they remained as they were made out to him as beneficiary. And he said that he wanted no change made in his; that he wanted them to remain as they were; that before he left that evening he would give me his policies. They were in his possession. He said that he would get his policies out of the car and give them to me; that he wanted me to have them. * * * He gave me an envelope, a large, manila envelope, and in it was an insurance policy from the New York Life Insurance Company and the other from the Employees' Mutual Benefit Association."

Another witness testified that the husband told him he was living at home after July 16th. Another testified that the parties seemed to be normal in their relations when she saw them subsequent to July 17th.

As opposed to the foregoing, there is the impeaching evidence of witness Korst, clerk in the Clarendon Hotel at Yreka.

That witness testified that the husband registered at the hotel on August 2nd, and stayed at the hotel for the period of August 2nd, 3rd, and 4th; that he saw the husband go to his room on each of these nights, and that he knew that he slept in said room. He produced a registration card with Durst's signature thereon. He also testified that the husband registered at the hotel and stayed there on the night of August 10th. There was also introduced in evidence the official fire-log of the Forest Service, showing that Durst was fifty-miles from Yreka on July 18th, having left that city at 5:15 p.m., and that he did not return until 2:00 p.m. on July 19th; that he was twenty miles away from Yreka on the night of July 19th, returning at 5:30 a.m., and that he rested at the barracks until 9:00 a.m. The record also shows that Durst moved to the Forest Service Barracks at the time of his separation from his wife, taking his bed with him, and that this bed remained there until he left on his vacation on July 27th.

Over the objection of appellant, a number of statements and declarations made by Durst after July 16th, were admitted in evidence. These declarations were to the effect that he and his wife were separated, and that there would never be a reconciliation. Seven witnesses testified to such statements, four of them being members of the husband's family, and three of them intimate acquaintances. Between August 5th and August 10th, witness Nixon testified Durst told him that Mrs. Durst was keeping company with another man. Witness Owens testified that Durst repeatedly told him, during July and August, that he and his wife were separated. He also complained to Owens that his wife was having an affair with another man. Witness Dunphy testified that Durst had asked him if he could share Dunphy's hotel room as a permanent residence. This was approximately one week before his death. On July 25th, ten days after the alleged reconciliation, Durst, according to the testimony of his sister, Mrs. Whitlow, declared that he and his wife were separated, and that there was no possibility of a reconciliation.

[5, 6] We are of the opinion that the court erred in admitting in evidence the declarations of the husband as outlined in the preceding paragraph. We might here take occasion to observe that the case of appellant is not a "weak" one. There is abundant evidence in the record which would support a finding in her favor, provided that a trial court was satisfied with the credibility of her witnesses. On the other hand, and exclusive of the questioned evidence, the court might properly have found that there was no reconciliation. The declarations were manifestly self-serving in their nature. Of such testimony, it is said in Jones' Commentaries on Evidence, vol. 2, pages 1636, 1637, 1638 and 1639, par. 895: "It is repeatedly said that 'the declarations of a party in his own favor can never be received in evidence.' The danger of such expressions lies in their partial truth. Ordinarily, it is true, such statements are not admissible. It would obviously be unsafe if parties to litigation, without restriction, were allowed to support their claims by proving their own statements made out of court. Such a practice would be open to all the objections which exist against the admission of hearsay in general, and would also open the door to fraud and to the fabrication of testimony. It is accordingly a general rule of broad application that the declarations of a party, made out of court and in his own favor, are not admissible in his behalf. Almost endless illustrations of the rule might be given, for it is one of constant application. It serves not only as a preventative of fraud and of the fabrication of evidence for the purposes of a particular controversy, but also as the nominal reason for the exclusion of much other matter, some of which, to the lay mind, might be considered of logical probative value and weight."

A case directly in point is Carter v. Younger, 123 Ark. 266, 185 S.W. 435, 437. There, in passing upon the identical question, the court said: "Appellants offered to prove by several witnesses certain declarations of Younger made during and a short time subsequent to the time when it was claimed by appellee that the separation agreement had been abrogated, tending to show that there had been no abrogation of such agreement. These were in the nature of self-serving declarations, and the ruling of the court in excluding them was correct. The appellants' heirs are privies in blood and estate with Samuel Younger, deceased." (Emphasis ours.)

In 9 Cal.Jur. pages 828 and 829, section 165, the rule is thus stated: "Declarations of party refusing reconciliation.—It has been held that a declaration made by a deceased husband, a short time prior to an alleged reconciliation, to the effect that he did not want to have anything more to do with his wife is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing the attitude of the decedent and as going to the probability of such reconciliation and was not self-serving. A different rule, however, is applicable where the declarations of the decedent are made after the alleged agreement of reconciliation and are offered in evidence as proof that no such reconciliation had occurred." (Italics ours.)

The Supreme Court of this state has approved the holding in the Carter case, (In re Clover's Estate, 179 Cal. 313, 176 P. 452.) The case of Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 83, 165 P. 432, while it did not involve a property settlement, follows the same rule. The court stated at page 90 of 175 Cal., at page 436 of 165 P.: "The appellant assigns as error certain rulings on the admission and rejection of evidence. The only ones which call for particular notice are those relating to the declarations of Mrs. Ross. The declarations offered by the plaintiff, as a part of her case, were properly admitted as the declarations of a decedent against her pecuniary interest. Code Civ. Proc. § 1853. On the other hand, the court was right in rejecting evidence offered by the appellants to show declarations of Mrs. Ross in favor of the position assumed by the appellants, who claim under her in this litigation."

In Hausman v. Hausling, 78 Cal. 283, at page 286, 20 P. 570 at page 571, it is said: "A litigant is not permitted to strengthen his case by his own declarations, whether written or verbal. They may be used against him, but not for him. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2."

It is contended by respondent that the question here is primarily one of intent, (Gump v. Gump, 42 Cal.App.2d 64, 108 P. 2d 21), and the rule in the foregoing authorities is therefore not applicable. She states that: "Since reconciliation involves a state of mind, evidence of the declaration of the parties, either before or after the act in issue, are admissible in California as long as they are not too remote."

She relies upon the case of Piercy v. Piercy, 18 Cal.App. 751, 124 P. 561. There, however, in an action to set aside a deed, the inquiry was not directed to the intent of the grantor, but rather to her mental capacity and competency—matters which are not here in question. This is clearly pointed out by the following language, at page 764 of 18 Cal.App., at page 566 of 124 P.: "The principle is not that involved in the case of Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 P. 338, 35 Am.St.Rep. 186, and Ord v. Ord, 99 Cal. 523, 34 P. 83. In the former it was said that the declarations and acts of the grantor 'made and done in his own interest months after the deed was delivered are not admissible as indicating his intentions in delivering the deed,' and, in the latter, that a 'grantor will not be permitted to disparage his deed by declarations made or acts done by him in his own interest subsequent to its execution.' But in those and other similar cases there was no issue as to fraud or the mental condition of the grantor, and the testimony was offered as evidence of the truth of the facts asserted in it and was clearly self-serving and hearsay. In a case like this it is plain the witness is permitted to detail declarations which he has heard, not as evidence of the truth of the fact asserted, but of a spontaneous and unreflecting expression of the mental and emotional condition of the declarant. The distinction is marked and vital and recognized by the authorities."

[7] Our conclusion is that this case comes under the general rule that the declarations of a person, since deceased, not against, but in support of his own interest, are inadmissible in favor of those who claim rights which such declarations would uphold and sustain, and that proof of intent comes within that rule.

[8] It is urged that the evidence erroneously admitted was not prejudicial, and that article VI, section 4½ of the Constitution is applicable. Respondent points to a statement of the trial court to the effect that even though the evidence were excluded, plaintiff should prevail. It is our opinion that where prejudicial evidence is admitted, the effect thereof cannot be removed or obliterated by such a statement. Even though the court might have found for plaintiff, if such evidence were omitted, no one can say whether, consciously or unconsciously, the court may have been influenced by it in the final determination of the issues. The effect of the testimony of seven witnesses all in accord upon one point, would ordinarily be of considerable weight. We believe that, under the circumstances, it would result in a miscarriage of justice, if the judgment were allowed to stand. This is particularly true here, where the evidence of appellant might be justly characterized as "strong" in its probative effect.

[9,10] Appellant seeks to invoke the rule stated in 2 Cal.Jur. page 848, par. 497, which provides that if a party introduces or calls out improper evidence, he is precluded from objecting to evidence of like character introduced by his adversary. Appellant introduced evidence of statements made by deceased after the alleged reconciliation. Such evidence was proper, the declarations being made against the interest of the declarant. Code of Civil Procedure, section 1870 subd. 2; sec. 1853. We do not believe that section 1870, subd. 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure, has any application to the case.

[11] It is finally contended by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the husband did not make a gift of the said policies of insurance to appellant. We think that there is sufficient evidence in the record to uphold the finding, particularly in view of the rule relating to the proof of such an issue, which is found in 13 Cal.Jur. pages 46 and 47, section 12:

"When the claim of a gift is not asserted until after the death of the alleged donor, it should be sustained by clear and satisfactory evidence of every element requisite to constitute a gift. Gifts first asserted after the death of the alleged donor are always regarded with suspicion by the courts. The reason for the rule expressed in the language of the district court of appeals is:

" 'Mindful of the facility with which, after the alleged donor is dead, fraudulent claims of ownership may be founded on pretended gifts of his property asserted to have been made whilst he was living, it is but a salutary precaution which demands explicit and convincing evidence of every element needed to constitute a valid donation, whether it be a donation inter vivos or mortis causa. Even then fraudulent claims may prevail, but the rigid requirement of the clearest proof will at least diminish the number.' (Italics added.)

"Whether a gift is clearly supported by the evidence is a question for the trial court, and its conclusion will not be disturbed unless the reviewing court can say that such conclusion is clearly unwarranted. The administrator of a deceased donor is in no better position to question a gift than the donor would be if alive."

This finding would not establish title in the policies in the decedent, and hence would not entitle respondent to judgment. The other issues must still be determined to settle the rights of the parties.

The judgment is reversed.

Civ. 2686.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 22, 1942.

1. Arbitration and award ⇐78

Evidence afforded by affidavit of one of arbitrators, supposed to be appointed by one of the parties to arbitration, that he had not been so appointed, was sufficient evidence of such nonappointment to warrant vacation of award purporting to be signed by three arbitrators, since such nonappointment invalidated the purported selection by two arbitrators of third arbitrator so that there was in fact but one arbitrator.

2. Arbitration and award ⇐72

In proceeding for confirmation of an award, implied finding, based upon conflicting evidence, that individual purporting to act as an arbitrator had never been appointed arbitrator was conclusive.

3. Appeal and error ⇐205

Where question itself does not indicate whether answer to it will be material evidence, the party seeking to introduce the evidence must, in order to present the question to an appellate court, make an offer of what he proposes to prove so that the trial court and the appellate court can determine whether the proposed proof is material.

4. Appeal and error ⇐205

Where affiant was called for purpose of cross-examination, error in sustaining objection to cross-examination could not furnish ground for reversal of judgment, where counsel made no offer of what he expected to prove, since prejudice was not shown and could not be assumed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Warren Stockton, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the arbitration between Richard H. Bewick and another and J. J. Lopez, wherein Richard H. Bewick and another filed a petition for an order confirming the award of arbitrators and Pearl Margaret Mecham, as executrix of the estate of J. J. Lopez, deceased, filed a motion to vacate the award. From a judgment vacating the award and denying the petition to confirm the award, Richard H. Bewick and another appeal.

Affirmed.

Harvey, Johnston & Baker, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Claflin, Dorsey & Campbell, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment setting aside and vacating an award of arbitrators.

J. J. Lopez and Mary W. Lopez owned property in the city of Bakersfield. By an instrument in writing, dated May 22, 1929, they leased this property to S. S. Lombard for a period of ten years commencing on July 1, 1929, and ending June 30, 1939.

Mrs. Lopez died and her interest in the leased property passed to her husband. J. J. Lopez died on July 21, 1939, and Pearl Margaret Mecham was appointed executrix of his estate.

With the written consent of the lessors the interest of Lombard passed to Richard H. Bewick who assumed and agreed to perform the obligations of the lease. Tricy Bewick is the wife of Richard H. Bewick.

The lease contained the following provisions:

"And the lessee is granted the further option to purchase as follows:

"(a) Upon the expiration of the ten year term hereof at a price and terms then to be agreed on between the parties hereto, and if not agreed on then to be fixed by arbitration, each of the parties hereto selecting one arbitrator, and the two selected a third, which said arbitrators shall fix such purchase price and the terms under which the purchase may be made, but with the proviso that on the matter of terms at lease one-half of such purchase price shall be payable in cash, and the remaining half to be evidenced by promissory note secured by deed of trust, and to draw not less than the legal rate of interest.

"To exercise this option the lessee must, not later than thirty days prior to the expiration of the term of the lease, give written notice to the lessors of his desire to exercise same, and accompany such notice with a deposit of not less than One Thousand Dollars ($1,000.00) to be applied upon account of such purchase, and to be forfeited to the lessors in event the lessee fails to complete his purchase."

Under date of May 12, 1939, Mr. and Mrs. Bewick attempted to exercise the option of purchase. They mailed their check for $1,000 to Lopez with a letter informing him that they desired to purchase the property, which letter concluded as follows:

"Will you please, according to the terms of said lease, meet with the undersigned at your earliest convenience for the purpose of determining the price so that if and in the event a price cannot be determined the same may be fixed by arbitration as provided in said lease."

By a letter dated May 23, 1939, informing Mr. and Mrs. Bewick that he was not in a position to comply with their letter of May 12th, Lopez returned the money to them. They refused to accept the return of the money and about May 24, 1939, Lopez deposited it to their credit in the Anglo-California National Bank, Bakersfield Branch, and enclosed a duplicate deposit slip in a letter informing them of that fact. On May 26, 1939, the deposit was changed to a savings account.

As Lopez was dead at the time of the hearing in the court below the story of what transpired between the parties is confined to the testimony of Mr. Bewick and other witnesses and certain documentary evidence.

Bewick testified that Lopez saw him and told him he wanted $10,000 for the property; that he (Bewick) had it appraised and wanted it for $6,000; that the two talked of the arbitration; that Lopez said he would appoint Alphonse Weill as his arbitrator; that Bewick appointed E. H. Clare as his arbitrator; that these two finally selected Howard J. Nichols as the third arbitrator; that Lopez thought when Nichols was mentioned as the third arbitrator he would be a good man. There is some evidence corroborating this testimony and also showing that Weill and Clare viewed the property, probably in June, 1939.

On December 20, 1939, Mr. and Mrs. Bewick filed their petition for an order confirming the award of the arbitrators. The arbitrators' decision and award is attached to this petition. From this document and the exhibits attached to it we gather the following:

That under date of September 28, 1939, Alphonse Weill and E. H. Clare in writing selected Howard J. Nichols as the third arbitrator and that Nichols accepted the appointment in writing on October 4, 1939; that each of the three took an oath on November 2, 1939, that he would "faithfully and fairly hear any and all evidence presented * * * and examine the matter in controversy upon the questions to be arbitrated and make a just award according to the best of his understanding." On the same day Geraldine Hall took an oath of office as reporter of the hearing to be held.

Under date of October 21, 1939, the three arbitrators signed a notice directed to Pearl Margaret Mecham as executrix, to her attorneys, and to Richard H. and Tricy Bewick and their attorneys informing them that at ten o'clock a. m. on November 2, 1939, in the office of the attorneys for Mr. and Mrs. Bewick they would hold a hearing and take evidence on the question to be arbitrated. The attorneys for Mr. and Mrs. Bewick admitted service on October 25, 1939. There are affidavits showing service on the executrix on October 26, 1939, and on her attorneys on the previous day.

The decision and award of the arbitrators was signed by the three of them on November 3, 1939. It recites the facts already outlined; that the hearing was held at the time and place noticed; that Mr. and Mrs. Bewick appeared by their attorneys; that no one appeared on behalf of the executrix; that evidence was taken and an award made; that the price to be paid for the property was fixed at $7,800, one-half to be paid in cash and the balance in three years in instalments of $100 per month plus interest at seven per cent per annum, the last instalment to include the balance due. Deferred payments were to be secured by a deed of trust on the property.

There was no written appointment of Weill by Lopez or any other person.

The executrix filed a written answer and objections to confirmation of the award and a motion to vacate the award. Among the many grounds stated there is only one we need notice, which is this: That Weill was never appointed arbitrator by Lopez or the executrix so that consequently no arbitration was had and no award made. The trial judge granted the motion on this and all other grounds and entered a judgment vacating and setting aside the award and denying the petition to confirm it.

The important question for consideration is whether the implied finding that Weill was not appointed arbitrator is sustained by the evidence. It is clear that if he was not so appointed there was only one arbitrator. Consequently there could be no arbitration and no award made that could be confirmed. The attempted selection of Nichols as the third arbitrator depended on Weill's authority, for certainly Clare could not act alone in that matter.

The executrix produced and relied upon the affidavit of Weill, which is as follows:

"Alphonse Weill, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: I knew J. J. Lopez in his lifetime. Said J. J. Lopez did not appoint me as an arbitrator, so-called, or as his agent or representative concerning any matter involving the property at the Northwest corner of Chester and California Avenues, Bakersfield, as between him and any other person whomsoever, nor any other property or matter whatsoever, nor did I ever have any conversation with said J. J. Lopez in which the matter of my acting as arbitrator as between him and any other person, or his agent or representative, or that I would perform any act whatever concerning said matter or in any matter, was ever mentioned, nor did I in any conversation with said J. J. Lopez state in substance or otherwise that I would act as arbitrator or agent or representative, or perform any act whatever in the matter hereinbefore mentioned, or any matter whatever.

"That I met E. H. Clare and Howard Nichols at a so-called arbitration meeting on November 2nd, 1939, solely upon the statement of others, but not of J. J. Lopez, that I had been so appointed.

"That I make this statement to the Court that the Court may fully understand my position in the matter, and that my purporting to act as arbitrator was solely upon the statement of others, but not J. J. Lopez, that I was appointed and that my appointment was legal."

[1, 2] This affidavit in itself is sufficient to sustain the implied finding of the trial court that Weill was never appointed arbitrator. Of course there are rather strong inferences to the contrary that might be drawn from other evidence and from the fact that Weill actually attempted to act as arbitrator in the matter. These inferences merely created a conflict in the evidence which the trial court resolved against Mr. and Mrs. Bewick. That ruling is conclusive here.

Mr. Weill was in court and was called to the stand for the purpose of cross-examination on the matters set forth in his affidavit. Counsel for the executrix objected to this cross-examination. This objection was sustained, the trial court holding that if Mr. and Mrs. Bewick wished to interrogate Weill, they must call him as their witness. This ruling is assigned as error.

Weill was called as a witness for Mr. and Mrs. Bewick, but their counsel discontinued his examination before anything material to the question of his appointment as arbitrator had been developed. Further, counsel made no offer of what he expected to prove by this witness either by cross or direct examination.

In Murnane v. Le Mesnager, 207 Cal. 485, 279 P. 800, 805, the Supreme Court said: "We find no prejudicial error in the refusal of the trial court to permit the cross-examination in court by appellants of the witness Haas, who had previously testified by deposition. The court permitted the appellants to call Haas as their own witness, and that was done."

[3] In Marshall v. Hancock, 80 Cal. 82, 22 P. 61, this rule is announced: "Where the question itself does not indicate whether the answer to it will be material evidence or not, the party seeking to introduce the evidence must, in order to present the question to this court, make an offer of what he proposes to prove, so that the court below and this court can determine whether the proposed proof is material or not. There is nothing in the record to show what the proposed testimony was. The question indicated nothing of the kind. The witness is asked for a conversation between White and himself. The conversation, if there was one, may have been about a matter entirely aside from the matter under investigation. Therefore the record fails to show any error in this ruling." The same rule applies to cross-examination of a witness. In Re Claire, 9 Cal.App.2d 749, 50 P.2d 1070, 1072, it is said: "We are of the opinion that the trial judge unduly limited this cross-examination. Counsel for contestant made no proffer of proof and did not inform the trial judge, and has not informed us, what he expected to prove by this witness. We cannot presume prejudice in an error of this kind."

[4] There is nothing in the record to show prejudice in the challenged ruling of the trial court. That ruling, assuming it was erroneous, can furnish no ground for a reversal of the judgment because prejudice must be shown and cannot be assumed.

It should be appropriate to observe that the affirmance of the judgment on the ground that there has been no arbitration and that there is no report and award of the arbitrators to be confirmed may not preclude Mr. and Mrs. Bewick from finding a remedy, if they have one, under the provisions of sections 1280, et seq., of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROGERS v. ROGERS.

Civ. 13275.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Jan. 28, 1942.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1040(7)

In suit by former wife to recover upon property settlement agreement, where defendant filed answer setting up an oral agreement releasing him from obligations of agreement, ruling sustaining demurrer to such defense could not be held harmless on ground defendant could have introduced evidence in support of such defense by reason of his denial of allegations in complaint that no further agreement had been entered into by the parties, where such allegation was nonessential and because it tendered no issue, an answer to it would have joined no issue.

2. Divorce ⇐331

In suit to recover balance due on property settlement agreement incorporated into Nevada divorce decree, wherein complaint alleged that no further agreement had been entered into by the parties, as court would not have to make a finding on the allegation which simply anticipated a defense and sought to avoid it, so likewise court would not err in refusing to receive evidence on it from either party.

3. Divorce ⇐331

A former husband sued for balance due on property settlement agreement incorporated into Nevada divorce decree, was not precluded from appealing from ruling which sustained a demurrer without leave to amend to his defense based on a subsequently executed oral agreement modifying the separation agreement, on theory that he could have introduced evidence in support of such defense under allegation in complaint that no further agreement had been entered into by the parties, where his contention was that monthly installments sued upon had been satisfied by way of an executed gift.

4. Compromise and settlement ⇐6(1)

At common law, a debt may be discharged in whole or in part only by an agreement under seal or by promise for a consideration, and hence agreement of creditor to discharge the whole or part of debt then due or as it should become due in consideration of payment of a lesser amount is unsupported by sufficient "consideration", since a debtor incurs no legal detriment by paying part or all of what he owes, and a creditor obtains no legal benefit in receiving it.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Consideration".

5. Release ⇐12(2)

The statute providing for the extinguishment of an obligation by written release given to the debtor regardless of any new consideration, operates to make a written release the equivalent of a writing under seal at the common law. Civ.Code, § 1541.

6. Divorce ⇐331

An oral agreement modifying written property settlement agreement incorporated into Nevada divorce decree, whereby husband was released from obligation to make any payment thereunder except from such funds as he might have after paying his own necessary expenses was not an "executed oral agreement" as to each installment matured under settlement agreement, within statute providing that a contract in writing may be altered by an executed oral agreement, and hence monthly installments were not satisfied by oral agreement regardless of want of consideration. Civ.Code, § 1698.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Executed Oral Agreement".

7. Divorce ⇐331

In suit to recover balance due upon written property settlement agreement incorporated into Nevada divorce decree, a defense which was based upon oral agreement modifying settlement agreement whereby husband was released from obligation to make any payment except from such funds as he might have after paying his own necessary expenses did not constitute a legal defense to count based on judgment incorporating the settlement agreement. Civ.Code, § 1698.

8. Husband and wife ⇐281

If oral agreement modifying property settlement agreement executed in New York was also executed in New York, then the New York law would govern the action to recover a balance due upon the property settlement agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by Frances Colby Rogers against Robert Cameron Rogers, plaintiff's former husband, to recover a balance allegedly due upon a property settlement agreement. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Horowitz & McCloskey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HANSON, Justice pro tem.

This is a suit by the former wife of defendant to recover a balance alleged to be due upon their property settlement agreement which had been executed in the State of New York and incorporated into a decree of divorce granted to the plaintiff by a Nevada court after an appearance therein by the defendant. The defendant filed an answer containing three affirmative defenses. The second of these defenses alleges that on July 1, 1936, the parties entered into an oral agreement modifying their separation agreement whereby defendant was released from the obligation to make any payment thereunder except from such funds as he might have after paying his own necessary expenses. In connection therewith he averred that from July 1, 1936, to the month of December, 1937, his income had at all times been insufficient to pay his own expenses, and that since December, 1937, he had no income whatsoever; and in view of the oral agreement he had made no payments to the plaintiff. The trial court sustained a demurrer thereto without leave to amend. Thereafter the defendant filed a motion for leave to file an amended answer, which was denied. The proposed answer merely stated in more detail the defenses set forth in the original answer. The case being at issue on the answer containing certain denials and two affirmative defenses which had not been attacked by demurrer, it was set for trial. Defendant did not appear at the trial but instead took this appeal.

[1, 2] In support of the ruling below plaintiff urges that even if we should hold the ruling to be erroneous the defendant nevertheless has no ground for reversal, since defendant could have introduced evidence in support of the defense by reason of the fact that he had denied an allegation of plaintiff's complaint reading as follows: "That no further agreement or contract of any kind or character has been entered into by the parties, and that the first agreement, as modified by the second and third agreements, is subsisting and in full force and effect." But this was not an allegation essential to the cause of action predicated upon the contract. It simply anticipated a defense and sought to avoid it. It could have been stricken out upon motion; and even though it had not been answered—because it was a nonessential allegation—it would not have been admitted. Moreover, as such an allegation tenders no issue an answer to it would join no issue. Boles v. Cohen, 15 Cal. 150; Canfield v. Tobias, 21 Cal. 349; Munson v. Bowen, 80 Cal. 572, 22 P. 253; Weinberger v. Weidman, 134 Cal. 599, 66 P. 869. As a court would not have to make a finding on the allegation (Souter v. Maguire, 78 Cal. 543, 21 P. 183; Bacon v. Bacon, 21 Cal.App.2d 540, 69 P.2d 884), so likewise it would not err in refusing to receive evidence on it from either party.

[3] To argue, then, as respondent does, that appellant could have introduced evidence to sustain his defense because there was a purported joinder of issue on the allegation, is inherently unsound. Moreover, appellant's contention was not that he had a collateral contract but that the monthly installments sued upon had been satisfied by way of an executed gift thereof by respondent to appellant.

Appellant argues that as each monthly installment matured under the written contract it was fully executed and satisfied by the terms of the oral agreement, regardless of a want of consideration therefor. We think there is no merit in the contention.

[4, 5] By the common law a debt may be discharged in whole or in part only by an agreement under seal or by promise for a consideration. Accordingly, the agreement of the creditor to discharge the whole or a part of the debt then due, or as it should become due in the future, in consideration of the payment of a lesser amount, is unsupported by a sufficient consideration. The reason is that "since a debtor incurs no legal detriment by paying part or all of what he owes, and a creditor obtains no legal benefit in receiving it, such payment if made * * * at or after maturity of the debt, is not sufficient consideration for any promise." Williston on Contracts, Permanent

Ed., sec. 120. In this state the rule of the common law has in part been modified by statute. Here not only has the seal been abolished, but an obligation is extinguished by a written release therefrom given to the debtor regardless of any new consideration. Civ.Code, sec. 1541. In short, this statute operates to make a written release the equivalent of a writing under seal at the common law. Moreover, still another statute—the statute here relied upon by appellant—provides that while a contract in writing may be altered by an executed oral agreement, it may not otherwise be altered short of a contract in writing. Civ.Code, sec. 1698.

In view of the statute just mentioned the particular question before us is the interpretation to be given to the phrase therein reading "executed oral agreement." In short, was the oral agreement in this case an "executed oral agreement" as each installment matured under the written contract? The Supreme Court in Julian v. Gold, 214 Cal. 74, 3 P.2d 1009, 1010, held that an oral agreement between a landlord and tenant for a reduction of the rent under a written lease became an "executed oral agreement" as to each current installment of rent when the tenant paid the reduced monthly rental installment and the landlord accepted it. The court predicated its holding on two distinct theories: (1) that the acceptance by a landlord of an orally reduced rent constitutes a gift of the excess to the tenant; (2) that the oral agreement was fully executed by Code of Civil Procedure, section 2076, which provides that a person to whom money is due must upon a tender of money specify any objection he may have to what is tendered or else he will be deemed to have waived it. It will be observed that there was a tender by the debtor in the Julian case. There was no tender at all in the instant case, nor is there any claim by the debtor that he advised the creditor at the time each monthly installment fell due that his net current earnings were insufficient to pay the installment and that no payment was being made in view of the oral agreement. We think it plain that the case of Julian v. Gold is not here controlling.

Appellant rests heavily upon Taylor v. Taylor, 39 Cal.App.2d 518, 103 P.2d 575, but we think the case is clearly distinguishable. In that case the defendant ex-husband rendered annual statements to the plaintiff ex-wife showing the amounts due her under the modified oral agreements as to property under his control, and she made like statements to him. Moreover, there was a new consideration for the oral agreement in that plaintiff was permitted to manage one of the properties and collect the rents and make disbursements for its upkeep, whereas the property settlement agreement gave full management and control of all the properties to the defendant.

Another case relied upon is Price v. Price, 24 Cal.App.2d 462, 75 P.2d 655, but in that case, as in the Julian case, the reduced monthly payments were made as they matured pursuant to an oral contract modifying a property settlement agreement and accepted by the former wife without objection. For the reasons heretofore indicated the case is not helpful here.

[6, 7] From what we have said the defense tendered was not a legal defense to the count based on the property settlement agreement. For the same reason the defense was not a valid one to the count based on the judgment which incorporated the property settlement agreement. Respondent's further contention, that even if the defense had been proper in a suit on the property settlement agreement it could not be urged as against a suit on the judgment, is a matter which calls for no expression of opinion on our part in view of our general holding.

[8] We should perhaps add that counsel on both sides have presented this case to us on the theory that the law of this state is applicable to the controversy. We note, however, that the written property settlement agreement, along with the written modifications thereof, were all executed in the State of New York, and that the decree of divorce incorporating the agreement with its subsequent written modifications was rendered by a Nevada court. Whether the oral contract was executed in New York State, as seems probable, is not disclosed by the record. If it was, the law of New York would govern the action on the contract, and not the law of California. In many states, unlike California, an executed oral agreement without consideration is no defense. What the rule in New York may be we have not had occasion to determine, as we are entitled on this record to assume the oral agreement was made in this state.

The judgment is affirmed.

PALMER v. PALMER et al.

Civ. 2831.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 27, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 27, 1942.

1. Husband and wife ⇐14(5)

The joint tenancy of husband and wife was broken by wife's deed of undivided one-half interest in property to third person, and third person's reconveyance to wife, and property was thereafter owned by husband and wife as "tenants in common", so that wife had an undivided one-half interest in the property, title to which would be quieted in wife.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Tenant in Common".

2. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)

Where evidence is conflicting and there is substantial evidence in record supporting findings and judgment, appellate court will not reverse judgment because of conflicts in the evidence.

3. Appeal and error ⇐996

Where either one of two inferences may fairly and reasonably be deduced from admitted or uncontradicted facts, question of fact should be determined by jury or by judge trying case without a jury, and their verdict or finding will not be set aside on ground that it is not sustained by evidence.

4. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)

In so far as evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in a light most favorable to support of judgment.

5. Husband and wife ⇐232(3)

Evidence was sufficient to establish lien of judgment creditor of husband on undivided one-half interest in realty which had once been wife's separate property, and which wife had conveyed to third party who reconveyed to husband and wife as joint tenants, on ground that wife knew that instruments which she signed creating joint tenancy were deeds and not her will, and that such deeds created a present estate in her property in her husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Robert B. Burch, Judge.

Action to quiet title and for cancellation of a portion of a deed by Adah Palmer against O. B. Palmer and others, and J. C. Swartzbaugh, individually and as guardian ad litem, etc., and others. From a judgment refusing to quiet plaintiff's title to the property and refusing to cancel a portion of the deed and awarding J. C. Swartzbaugh, individually and as guardian ad litem, etc., and others, a judgment lien on a one-half interest in the property, Adah Palmer appeals.

Partly affirmed, and partly reversed with instructions.

MARKS, Justice.

This is an appeal from a judgment refusing to quiet plaintiff's title to property in the city of San Diego, and refusing to cancel a portion of a deed and awarding defendants Swartzbaugh a judgment lien on a one-half interest in the property.

The complaint contains three causes of action. The first is in the usual form of an action to quiet title. The second cause of action sought cancellation of a portion of a deed dated May 3, 1929, from Adah Palmer and O. B. Palmer, husband and wife, to Bernice F. Crawford, and a deed from Bernice F. Crawford to Adah Palmer and O. B. Palmer for reasons of (1) lack of consideration, (2) lack of delivery, and (3) because plaintiff did not know she was signing, and did not intend to sign a deed, but thought she was making a will. No attention need be paid to the third cause of action because no question is raised as to the propriety of the trial court's order granting a nonsuit as to it.

Besides denying numerous allegations of the complaint defendants Swartzbaugh asserted a lien on the property by virtue of a judgment recovered on May 26, 1938, against O. B. Palmer, an abstract of which judgment was recorded on June 6, 1938. Mr. Palmer, a defendant in the action before us, was served with summons but made default.

The Palmers came to California from Iowa in 1912 or 1913. Mrs. Palmer brought $13,500 with her which admittedly was her separate property and represented her accumulations from a business she had conducted there. Mr. Palmer had been in business in Iowa, but the only result of those ventures were judgments against him.

Mrs. Palmer invested her funds in real estate in San Diego, taking title to the several parcels in her own name. It is not questioned that up to May 3, 1929, the real estate was her separate property. Mr. Palmer had a small business in San Diego which he conducted with questionable success.

At various times prior to 1929 Mr. Palmer had requested Mrs. Palmer to convey title to some of the property to him. Mrs. Palmer refused to accede to these requests. Some time prior to May 3, 1929, the couple learned that a neighbor whose husband had died was having trouble in getting his estate settled; That it was taking considerable time and costing her quite a sum of money. Mr. and Mrs. Palmer reopened the discussion of their own affairs, particularly concerning the property owned by her. On May 3, 1929, they executed a deed conveying the real property belonging to plaintiff, to Bernice F. Crawford, who in turn on the same day reconveyed the property to them as joint tenants. The deeds were recorded on the following day.

Mrs. Palmer testified that she decided to make a will in favor of Mr. Palmer; that she consented to have her husband consult an attorney about this matter; that he subsequently told her that he had consulted an attorney whom he knew but with whom plaintiff was not acquainted; that this attorney agreed to draw the will; that she and her husband went to the office of the attorney who had prepared documents for her signature; that there were a number of papers there; that she told the attorney that she did not know what the papers were; that "What I was looking for was a will"; that the attorney said to her, "Well, Mrs. Palmer, this will cover exactly what you want"; that she replied that she wanted "a will and nothing more than that." She also testified that she told the attorney that what she expected was a will but that the paper given her to sign was different from what she expected; that she glanced through the paper and it was not what she expected; namely, a will; that nevertheless she signed it. The document she signed was the deed conveying her property to Bernice F. Crawford. She further testified that she did not see either this deed or the deed from Miss Crawford until early in 1938 and she did not know she had signed a deed until about that time.

Mr. Palmer was called as a witness for plaintiff for cross-examination under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He proved a most willing witness for plaintiff. He corroborated her testimony in many important particulars. He testified that Mrs. Palmer wanted to execute a will; that he knew when the deed to Bernice F. Crawford was signed that it was not a will but a deed; that for the first time in his life he put something over on his wife.

The attorney who prepared the deeds was called as a witness. He testified that he had been attorney for Mr. Palmer but had not met Mrs. Palmer prior to May 3, 1929. He further testified that:

"Mr. Palmer came to the office one day just prior to the execution of these joint tenancy deeds. He seemed perturbed—told me that a neighbor lady had been having some trouble over her husband's estate, and was not able to get any money out of it, and it was costing her a lot of money. He wanted to know if there was any way that his and Mrs. Palmer's estate could be fixed so as to avoid that kind of trouble in the event of the death of either of them. I told him my property was in joint tenancy; that in my opinion a joint tenancy estate would be the best for them. I told him also that in the event of the death of either one of them the entire estate would go to the survivor; there was probably more said, but that is the gist of the conversation at that time.

"Q. After this conversation with Mr. Palmer, did you prepare the joint tenancy deeds? A. Yes, I did."

He further testified concerning conversations on May 3rd:

"Mrs. Palmer referred again to the neighbor lady's difficulty over the probate matter; she wanted to be assured that what I was proposing to do would avoid probate, and avoid the trouble that the neighbor was having. At that time she told me that the houses—the property that was described in the deed—it was her separate property; that she had accumulated the money that bought those houses in the nursery business back in Iowa some place. She wanted to know what the effect would be in case of the death of either of them. She said that Mr. Palmer had told her that I had told him (which is a lot of hearsay, of course), that in the event of the death of either one of them the estate would go to the survivor. I told her that that was correct.

"Q. Was there anything further said in that conversation that you recall by Mr. Palmer or Mrs. Palmer and yourself? A. I told Mrs. Palmer that my own and my wife's property was in joint tenancy. I felt that that was the best solution to the problem.

"Q. Did Mr. Palmer make that remark at that time, that you could be trusted to do what was right in the matter? A. My recollection is that he did say something along that line. I don't know just what it was.

"Q. In substance, that they could safely leave the matter in your hands? A. Yes, something of that sort. * * *

"Q. She did tell you, I believe you said, that Mr. Palmer had told her that you had recommended placing the property in joint tenancy? A. Yes, she said that.

"Q. She told you that he had said that on the death of either one of them the property would go to the survivor? A. Yes, she asked me if that was right.

"Q. She asked you if that was right? A. Yes.

"Q. And you told her that it was? A. Yes.

"Q. She also told you that Mr. Palmer had told her that you had said that handling it in that way was saving delay in case of the death of either one of them, and would save costs in the event of the death of either one of them, and would save taxes, perhaps; is that right? A. I don't remember—I don't think there was anything said about taxes. Whether she asked me that or whether I told her—yes, I did tell her that in the event of the death of either one of them it would be a very short procedure and rather inexpensive in comparison with probate, and that they would not be tied up so long.

"Q. And you told her that the way this transaction was handled was by giving the deed—giving of the deed to a third person to operate as a conduit of title, and then deed back from that person to them as joint tenants, did you not? A. In substance, I probably did tell that I had prepared the deed to my stenographer and from the stenographer back to them. I showed her the way the deeds were prepared, and showed her the deeds."

It is also in evidence that Mrs. Palmer had bought and sold property in Iowa and had given and received deeds there; that on four occasions she had bought property in California and had received and kept the four deeds conveying the respective properties to her. It is also in evidence that for twenty years she had conducted a business in Iowa. She had executed a number of wills.

It may be observed that on direct examination Mrs. Palmer appeared to be a witness of average intelligence and possessed of a good memory. On cross-examination her memory was bad and she was evasive to an extreme degree. This may be one of the reasons why the trial court seemed to give little weight to her testimony.

On October 8, 1937, Mr. Palmer was involved in an automobile accident. On March 5, 1938, J. C. Swartzbaugh and Jack Swartzbaugh brought suit against him for damages resulting from this accident. The case was set for trial on May 12, 1938, and went to trial on that day. At the conclusion of the trial the trial judge announced judgment for plaintiffs. On May 26, findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed reciting that plaintiffs were entitled to judgment in the total sum of $15,360.55. Judgment was signed and filed on the same day.

On May 11, 1938, Mr. and Mrs. Palmer signed, acknowledged and had recorded a declaration of homestead on Lots 36 and 37 in Block B of Wallace Heights Tract in San Diego. These lots compose one of the tracts described in the deed from Mr. and Mrs. Palmer to Bernice F. Crawford and in her deed to them as joint tenants. This property is not described in the complaint filed in this action.

On May 24, 1938, plaintiff Adah Palmer executed a grant deed conveying to Rosa L. Keller "my undivided one-half interest" in the property described in this complaint, being the same property described in the deeds to and from Bernice F. Crawford, excepting the property described in the declaration of homestead. On the same day Rosa L. Keller reconveyed this property to plaintiff. These deeds were recorded on June 2, 1938.

The trial court found all necessary facts in favor of the Swartzbaughs and that they had a valid and enforceable lien on an undivided one-half interest in the property described in the complaint. It was also particularly found that prior to May 3, 1929, the property belonged to plaintiff as her separate property; that "it is true that said grant deeds (of May 3, 1929) were and are, and that each of them was and is, valid in every respect; that it is not true that said plaintiff at the time of the execution of the grant deed first in this paragraph mentioned, or at any other time or at all, either did not know that she was executing a deed to said real property or did not intend to execute a deed thereto, but on the contrary that it is true that at said time the said plaintiff knew that she was executing such a deed and intended to execute such a deed; that it is not true that at said time the said plaintiff believed said grant deed first in this paragraph mentioned to be a joint will or any other instrument other than a grant deed; that it is true that the grant deed first in this paragraph mentioned was executed and delivered by said plaintiff and the said O. B. Palmer to the said Bernice F. Crawford for the purpose of vesting title to the real property described therein in the said Bernice F. Crawford as a conduit of title for the purpose of conveying title thereto to said planitiff and the said O. B. Palmer as joint tenants, which last mentioned purpose was effectuated by the execution and delivery, as aforesaid, of the grant deed by the said Bernice F. Crawford to said plaintiff and the said O. B. Palmer, as hereinabove mentioned. * * * That it is true that the execution and delivery of said grant deeds, and each of them, were the result of an idea conceived by said plaintiff, and were not the result of any suggestion by or on the part of the said O. B. Palmer, or of anyone other than the said plaintiff acting under and pursuant to the advice of her attorney."

[1] There is no attack made on the deed from plaintiff to Rosa L. Keller nor upon the deed from her to plaintiff. It follows that the joint tenancy to the property described was thereby broken and that the property was thereafter owned by plaintiff and O. B. Palmer as tenants in common.

The trial court drew the conclusion of law that plaintiff could take nothing by her suit and rendered judgment against her, and that the Swartzbaughs had a valid and enforceable lien upon the one-half interest of O. B. Palmer in the property.

Plaintiff's principal ground of attack on the judgment is that the evidence fails to support the findings. Of course, if the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Palmer be accepted as true in its entirety, and if contrary evidence and inferences to be drawn from the evidence were rejected, we would have to agree with plaintiff and reverse the judgment.

As we have observed, plaintiff furnished some ground for doubting her credibility by her attitude on the witness stand. Mr. Palmer impeached himself when he admitted that he had deliberately attempted to defraud his wife in the transaction of May 3, 1939.

The testimony of the attorney who prepared the deeds clearly indicates that Mrs. Palmer knew she signed a deed and not a will. To a certain extent Mrs. Palmer admitted the truth of this evidence when she grudgingly admitted that she glanced through this paper and knew when she signed it that it was not what she expected. She testified she expected a will.

Mrs. Palmer was not a person entirely ignorant of business affairs. She had conducted a successful business for twenty years in Iowa before coming to California. She had given and received deeds conveying real property. She took entire charge of her property in California and had paid mortgages on it. She had possession of the four deeds conveying title to the San Diego properties to her, the first of which was given in 1914. She had executed several wills.

When plaintiff conveyed "my undivided one-half interest" in the described property to Rosa L. Keller she certainly recognized that she was not the owner of the full title to the property, but that she had a co-tenant with a vested interest in it.

It should be worthy of note that the deed to Bernice F. Crawford and her deed to Mr. and Mrs. Palmer conveyed not only the property described in the complaint but also the property described in the homestead. How the fraud and mistake could go only to property not covered by a homestead, and not to property covered by a homestead and therefore exempt from execution, when all of the properties are described in the deed under attack, is not easy to understand.

[2] It is of course true that if the evidence is conflicting, and there is substantial evidence in the record supporting the findings and judgment, an appellate court cannot reverse the judgment because of conflicts in the evidence.

The evidence of the attorney who drew the deeds dated May 3, 1929, clearly shows that plaintiff knew she signed a deed and not a will. The only question not covered by his evidence is whether or not it was explained to Mrs. Palmer that the deed she signed would vest a present estate in the property in Mr. Palmer.

[3, 4] There is a further rule that must control on this appeal. It is stated in Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 44, 26 A.L.R. 123, as follows: "This court has frequently held that, even though all the facts are admitted or uncontradicted, nevertheless, if it appears that either one of two inferences may fairly and reasonably be deduced from those facts there still remains in the case a question of fact to be determined by the jury (or by the trial judge where the case is tried without a jury), and that the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial judge thereon cannot be set aside by this court on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. Anderson v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 170 Cal. 66, 148 P. 212. In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment. Woodard v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 519, 520, 153 P. 951; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 367, 139 P. 800. 'In reviewing a question of this kind, all the inferences reasonably possible from the evidence favorable to the plaintiff (the prevailing party) must be indulged by this court.' Bandle v. Commercial Bank of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 547, 174 P. 44, 45."

[5] There are strong inferences to be drawn from the evidence that Mrs. Palmer knew the legal effect of deeds and knew that the deeds of May 3, 1929, vested a present estate in her property in O. B. Palmer. We have already summarized that evidence and it is unnecessary to repeat it here. Under the rule last quoted we must also draw those inferences here and must conclude that the findings of fact and that portion of the judgment establishing a valid lien in favor of the Swartzbaughs on an undivided one-half interest in the property described in the complaint and judgment is supported by substantial evidence and must be affirmed.

It is not questioned here and it was not questioned in the court below that plaintiff was and is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property described in the complaint. The trial court so found and that finding is supported by the evidence. It follows that plaintiff was entitled to have her title to an undivided one-half interest in the property described in the complaint quieted in her. The portion of the judgment to the contrary cannot be supported.

The portion of the judgment establishing the lien of the judgment in favor of J. C. Swartzbaugh and Jack Swartzbaugh on the one-half interest of O. B. Palmer in the property described in the complaint and judgment is affirmed.

The portion of the judgment denying plaintiff any relief and refusing to quiet her title to an undivided one-half interest in the same property is reversed with instructions to the trial court to modify its conclusions of law and judgment in accordance with the views just expressed and to enter judgment accordingly.

Neither party will recover costs of appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Ernest Klette, Judge Assigned.

Action to quiet title by H. C. Stromerson and wife against Roger Averill. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal.

Modified and affirmed.

W. M. Conley, Philip Conley, Matthew Conley, and Conley, Conley & Conley, all of Fresno, for appellants.

Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, and David E. Peckinpah and L. N. Barber, both of Fresno, for respondent.

CURLER, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to quiet title brought by H. C. Stromerson and Leone Stromerson, his wife, against Roger Averill. In his amended answer Roger Averill asked that his title be quieted against H. C. Stromerson and wife.

Prior to the transactions involved in this case, H. C. Stromerson had been acquainted with Averill for many years, and had worked under him on several public construction jobs. While Stromerson and wife were living in Los Angeles, California, Averill sought to interest them in going to Madera County, California, for the purpose of farming certain land there. On the 6th of November, 1933, the Stromersons moved to Madera County, and on the 1st day of November, 1933, entered into a contract with Miller & Lux, Inc., a corporation, for the purchase from said corporation of 160 acres of land in Madera County. Subsequently the Stromersons received a loan from the Federal Land Bank with which they paid up the balance due on the 160 acres of land and received a deed from Miller & Lux, Inc., to the land. On the 6th day of March, 1936, H. C. Stromerson entered into a contract with Miller & Lux, Inc., a corporation, wherein he agreed to buy from said corporation a tract of land adjoining the 160 acres already purchased. This later tract of land contained 562.55 acres and was located in Section 19, Township 11 South, Range 16 East, Madera County, California. (Title to the 160 acre piece of land is not involved in this suit.) At the time the Stromersons moved to Madera County, Averill already had associated with him in his land enterprises, a man by the name of P. A. Davis, and a man by the name of J. F. Lincoln. There were some 475 acres of land in Section 10 in said county standing in the name of P. A. Davis, and 650 acres in Section 23, standing in the name of Roger Averill. Upon the Davis land there was a loan of approximately $36,500 from the Federal Land Bank, and upon the land standing in the name of Roger Averill he had borrowed approximately $36,000 from the Federal Land Bank. All of the land, including that standing in the name of Roger Averill, that standing in the name of P. A. Davis, and the land involved in this suit, was jointly farmed. The money for the payment of the land, and for the farming of the same, came from personal advances by Roger Averill, and from money advanced by the San Joaquin Cotton Oil Company, for crops raised, and to be raised on the land, and also from sales of crops to parties other than the Cotton Seed Oil Company.

There is a great deal of evidence bearing upon the transactions and relationships existing between H. C. Stromerson, Roger Averill, P. A. Davis and J. F. Lincoln.

In their pleadings, and throughout the trial, H. C. Stromerson and Leone Stromerson, his wife, maintained that the contract entered into by Miller & Lux, Inc., a corporation, as seller, and H. C. Stromerson, as purchaser, was for the sole benefit of the Stromersons. On the other hand, Roger Averill maintained that in the entire transaction, H. C. Stromerson was acting as his agent.

The trial court found that the contract of purchase pertaining to the 562.55 acres by H. C. Stromerson, on the one part, and Miller & Lux, Inc., a corporation, on the other part, was in truth and in fact the contract of Roger Averill, and that he executed said contract by and through H. C. Stromerson, who was acting as his agent, and that Roger Averill had been in possession of the land ever since the date of the execution of the contract, and that H. C. Stromerson and Leone Stromerson, his wife, had neither in law nor in equity, any right, title or interest in or to the land, and that Roger Averill is in equity the owner of the same, and is entitled to receive a conveyance of said land from Miller & Lux, Inc., a corporation, upon full performance of the terms and conditions of said contract on the part of the purchaser. The trial court then gave judgment quieting the title of Roger Averill, and adjudging that H. C. Stromerson and Leone Stromerson, his wife, have no right, title or interest in the premises. From this judgment H. C. Stromerson and Leone Stromerson, his wife, appeal.

[1] One of the main contentions of the appellants is that their complaint contains the allegation "that the property involved in this suit is the community property of H. C. Stromerson and Leone Stromerson, his wife," and that inasmuch as this allegation is undenied in the amended answer of Roger Averill, that this fact is deemed as admitted and must be considered as found by the court. In the amended answer there is the following denial: "Denies that by reason of said contract of purchase and sale, or otherwise, the plaintiffs, or either of them, became, or ever since have been, or now are, or ever were, the equitable owners, or owners at all, of said real property, or any portion thereof, or the equitable owners, or any owners, of said contract." This appears to be a full denial of any ownership of plaintiffs, or either of them in the contract or the property mentioned therein. The balance of appellants' contentions, with the exception that the court erred in ruling on admissibility of evidence and that the judgment fails to do equity, falls into one class, namely, that agency was not proven, and that if it was proven the evidence admitted violated the parol evidence rule or the statute of frauds. The following sections of the statute of frauds seem to be applicable in this case:

Section 1624, Civ.Code—"The following contracts are invalid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or by his agent: * * * 4. An agreement for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of real property, or of an interest therein; and such an agreement, if made by an agent of the party sought to be charged, is invalid, unless the authority of the agent is in writing, subscribed by the party sought to be charged."

Section 2309, Civ.Code—"An oral authorization is sufficient for any purpose, except that an authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can only be given by an instrument in writing."

Section 2310, Civ.Code—"A ratification can be made only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer an original authority for the act ratified, or where an oral authorization would suffice, by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act, with notice thereof."

[2-4] Applying, first, section 1624, Civ. Code, we find that the term "party sought to be charged" is defined in the case of Harper v. Goldschmidt, 156 Cal. 245, 104 P. 451, 28 L.R.A.,N.S., 689, 134 Am.St.Rep. 124, as meaning the person charged in court with the performance of the obligation. If Miller & Lux, Inc., were being sued for performance of the contract, the section would not avail it, because it signed the contract, and if Stromerson was being sued by Miller & Lux, Inc., the same reasoning would apply to him. If Miller & Lux, Inc., were suing Averill, he could avail himself of this section, and also section 2309, Civ. Code, unless it were held that he had ratified the contract. However, Averill, by appearing in the suit and setting up the claim that he was the real purchaser under the contract, and that he was the equitable owner of the land mentioned in the contract, in effect ratified the action of the agent in entering into the contract. This, however, is a suit between the principal and the agent. It has been repeatedly held that whenever an agent, improperly authorized in the first place, performs acts in the execution of the agency which are ratified by the principal, the principal is entitled to enforce his demands against the agent for anything which the agent has received on his account. McBride v. McCartney, 53 Cal.App. 707, 200 P. 756; Troendle v. Clinch, 125 Cal.App. 147, 13 P.2d 852. These cases were decided at a time when the provisions of sections 1624, 2309 and 2310 of the Civil Code read the same as they now do, and were cases in which the agent was attempting to hide behind the terms of the statute of frauds.

[5] Proof dehors a written contract that one of the named parties thereto signed it as the agent of the real party in interest is not a violation of the rule prohibiting the use of parol evidence to vary the terms of a written contract. Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal.App. 251, 141 P. 224; Hay v. McDonald, 21 Cal.App. 204, 131 P. 74.

[6] It is contended that the decree is fatally defective in its failure to require the defendant to do equity. So far as such a contention applies to payments on the contract, and to the cost of farming the land mentioned therein, we feel that it is unsound. The trial court decided that Stromerson was the agent and employee of Averill, and that he was paid a salary for his efforts. Although the evidence is conflicting as to where the money came from for the operation of the farm and the payments under the conditional sales contract, there was adequate proof to justify the court in believing that it was Averill's money, and although there is no specific finding on this point, it would of necessity follow from the court's decision. However, it is true that the Stromersons are contingently liable for the balance of the payments under the contract with Miller & Lux, Inc., and it would be entirely inequitable in this action to turn the fruits of the contract and the security of the equitable interest in the land over to Averill without requiring him to protect the Stromersons against future liability under the contract.

Appellants claim that numerous errors were committed by the trial court in rulings on admissibility of evidence. We find no errors in the rulings in the rejection or admission of evidence which would justify a reversal of the judgment.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified to require respondent to relieve appellants from their liability under the contract, within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court, and upon such being done, respondent's title in and to the contract and the equitable ownership of the land thereunder be adjudged quieted.

Civ. 12636.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 3, California.

Jan. 29, 1942.

Hearing Denied March 27, 1942.

1. Automobiles ⇐244(11)

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision at street intersection, evidence as to defendant motorist's failure to stop before entering a "through highway" and in continuing to point of impact, and that she could have seen plaintiff's automobile, was sufficient to support implied finding of defendant's negligence. Vehicle Code, § 82.5, St.1937, p. 413; § 577, St.1935, p. 190.

2. Automobiles ⇐244(43)

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision at street intersection when defendant drove into through street without stopping, evidence held to support implied finding of plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence. Vehicle Code, § 82.5, St. 1937, p. 413; § 577, St.1935, p. 190.

3. Appeal and error ⇐216(2)

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision at intersection, in which plaintiff's theory was that defendant failed to stop before entering through street, instruction that any signal of intention to turn right or left should be given continuously during the last 50 feet traveled by defendant's vehicle before turning, was proper and not misleading, in view of defendants' failure to qualify their instruction respecting their hypothesis that a stop was made for the through street at a place less than 50 feet from beginning of the turn. Vehicle Code, § 544(b), St.1935, p. 185.

4. Motions ⇐62
New trial ⇐163(2)

If language used in determining a motion, such as a motion for new trial, identifies with reasonable certainty the order which is made, the order, if otherwise tenable, will be given effect, since language is but a means of conveying thought, and certainty of its meaning is but relative.

5. New trial ⇐163(1)

An order granting a motion for new trial could be no more inclusive than motion therefor. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 657, 659.

6. New trial ⇐130

Where plaintiff's notice of intention to move for a new trial on issue of damage only was based solely on ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict, it could be granted on no other ground. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 657, 659.

7. New trial ⇐163(2)

A statement, in order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial on issue of damages only, that order was based on ground of inadequate damages, construed with language of motion that motion was based on insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict, constituted a specification that legal ground was insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 657, 659.

8. New trial ⇐9

An order granting motion for new trial on issue of damages only, on ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict, was within trial court's discretion. Code Civ.Proc. § 657.

9. New trial ⇐9

Where verdict for plaintiff in personal injury action was for $1,250, in response to claim for $450 doctors' bills, $361 hospital bill, and general damages, and items for doctors and hospitals were not disputed but extent of injuries was seriously contested, the granting of plaintiff's motion for new trial on sole issue of damages because of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict did not constitute an abuse of discretion on theory that, because award of only $439 for general damages was disproportionately small, jury must have compromised question of negligence by its inadequate award of damages. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 657, 659.

10. New trial ⇐163(1)

Under statute providing that, when new trial is granted for insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, order shall so specify in writing and shall be filed with clerk within 10 days, and that otherwise, on appeal from order, it shall be conclusively presumed that order was not based on that ground, a written order for new trial is equally valid whether deposited by clerk in a folder or kept by him in the minute book. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 657, 1003.

11. New trial ⇐163(1)

The purpose of the 1939 Amendment to statute providing that, when new trial is granted on all or part of issues on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict or decision, order shall so specify in writing and shall be filed with clerk within 10 days after motion is granted, and that otherwise on appeal therefrom it will be conclusively presumed that order was not based on that ground, aside from purpose to make requirements applicable to cases tried without as well as to cases tried with a jury, was to set up, in effect, a statute of limitation on time within which trial court can, either by original action or by nunc pro tunc order, specify insufficiency of evidence as ground for an order granting a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 657, 659, 660, 1003.

12. New trial ⇐163(1)

Regardless of statute requiring orders granting new trials on ground of insufficiency of evidence to so specify in writing and to be filed within 10 days, it is fundamental that all orders of a court of record shall be recorded in writing. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 657, 659, 660, 1003.

13. New trial ⇐163(1)

In view of the well-established court practice of determining new trial motions by minute entry, Legislature will not be deemed to have banned such practice in whole or in part unless specific language to that end has been used in statute. Code Civ.Proc. §§ 657, 659, 660, 1003; Prob.Code, § 1221.

14. New trial ⇐163(1)

An order for a new trial on ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain verdict, written on a piece of paper in custody of the clerk by direction of the court and in, or to be placed in, court's minute book, is an "order in writing" "filed with the clerk" within statute requiring such orders to be in writing and filed with the clerk within 10 days; to "file" a document originally meaning to hang it on a string for preservation, but now importing that document shall be placed in official custody of proper person. Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "File", "Filed with the Clerk", and "Order in Writing".

15. Courts ⇐107

It is a rule of construction that a judicial opinion must be construed with reference to facts on which it is based, and language used must be held as referring to the particular case and read in light of circumstances under which it is used, and it is particularly true that incidental statements of conclusions not necessary to decision are not to be regarded as authority.

16. New trial ⇐163(1)

The statute, as amended in 1939, providing that, when motion for new trial is granted for insufficiency of evidence, a written order specifying such grounds shall be filed within 10 days, is "mandatory" and applies to nunc pro tunc orders as well as to original orders. Code Civ.Proc. § 657.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Obiter Dictum".

18. Statutes ⇐243

Where a statute is susceptible of a narrow construction which will require reversal of an order for an error presumed directly contrary to the facts, and also to a liberal and reasonable construction which will give effect to every word and which attains the identical object with same certainty and does not impose unconscionable presumptions contrary to facts or record, court will adopt the latter construction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William S. Baird, Judge.

Action by Edwin F. Cox against Tyrone Power Enterprises, Incorporated, and others, for damages for personal injuries sustained in an automobile collision at a street intersection. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants', and granting plaintiff's, motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Stephen Tighe, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph L. Fainer and Thomas Connell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

This is an intersection automobile collision case, tried before a jury, in which the plaintiff was awarded a verdict of $1,250 for injuries which included multiple fractures of the right knee cap, and in the treatment of which injuries plaintiff had incurred hospital and medical expenses in the aggregate sum of $811.

Both plaintiff and defendants moved for a new trial, plaintiff's motion being limited by his notice of intention to "the issue of damages alone" on the sole ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, while defendants' motion was for a retrial on all issues and was predicated on several grounds including that of insufficiency of the evidence.

The only ruling on such motions was pronounced orally and entered in the clerk's minutes in writing in the following language: "Said motions being presented and argued on all of the grounds set forth in the notices of intention to move for a new trial, it is ordered that plaintiff's motion for a new trial be granted upon the grounds of inadequate damages; that defendants' motion for a new trial be denied." Such entry in writing was made the day the ruling was pronounced.

Defendants appeal from the judgment and from the order denying defendants', and granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial; they advance four propositions as grounds for reversal:

"I. There is no substantial evidence that defendant driver was negligent and on the contrary the preponderance of evidence establishes the negligence of plaintiff.

"II. The court erroneously instructed the jury under the evidence in this case that a left turn signal was required during the last fifty feet of travel.

"III. The court erred in granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial upon the issue of damages alone (if that was the intended effect of the order).

"IV. There is no authority in law for granting plaintiff's new trial motion in this case by an oral order of the court entered in the minutes."

We discuss such propositions in the order in which they are presented but find none of them sustainable.

I. Sufficiency of the Evidence to Sustain the Verdict on the Issues of Negligence and of Contributory Negligence.

[1, 2] The collision occurred in the early afternoon of March 16, 1939, when plaintiff, operating his automobile in a westerly direction on Pico Boulevard, a "through highway" (Vehicle Code, sec. 82.5, St. 1937, p. 413), arrived near the center of the intersection of that highway with Beverly Glen Boulevard, a public street, at the same time that defendant Anne L. Power, driving the defendant corporation's automobile with its consent, in a southerly direction on Beverly Glen, also reached such point. The briefs seem to assume that defendant Power (hereinafter referred to as defendant) was endeavoring to execute a left turn from Beverly Glen easterly onto Pico Boulevard but there is no evidence that she actually started a turn, unless it can be inferred from the positions of the cars as indicated on a diagram (Defendants' Exhibit A) coupled with defendant's statement that she extended her "hand" for a left turn after making the boulevard stop.

Neither car is shown to have been necessarily traveling at an excessive speed in the intersection, but there is substantial (though disputed) evidence that defendant failed to make a stop as required by law before entering the intersection. Vehicle Code, sec. 577, St.1935, p. 190. In this respect, although defendant said that she stopped and remained standing for two or three minutes, plaintiff testified that he observed the defendant's car from a time when it was about sixty feet back from the stop sign, that he expected it to stop, but that it continued on to the point of impact. Defendant testified that after entering the intersection she observed plaintiff's car approaching at a speed of thirty to thirty-five miles per hour, but that she proceeded straight ahead, in low gear, at ten miles per hour, without applying brakes, until the collision occurred. While she stated that her car moved only five or ten feet after she first observed plaintiff's car until they crashed, the jury may well have believed that she saw, or should have seen, plaintiff's car at a greater distance. Plaintiff's speed was fixed by other witnesses at twenty to twenty-five miles per hour. No sound signal was given by defendant. The plaintiff also fixed the point of impact as being north of the center line of Pico and east of the center line of Beverly Glen. The witness Trudeau testified that he saw defendant's car when it was fifteen feet north of the intersection, approximately at the stop sign, traveling fifteen miles per hour, and that it did not stop. He placed the point of impact at, or within ten feet easterly from, the center of the intersection. Police officer Durham found a mark on the street said to have been made by the bumper of plaintiff's car, and fixed the place of impact as three and one-half feet east of the center line of Beverly Glen and eight feet north of the center line of Pico. It was stipulated that persons approaching the involved intersection had "a clear visibility for five or six hundred feet back from either of those two streets."

The foregoing recital of facts disposes of defendants' Point I; such evidence amply supports the implied finding of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence.

II. Instruction to Jury on Law Governing Left Turn.

[3] The trial court instructed the jury that "Any signal of intention to turn right or left shall be given continuously during the last fifty feet traveled by the vehicle before turning." Such instruction accurately quoted the Vehicle Code, section 544(b), St. 1935, p. 185, and although on appropriate request defendants might well have been entitled to have had it specifically qualified with respect to the hypothesis of defendants that the boulevard stop was made at a place less than fifty feet from the beginning of a turn, no such request was made, and on the plaintiff's theory of the case, which negatives any stop and assumes an attempted left turn, the instruction was proper. In any event it does not appear reasonably possible that the jury was misled by the instruction as given. In the case of Johns v. Mecchi, 1931, 116 Cal.App. 31, 2 P.2d 452, cited by appellant herein, the plaintiff appealed and sought a reversal of a judgment for the defendant therein on the ground that such defendant had not given the left turn signal continuously for fifty feet, a stop having been made about thirty-five feet from the point where the accident occurred. Obviously the affirmance of the judgment in that case on the ground that on the theory of the prevailing party that a stop had been made and hence the left turn signal was improper before the stop gives rise to no implication of error in giving the instruction in the case at bar, which was applicable on the theory of the prevailing party here that no stop had been made.

III. New Trial on Issue of Damages Only; Meaning of Order.

Defendants' attack under this point is threefold. They contend in effect that the language used by the court in granting plaintiff's motion for new trial (1) is inadequate to limit the retrial to the issue of damages only; (2) that it does not specify insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict as the ground of the order; and (3) if the order be interpreted to grant a new trial only as to the issue of damages on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence it was an abuse of discretion to so limit it.

[4] (1) Language is but a means of conveying thought; the certainty of its meaning is but relative. If the language used in determining a motion is such as to identify with reasonable certainty the order which is made, such order, if otherwise tenable, will be given effect. Here the plaintiff's motion for new trial was predicated on a document headed "Notice of Intention to Move for New Trial (Upon the issue of damages, only)" and which expressly states that "plaintiff intends to and will move the above entitled court to vacate and set aside the verdict heretofore rendered in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants in the above entitled action, on the issue of damages alone, and to grant the plaintiff, Edwin F. Cox, a new trial on said issue upon the following grounds: I. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict." Section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the "notice shall be deemed to be a motion for a new trial on all the grounds stated in the notice." As hereinabove noted, defendants' notice of intention to move for new trial was general in scope and multiple in grounds. By minute entry the court "ordered that plaintiff's motion for a new trial be granted upon the grounds of inadequate damages; that defendants' motion for a new trial be denied."

[5-8] Since defendants' motion was denied, the only motion which could have been granted was plaintiff's, and the order granting it could be no more inclusive than such motion. Quevedo v. Superior Court, 1933, 131 Cal.App. 698, 702, 21 P.2d 998; Tripcevich v. Compton, 1938, 25 Cal.App.2d 188, 190, 77 P.2d 286. The specific reference (in the order) to the motion serves to emphasize applicability of the proposition recognized in the two last-cited cases that the order must be construed within the limits set up in the motion. (2) This proposition applies not only to determining the limits of the order but also to identifying the ground on which it is based. Since the motion was based solely on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence it could be granted on no other ground (Polk v. Boggs, 1898, 122 Cal. 114, 117, 54 P. 536) and the statement in the order that it was based on "the grounds of inadequate damages," construed with the language of the motion, constitutes a specification that the legal ground was "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict". See Griffey v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 1922, 58 Cal.App. 509, 512, 209 P. 45; Lucerne Country Club v. Beal, 1937, 21 Cal.App.2d 121, 126, 68 P.2d 408; Secreto v. Carlander, 1939, 35 Cal.App.2d 361, 364, 95 P.2d 476. Such order for a new trial on the issue of damages only, on the ground stated, was within the trial court's discretion. Code Civ.Proc., sec. 657; Sanford v. Wilcox, 1936, 13 Cal.App. 2d 193, 194, 56 P.2d 548.

[9] (3) While the evidence amply supports the conclusion that the damages awarded were inadequate, we do not find that it is such as to justify us in concluding, contrary to the trial judge, that the jury compromised the question of negligence by its inadequate award of damages. Such a conclusion on this record would be more speculative than inferential. The verdict here was for $1,250 in response to plaintiff's claim for $450 doctors' bills, $361 hospital bill, and general damages. The items for the doctors and the hospital were not disputed, but the extent of the injuries was seriously contested. The verdict not only awards recovery for all the special damages but includes $439 for general damages. That the general damage award is disproportionately small seems obvious and its inadequacy is the basis for the new trial order. But that merely because we regard the award as too low we must also infer that jurors stultified themselves by bargaining inadequate damages for unjustified liability is a non sequitur.

If such a conclusion is to be reached it must be supported by further circumstances.

In the case of Donnatin v. Union Hardware & Metal Co., 1918, 38 Cal.App. 8, at page 11, 175 P. 26 at page 27, 177 P. 845, the stated doctrine of which is relied upon by defendants, it is pointed out that "As shown by the evidence, there was no contest as to the extent of plaintiff's injuries; hence the real subject of the trial was the question of defendant's alleged negligence, as to which there was no justifiable verdict." (The verdict in that case was for $1.) In the case before us there was substantial contest as to the extent (permanence) of plaintiff's injuries. A medical expert for plaintiff testified that on examination three weeks before the trial he found plaintiff still suffering twenty-five per cent impairment of motion in his injured knee and that at least fifteen per cent impairment would be permanent, but defendants' expert said that more than three months before that date he found the plaintiff wholly recovered; also that plaintiff said he had been discharged from medical care approximately six months before the trial date. The conclusion which appears most reasonable to us from consideration of the entire record is that the jury correctly determined the issues of negligence and contributory negligence and that the granting of plaintiff's motion for a new trial solely on the issue of damages was within the discretion of the trial judge, who, as well as the jury, heard the evidence. Defendants suggest that (as asserted in the case of Zeller v. Reid, 1938, 26 Cal.App. 2d 421, 425, 426, 79 P.2d 449) the cases of Donnatin v. Union Hardware & Metal Co., 1918, supra; Bencich v. Market Street Railway Co., 1937, 20 Cal.App.2d 518, 67 P.2d 398, and Wallace v. Miller, 1938, 26 Cal.App.2d 55, 78 P.2d 745, are not necessarily inconsistent with Tripcevich v. Compton, 1938, supra. Regardless of any question of harmony among these decisions, we believe that the case before us is more akin to the case last cited and to Zeller v. Reid, supra, than to the others. Certainly we find no factual basis impelling us to hold that the order as made constituted an abuse of discretion, and we do not interpret any of the cited cases as requiring such a holding on the record before us.

IV. Validity of Minute Entry of Order Granting New Trial on Ground of Insufficiency of the Evidence.

[10] The decision of this point depends wholly on the question whether section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1939 requires that an order granting a motion for new trial made solely on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision be inscribed on a piece of paper and deposited with the clerk otherwise than as a minute order is written and deposited with that officer; in other words, is an order on that ground, which would be valid if the paper on which it is written were deposited by the clerk in a folder, invalid if it is placed or kept by him in the minute book? We are satisfied that under a reasonable interpretation of the law the order is equally efficacious in either case.

In order to determine the intention and purpose of the legislature in making the amendments of 1939 (to Code Civ.Proc., sec. 657) it is necessary to consider briefly the history of that portion of the section which was amended. Prior to the year 1919 there was no requirement that an order granting a new trial specify the ground on which it was based and such an order, when general in terms, would be affirmed on appeal if sustainable on any ground stated in the motion. Rahmel v. Rost, 1918, 178 Cal. 15, 171 P. 1068. An order based on insufficiency of the evidence was sustainable if there was any appreciable conflict in the evidence (Newman v. Overland Pacific Ry. Co., 1901, 132 Cal. 73, 74, 64 P. 110), and it was the practice for appellate courts to assume, unless precluded by the order or by absence of that ground from the motion, that insufficiency of the evidence was the ground (see 2 Cal.Jur. 892, and cases cited under note 13). The courts indulged this practice to the extent shown in Newman v. Overland Pac. Ry. Co., 1901, supra, where the minute order being in general terms, although the court filed a written "opinion" specifying a different ground, it was presumed that insufficiency of the evidence was the legal ground on which the general order was based. The court said, at page 75 of 132 Cal., at page 111 of 64 P.: "This rule of procedure is not affected by the fact that at the time of making the order the court files an opinion in support of its action, wherein it discusses one or more of the grounds presented. The order which is entered in the minutes is the only record of the court's actions, and is to be measured by its terms, and not by the reasons which the court may give for it." Apparently in an effort to stop the practice illustrated by the last-cited case, the legislature in 1919 added a new paragraph to section 657 reading, "When a new trial is granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order, it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground." (Stats. 1919, p. 142, chap. 100.) In 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 841, chap. 479) this paragraph was again amended so that (up to 1939) it read: "When a new trial is granted, on all or part of the issues, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground."

The amendments of 1939, with which we are particularly concerned, add to the same paragraph the words "or decision" after the word "verdict," to make the provisions applicable to trials without as well as to trials with a jury, apparently taking cognizance of the decision in Gruben v. Leebrick & Fisher, Inc., 1938, 32 Cal.App.2d Supp. 762, 84 P.2d 1078; add, after the word "specify," the words "this in writing and shall be filed with the clerk within ten days after the motion is granted"; also add the word "conclusively" in the stated presumption, so that the material provisions as now cast, read: "When a new trial is granted, on all or part of the issues, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict or decision, the order shall so specify this in writing and shall be filed with the clerk within ten days after the motion is granted; otherwise, on appeal from such order it will be conclusively presumed that the order was not based upon that ground." (Italics added.)

[11] No court or seasoned member of the legal profession will doubt that the purpose of the legislature in enacting the above quoted amendments of 1939, other than to make the quoted requirements applicable to cases tried without as well as to cases tried with a jury, was to set up, in effect, a statute of limitation on the time within which a trial court can, either by original action or by nunc pro tunc order, specify insufficiency of the evidence as a ground for an order granting a new trial. The time within which a notice of intention to move for new trial may be filed is limited (Code Civ.Proc., sec. 659) as is the time within which the motion must be passed upon by the court (Code Civ.Proc., sec. 660), and it seems entirely logical, particularly in view of the broad discretion vested in the trial judge in passing on motions based upon insufficiency of the evidence, that there be a limitation on the time, after actual granting of the motion, within which the fact that this particular ground is a basis for the order, if such be the truth, actually shall be made a matter of record "in writing * * * filed with the clerk."

It may be inferred with confidence that the legislature, in order to accomplish its purpose, deemed it necessary to require both that the ground be specified in writing and placed of record with the clerk within the limited period because it could be contemplated that records inevitably would appear before courts of appeal, declaring, by virtue of nunc pro tunc action subsequent to the ten-day period, that the trial court's records as originally inscribed failed to specify the mooted ground only through inadvertence, it having been truly a basis of the order (sustainable on no other ground)—and without the dual requirement, certainly such nunc pro tunc order, under a long line of cases, would prevail.

That the purpose of the legislature to establish such a limitation of time is attained equally well whether the entry "in writing * * * filed with the clerk" be in a folder in his official custody or in a minute book in his official custody, is obvious. If the paper, bearing a sufficient recital, is in the official custody of the clerk within the time limited, the object of the legislation has been accomplished.

[12] That an order inscribed on a sheet of paper by direction of the court is an order in writing equally whether that sheet of paper be placed in a minute book or loose in a folder is apparent from the mere statement of the fact. That the word "order" used as a noun in the Code of Civil Procedure, by its very definition requires a writing, and that the legislature in originally providing for "motions" and "orders" generally, contemplated that an order in writing was an order in writing, of equal efficacy, whether made on a loose sheet of paper and deposited in a folder or inscribed on a page in a minute book, becomes apparent upon reading section 1003 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "Every direction of a court, judge, or justice, made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment, is denominated an order. An application for an order is a motion." (Italics added.) Regardless of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is fundamental that all orders of a court of record shall be recorded in writing.

[13] In determining the intention of the legislature it seems of some significance that in making the amendments of 1939 it did not require that the order be signed. The legislature apparently took cognizance of court practices. There is probably no more well established court practice than that of determining new trial motions by minute entry. Had the legislature desired to ban that practice in whole or in part it would seem logical that specific language to that end should have been used. Particularly is this true with respect to a differentiation between orders to be entered in the minute-book and orders to be "signed by the judge and filed" in view of the precise language used by the legislature in making that discrimination elsewhere. In section 1221 of the Probate Code it is stated that, "All orders and decrees of the court or judge must be entered at length in the minute-book of the court, or else signed by the judge and filed; but decrees of distribution must always be so entered at length." Here we find certainty of differentiation between and identification of the two methods of placing orders of record, and also an apparent recognition that entry at length in the minutes is the more formal and desirable method for publishing and preserving the highly important decree of distribution.

[14] We should note also that the amendment does not require that the order be filed "by" the clerk; it says filed "with" him. To "file" a document originally meant to hang it on a string for preservation (16 Words and Phrases, Perm.Ed., 531; Holman v. Chevaillier's Adm'r, 1855, 14 Tex. 337, 339), but the word now imports that the document shall be placed in the official custody of a proper person. "Filing a paper consists in presenting it at the proper office, and leaving it there, deposited with the papers in such office." Tregambo v. Comanche, etc., Mining Co., 1881, 57 Cal. 501; Hoyt v. Stark, 1901, 134 Cal. 178, 180, 66 P. 223, 86 Am.St.Rep. 246; Dillon v. Superior Court, 1914, 24 Cal.App. 760, 765, 142 P. 503. In furtherance of the strict construction of the statute sought by defendants (appellants) it might be urged that to be filed "by" the clerk entailed placing of an endorsement on the filed paper and depositing it in a folder or "file." But that the words "filed with the clerk" are used contemporaneously in a much broader sense is evidenced by the highest judicial authority in this state. In Bastajian v. Brown, 1941, 19 Cal.2d 209, 120 P.2d 9, on pages 10, 11, we find the quoted words used to depict the mere placing of papers in the custody of a clerk, not to be filed "by" him but to be handed to the judge. Surely an order written on a piece of paper in the official custody of the clerk, by direction of the court, and in, or to be placed in, the court's minute-book, is as effectively "filed with the clerk" as is a paper temporarily in his possession for the purpose of handing it to the judge. A somewhat similar usage of the word "file" also occurs in People v. Tomalty, 1910, 14 Cal.App. 224, 232, 111 P. 513, 516, wherein the court says, "The account books of the treasurer, as such, are constructed in the treasurer's office, the records are made in such office, but when made they become and are records of the office, and are then on file and on deposit in such office, and are in the official custody and keeping of the treasurer."

It can scarcely be argued with conviction that the paper bearing the order was not "filed with the clerk" merely because he and not the judge or a party acted as scrivener. There is nothing in the statute which precludes the clerk from performing his usual duties in the premises or which suggests that the validity of the order depends on whose hand writes it. Permissively, provision is made that, "The court may direct a party to prepare the order," but the very fact that this provision is expressly permissive and that there is no mandatory requirement as to preparation, service of a copy, or signing, suggests contemplation by the legislature that this order normally, like the majority of all orders, might be prepared by the clerk, in routine discharge of his duties at the direction of the judge. The fact that this permission is declared seems, upon this analysis, not persuasive that the legislature intended to ban minute orders upon the ground specified. In almost all cases in this jurisdiction (for exception as to decrees of distribution, see Probate Code, sec. 1221) it is discretionary with the trial judge whether orders granting or denying motions made in open court be written in the minute-book or on loose paper; under either procedure it is not uncommon practice for counsel to suggest or for the judge to request, that an attorney for a party prepare, or assist in preparing, the form of order. Forms of orders intended to be signed by the judge and filed otherwise than as minute orders are more likely to be the subject of preparation by counsel on direction of the judge, but this method is not exclusive; such forms of orders for signature are often prepared by the clerk. Likewise, forms of minute orders are more likely to be prepared by the clerk, but probably every trial lawyer of mature experience has had occasion many times, either on his own initiative or by request of the judge, to himself prepare the form of minute order to be entered in a case requiring some unusual technical exactitude. Such is precisely the case of an order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision. It is a case, since the amendments of 1939, demanding some technical exactitude in preparation of the order, but not requiring an order signed by the judge, and hence is exactly the type of case in which the trial judge, either on his own initiative or by request of counsel, might occasionally want to direct counsel to prepare the order for entry in the minute-book.

[15] Our attention has been directed to no case in which a court of appellate jurisdiction has had presented to it the precise point which we must determine. We have discovered two cases, not discussed in the briefs, in which the amendments of 1939 (to Code Civ.Proc, sec. 657) which we are considering were before the District Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, respectively (Thomas v. Driscoll, 1940, 42 Cal. App.2d 23, 108 P.2d 43, and Whitley v. Superior Court, 1941, 18 Cal.2d 75, 113 P.2d 449), and some language is included in the decisions of those cases which, if it had been used when actually considering our problem, would probably determine it contrary to the conclusion we reach here. But it is a rule of construction that "a judicial opinion must be construed with reference to the facts on which it is based, the language used must be held as referring to the particular case, and read in the light of the circumstances under which it is used" 21 C.J.S., Courts, § 222, p. 409. Particularly is it true that incidental statements of conclusions not necessary to the decision are not to be regarded as authority. People v. McAllister, 1940, 15 Cal.2d 519, 523, 102 P.2d 1072; Hills v. Superior Court, 1929, 207 Cal. 666, 670, 279 P. 805, 65 A.L.R. 266. Neither the Thomas case nor the Whitley case involved a construction of the statute on the point we are considering.

In the Thomas case (Thomas v. Driscoll, 1940, supra, 42 Cal.App.2d 23, 108 P.2d 43) the court was concerned not at all with the validity of a minute order specifying insufficiency of the evidence as the sole ground of the order, entered in writing within ten days after oral granting of the motion; there was before it only the question of validity of a nunc pro tunc order made after the expiration of the time limited. The court itself makes the distinction when it says, at page 26, of 42 Cal.App.2d, at page 45 of 108 P.2d: "There was no written order granting a new trial upon insufficiency of the evidence until the nunc pro tunc order of July 17th, five and one-half months after entry of the minute order." As to its conclusion we are entirely in accord with the statement on page 27 of 42 Cal.App.2d, on page 46 of 108 P.2d that, "If the court could make a nunc pro tunc order in cases where the grounds are the insufficiency of the evidence five months after the granting of the motion for a new trial, it would thereby effectively abrogate the statute which emphatically proscribes such an order after the lapse of the time designated. * * * It was to prevent just such entries that the legislature must have intended by the amendment." (Italics added.)

[16, 17] The case of Whitley v. Superior Court, 1941, supra, was an application for a writ of certiorari to annul two nunc pro tunc orders purporting to grant a motion for new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The court itself states the problem before it as follows (18 Cal.2d page 77, 113 P.2d page 451): "The question for decision on this appeal, therefore, is whether these nunc pro tunc orders awarding a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence are valid, since neither was made within ten days after the motion was granted or 'filed with the clerk'." On such question the court concluded, as stated on page 82 of 18 Cal.2d, on page 453 of 113 P.2d, "that the legislature by its amendment to section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, subdivision 7, intended to make it mandatory that a written order granting a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict or decision be filed within ten days after the motion is granted or not at all, and that this time limitation applies to nunc pro tunc orders as well as to original orders made pursuant to this statutory provision." With that conclusion we are, of course, wholly in accord. There is, however, a statement on page 81 of 18 Cal.2d on page 453 of 113 P.2d that, "The entry of the minute order on May 28, 1940 [which specified insufficiency of the evidence as its ground], did not satisfy the requirement that a written order specifying the insufficiency of the evidence be filed within ten days after the motion is granted." Descriptive of this statement, so far as it appears to affect the case before us, is the language of the Supreme Court speaking through Mr. Justice Curtis in Hills v. Superior Court, 1929, supra, 207 Cal. page 670, 279 P. page 807, 65 A.L.R. 266, "It is quite evident that the question * * * was not before the court, and therefore that any language found in the opinion purporting to determine that question was not necessary for the decision of said appeal, and must be regarded as obiter dictum."

We have, in the case now before us, no nunc pro tunc order; we have here no attempted modification or correction of an order; we have here no failure to enter an order within the time provided; we have here no neglect to specify that the order was made on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. We do have filed with the clerk a notice of intention to move for new trial "on the issue of damages alone" on the sole ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; we do have the presumption declared by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "said notice shall be deemed to be a motion for a new trial on all the grounds [the sole ground] stated in the notice"; we do have the order of the court stated in writing (Code Civ.Proc., sec. 1003), which order in writing was on deposit with the clerk as a part of the court's official records within ten days after the order was made, and which order in writing, construed with the notice of intention, does unmistakably specify "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict" as its sole ground.

[18] But because it is the sole ground and because the paper on which it is inscribed is kept by the clerk in the minute-book instead of in a folder, defendants (appellants) contend that an order in writing has not been filed with the clerk, that the conclusive presumption is operative, and that we must regard the order as groundless. If we adopt defendants' strict construction of the law this court will be in the abhorrent position of legally setting up and acting on the fiction of a hypothesis, the utter falsity of which appears of record; we shall be required to reverse an order for an error presumed directly contrary to the fact; all this by virtue of an unnecessarily narrow construction of language which is equally subject to a liberal and reasonable construction that gives effect to every word, attains the identical object with the same certainty, and does not impose the unconscionable presumption contrary to the facts of record. Under such circumstances, we deem it our plain duty to adopt the latter construction. See Martin v. Gibson, 1941, 48 Cal.App.2d 449, 119 P.2d 1012; Code Civ.Proc., secs. 4 and 1866; In re LaBelle, 1940, 37 Cal.App.2d 32, 98 P.2d 778.

Another consideration strongly supports the conclusion we have reached. The procedure of recording orders determining new trial motions by minute entry is as old as our judicial system. It is inevitable that a statute radically altering that procedure in one isolated application, making it void as to an order granting a motion for new trial on one particular ground but leaving it with full vitality as to an order denying that same motion or granting it on any other ground, will constitute a trap for the unwary (see People v. Bryant, 1929, 207 Cal. 450, 452, 278 P. 1025) and produce a multiplicity of miscarriages of justice before its mischievous form can be remedied by further legislative action. It would be unjustifiable to place a strict and narrow construction on the statute to attain such an unfortunate result when the same enactment reasonably construed accomplishes every good object sought, but without the mischief.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PARKER WOOD, J., concurred.

SHINN, Justice (concurring).

I concur. I am in agreement with all that is said in the main opinion including the conclusion stated.

There is an additional reason which in my opinion requires us to hold that there was no deficiency in the proceedings for a new trial which prevents us from recognizing insufficiency of the evidence as the ground upon which the order granting a new trial was based. I am unable to see that the provision of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, which requires that an order granting a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence shall so state, has any application to an order granting such a motion which has been noticed and presented upon that ground alone.

By the several amendments of the section certain definite procedural improvements have been accomplished through the elimination of practices which had proven themselves to be unsatisfactory. These are pointed out in the main opinion and I shall refer to them but briefly. It was desired to remove all uncertainty in the consideration of appeals from orders granting new trials as to whether such orders had been granted upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. That objective was attempted to be reached by the amendment of 1919 and was accomplished by the amendment of 1929. The uncertainty that had theretofore existed arose from the failure to state in orders granting new trials whether insufficiency of the evidence was one of the grounds or the sole ground for the order. Of course there never was any uncertainty in situations in which insufficiency of the evidence was specified in the notice of intention as the sole ground of the motion, which is the one before us. The order and the notice of intention must be read together. The notice of intention is deemed to be the motion upon all grounds specified in the notice. Code Civ.Proc., sec. 659. The notice is the first step in the proceeding and is essential to give the court jurisdiction to grant a new trial, and to it the court must look for a statement of the grounds which may be considered and acted upon by the court in granting the motion. Where it appears that there was a notice specifying legal grounds it will not be presumed that the court granted the motion upon a ground not specified in the notice or upon no ground whatever. The same presumptions as to regularity of procedure apply to orders as apply to judgments or other judicial acts. Code Civ.Proc., sec. 1963, subds. 15, 16; Galvin v. Palmer, 1901, 134 Cal. 426, 66 P. 572.

It is almost invariably the case that several grounds are stated in the notice, including insufficiency of the evidence, and it was due to this widely used practice that the amendments of 1919 and 1929 were considered necessary for the purpose of removing uncertainty as to the basis of the orders in such cases. The fact that it was not essential that corrective legislation be provided for those cases where no uncertainty existed does not necessarily limit the scope of the amendments but it does aid materially in ascertaining what the purpose and intention of the legislature were in amending the section. Where one construction of a statute will attribute to the legislature reasonable and purposeful motives and another will lead to absurd and unjust consequences which the legislature could not have reasonably or fairly intended to bring about, it is our duty to adopt the first construction if we can do so without exercising the forbidden legislative function. If we should hold that the amendments were intended to apply to the facts before us, where the sole ground of the motion was insufficiency of the evidence (laying aside for the moment the holding of the main opinion that the record shows full compliance), we would have to say that notwithstanding the indisputable fact that the motion was granted upon the sole ground of insufficiency of the evidence, it will be conclusively presumed that it was not. We would then have to reverse the order, not because of any uncertainty or deficiency of the record to speak the truth, but because we would have decided that the legislature, through ignorance or indifference, had imposed upon the courts a wholly superfluous formality of procedure which not only bordered upon the absurd, but served no purpose, accomplished no improvement over established practices, either by the correction of existing evils or otherwise, substituted fiction for fact in the courts' records, multiplied instead of reducing the opportunities for clerical errors, and without reason or necessity unjustly deprived a litigant of a substantial right. I cannot believe that the legislature intended anything of the sort. Awareness of the fact that the legislative function has taken on a vastness of proportion and complexity hitherto unknown should restrain the courts from holding to too narrow a conception of their own powers of interpretation and should incline them to be as helpful as possible in forwarding the obvious purposes of remedial legislation.

These, in brief, are the reasons which have inclined me to the opinion that the requirement that the ground of insufficiency of the evidence must be stated in the order was not intended to apply to a case where such specification already appears in the record.

It seems unnecessary to cite or discuss the several rules of statutory construction which have application to such a situation. I know of none which under a fair application would require this court to reach a conclusion contrary to the one herein expressed. They all harmonize with the fundamental rule stated by Mr. Justice Field in United States v. Kirby, 1869, 7 Wall. 482, 486, 19 L.Ed. 278, that "General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or an absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language, which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter." General terms only are before us for construction. The duty of recognizing a proper occasion for an exception to those general terms furnishes the reason for this separate concurrence.

The requirement as to making the order a matter of record within ten days after it is made, which of course can only be done in writing, as in the case of all orders, applies to the present case only to the extent that it places a limit of time upon the act of completing the record in the new trial proceeding. Too often that had been done under the former practice through the medium of nunc pro tunc orders made long after the time had elapsed for ruling upon the motion, the evil of which, as stated in the main opinion, led to the amendment of 1939. However, it means no more in cases of the class we are considering than that an order consisting of a direction of the judge to the clerk, if such could be called an order, cannot remain in the embryo state of a mere good intention for more than ten days. The order now before us was entered promptly, and had it been couched in general terms, without specifying insufficiency of the evidence, it would have been sufficient to comply with the requirement as to filing, as well as with the requirement for specification of the ground therefor, when read with the notice of intention.

GOLD MINING & WATER CO. v. SWINERTON et al.

Civ. 6602.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 27, 1942.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Feb. 21, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 23, 1942.

1. Mines and minerals ⇐66

In action for damages for breach of gold mining lease, evidence sustained finding that lessees repudiated the lease on ground of lessor's refusal to consent to assignment of the lease.

2. Mines and minerals ⇐66

The doctrine of "anticipatory breach", which is a breach committed before the time has come when there is a present duty of performance and is the outcome of words or acts evincing an intention to refuse performance in the future, applied to relationship of landlord and tenant under a gold mining lease.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Anticipatory Breach".

3. Mines and minerals ⇐70(2)

The rule that lessee's repudiation of a lease does not at once mature the installments of rent not due so as to make them recoverable at once as rent does not apply to a gold mining lease where consideration for use and occupancy of premises is not a fixed sum but is based upon a percentage of the gross yield of gold extracted in mining operation.

4. Licenses ⇐43
Mines and minerals ⇐82

The rule of "profit à prendre" which is the right to take something out of the soil of another as a right of common and also some minor rights as a right to fish, hunt, and hawk or to mine metals, dig for oil or take oil from the land, applies to extraction of gold.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Profit à Prendre".

5. Mines and minerals ⇐68(2)

A lessor under gold mining lease which provides for consideration for use and occupancy of premises on basis of a percentage of gross yield of gold extracted in mining operation has right to insist that lessee proceed with the operation of mining and extracting the gold and is entitled to the equivalent of full performance just as he would for the anticipatory breach of any other contract.

6. Mines and minerals ⇐70(6)

Where gold mining lease provided that 300,000 yards of auriferous gravel should be worked the first year and evidence disclosed that there were over 300,000 yards of gravel which carried a value in gold of $150,000, and lease provided for a gross royalty of ten per cent., court adopted proper measure of damages in awarding to lessor $15,000 for failure to conduct mining operations.

7. Mines and minerals ⇐68(2)

The doctrine of anticipatory breach applied to lessor's action before breach of gold mining lease for lessee's failure to make improvements upon mining property as required by the lease.

8. Mines and minerals ⇐70(6)

Lessees who failed to make improvements upon mining property as required by gold mining lease were properly required to pay as damages the cost of making the improvements even if damages were required to be based upon injury done to the reversion, since if the improvements cost a certain sum the value of property or the reversion would be enhanced to that extent.

9. Trial ⇐54(1)

In action for breach of gold mining lease for lessees' failure to make improvements as required by lease, a letter written by lessor's president to lessees' counsel prior to execution of lease to effect that cost of improvements had been budgeted at certain sum, which letter was offered in evidence and its effect not limited to purposes of impeachment, was in evidence for all purposes and could be considered by court in determining amount of damages recoverable for failure to make the improvements.

10. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)

Lessees who were required to pay a certain sum as damages for failure to make improvements upon mining property could not complain that court arrived at such sum solely by reason of a letter introduced in evidence which had been written by lessor's president to lessees' counsel prior to execution of lease stating that cost of improvements had been budgeted at a sum which equaled the sum awarded, notwithstanding court stated that the sum awarded was the amount "contemplated on" by the parties as the cost of improvements, where court's findings disclosed that the amount awarded was not based solely upon such letter.

11. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)

The appellate court must adopt that construction of findings which will support the judgment.

12. Mines and minerals ⇐68(2)

That lessor of gold mining land lost lessor's rights in the lease subsequent to date when lease was breached by lessees did not affect lessor's right to recover damages for breach of such lease, since right of action accrued on date of breach prior to date when lessor lost its rights.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Gold Mining and Water Company against A. B. Swinerton and others to recover damages for breach of a mining lease. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Hartley F. Peart and Howard Hassard, both of San Francisco, for appellant Swinerton.

Edward R. Solinsky, of San Francisco, for appellant Morrison.

John L. McNab and S. C. Wright, both of San Francisco, and Virgil Airola, of San Andreas, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice.

This action was brought to recover damages for breach of a mining lease. The first cause of action concerns an agreement by appellants to make certain improvements upon the mining property, while the second arises out of the alleged failure of appellants to conduct mining operations. Findings were made in favor of respondent upon both causes of action, and judgment entered upon the first in the sum of $25,000, and upon the second in the sum of $15,000. The appeal is from the judgment.

On and prior to the 21st day of September, 1937, plaintiff was the owner of certain real property in the county of Calaveras, and water rights connected therewith. It also held a lease and option to purchase from the Emery Company, covering contiguous mining ground, ditches, reservoirs and water rights. Through all of said property ran an ancient river channel, containing auriferous gravel, thirty to one hundred feet beneath the surface, and extending for over a mile through said property. In early days the channel had been mined in several places by hydraulic process. Practically all of the improvements to be made were upon the Emery property, and they were connected with the development of a water supply for mining, together with a system of ditches. It was provided in the Emery lease that all such improvements should revert to the lessor upon the termination of its lease to respondent.

[1] It is first contended by appellants that there is no evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court that they repudiated the lease. We are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding. Defendant Swinerton testified as follows, with respect to what took place at a conference between him and the officers of plaintiff corporation on November 11, 1937—about a month and a half after the lease had been executed:

"Q. But you did state on that occasion that neither you nor Morrison would proceed under the lease? A. I could not speak for Morrison, but I said as far as I am concerned I would have nothing further to do with the contract unless they would assign the contract."

Defendant Morrison gave the following version of the same meeting:

"Q. In what connection did he make the statement that he was going away to Europe? A. After the discussion, we started to leave and he said he was going to Europe the next day.

"Q. Was it at that time he stated they could either consent to the assignment, or cancel? A. He made the statement 'cancel the lease' in the same sentence when he asked for permission to assign.

"Q. You were present during the entire conversation? A. I was.

"Q. Did you participate in the conversation? A. Very little.

"Q. To what extent? A. The conversation started out by discussing the effect on the Gold Mining and Water Company of a change in the royalty provisions, changing from a sliding scale to a straight ten per cent, providing that prospecting showed yardage to justify.

"Q. Who brought up that subject? A. I imagine, I think it was Mr. Swinerton, but I don't recall who did.

"Q. Did you participate in that discussion? A. I did.

"Q. Did you request a change in the lease? A. I joined Mr. Swinerton in his request, when he said that.

"Q. And when he made his statement that they could either accept an assignment of this lease, or cancel it, did you join in that also? A. Yes.

"Q. And you left the office with him? A. I did.

"Q. When you left the office, it was with the distinct understanding in your mind, was it not, that if they did not consent to the assignment of this lease to Mr. Johnson, you would both be through with the property? A. Yes. * * *"

The conference arose out of a request made previously by appellants for permission from respondent to assign the lease. Such permission was denied. The foregoing evidence, together with other testimony in the record, was sufficient to support a finding that appellants had repudiated the lease, and brought the action clearly within the principle announced in 17 C.J.S., Contracts, § 472a, page 973:

"Strictly an 'anticipatory breach' of a contract is one committed before the time has come when there is a present duty of performance, and it is the outcome of words or acts evincing an intention to refuse performance in the future. Where a party bound by an executory contract repudiates his obligation before the time for performance, the promisee has, according to the great weight of authority, an option to treat the contract as ended so far as further performance is concerned, and to maintain an action at once for the damages occasioned by such anticipatory breach."

It is contended, however, by appellants that the doctrine of anticipatory breach is not applicable. They rely upon the case of Bradbury v. Higginson, 162 Cal. 602, 123 P. 797. That case involved the sufficiency of the complaint. It was alleged that the parties, on December 13, 1904, executed a lease to certain real property, at a monthly rental of $100 per month, for a term of five years; that the rental was paid up to and including the month of June, 1909, and that on August 17, 1909, the defendants repudiated the lease. Judgment was prayed for in the sum of $600. This was the entire rental due to the end of the term. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the answer, and gave judgment for said amount. This judgment was reversed, with directions to dismiss the action. It was held that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, upon the ground that the lessor was not entitled to recover rental which was to accrue subsequent to the date of the repudiation. The decision turned upon the measure of damages—a matter of evidence and proof rather than a question of substantive law. This clearly appears from the following language found on pages 608, 609 of 162 Cal., page 800 of 123 P.:

"But is argued that the plaintiff had the right to recover on the doctrine of 'anticipatory breach.' Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 1, 96 P. 884. That is to say, that the defendant's repudiation of the obligations of his lease gave the plaintiff the right to treat the entire contract as broken, and to recover at once the damage sustained by such breach. But in an action to recover for such breach, the measure of damage would be, not the total rent reserved, but the difference between the rent to accrue and the value of the remaining portion of the term. See cases cited in the foregoing opinion of James, J. The complaint does not aver that plaintiff has sustained any damage by the defendant's repudiation, nor does it state any facts from which the amount of such damage may be inferred. It avers merely the nonpayment for two months, and the repudiation, and then asks judgment for $600. There is no allegation that the premises could not have been rented, during the rest of the term, for an amount equal to the rent agreed to be paid by the defendant."

[2] We are therefore unable to agree with appellants when they state that the doctrine of anticipatory breach does not apply to the relationship of landlord and tenant.

[3-5] The court also observes that there was contained in plaintiff's complaint no statement that she was damaged other than by the rental which would become due thereafter. We are of the opinion that other damage not so arising might be recovered in a similar action. We believe that the rule in the Bradbury case does not apply to a lease of the character we have here, where the consideration for the use and occupancy of the premises is not a fixed sum, but is based upon a royalty—in this case, a percentage of the gross yield of gold extracted in the mining operation. Turning to another branch of mining, the common oil and gas lease under which the lessee is entitled to enter the premises of the lessor and develop and remove oil or gas is a "profit à prendre." The latter expression is defined as "a right to take something out of the soil of another, as a right of common, and also some minor rights as a right to fish, hunt, and hawk, or to mine metals, dig for oil, take oil from the land." Richfield Oil Co. v. Hercules Gasoline Co., 112 Cal.App. 431–434, 297 P. 73. The same rule applies to extraction of gold. Such principles do not apply to a lease of the character involved in the Bradbury case. The lessee here is obligated to do more than merely pay a fixed monetary consideration. He must proceed with the usual mining operations. If no gold is found, the lessor receives nothing by way of rental or royalty. The cases cited by appellants point out the injustice which would result if the lessor could recover future rent and then proceed to lease the property again. Here, the lessor may still have the gold in the ground, but this is a far cry from having it in his hand. He has a right to insist that the lessee proceed with the operation of mining and extracting the gold. It is idle to say that he could contract with another to proceed with the same operation. In such a case he is entitled to the equivalent of full performance, just as he would for the anticipatory breach of any other contract. In 12 Am.Jur. § 392, page 970, it is said:

"A majority of the courts have reached the conclusion that a renunciation of a contract before the time for performance, which amounts to a refusal to perform it at any time, gives the adverse party the option to treat the entire contract as broken and to sue immediately for damages as for a total breach."

We are therefore of the opinion that the rule laid down in the Bradbury case is not applicable to the situation here.

[6] It is next contended by appellants that the trial court adopted the wrong measure of damages in respect to the award of $15,000. We think there was sufficient evidence to justify the award. The lease provided that 300,000 yards of gravel should be worked the first year—1937–1938. The evidence showed that there was over 300,000 yards of gravel, and that it carried a value, in gold, of fifty cents per yard. This would make a gross value of $150,000. The lease provided for a gross royalty of ten per cent, which is the amount for which judgment was given. A leading authority upon the measure of damages in a case of this character is Texas Pacific Coal & Oil Co. v. Barker, 117 Tex. 418, 6 S.W.2d 1031, 1032, 60 A. L.R. 936, which involved a lease providing for royalty arising from oil to be extracted from the premises. It was alleged that the lessee (plaintiff in error) had breached the terms of the lease, in the following particulars:

"That after drilling said well, plaintiff in error moved away its drilling equipment and tools, and since failed and refused to further drill or test the land, or to permit any other person to drill or test the land, notwithstanding the oil and gas in the land were being drained away by numerous specified wells within short distances of the land—all in violation of the express and implied covenants of the lease binding plaintiff in error to fully develop the oil and gas in said premises and to protect the minerals on said premises from drainage from nearby wells on adjacent lands * * *."

The court held that the measure of damages for such breach was the agreed royalty upon all oil and gas which the proof showed was in the ground and should have been produced. We quote the following portions of that opinion:

"The purpose of the law to give compensation for breach of contract is subserved by allowing the injured party to have the value to him of the contract's performance. 3 Williston on Contracts, §§ 1338, 1339, pp. 2392 to 2394. Performance of a covenant to produce a certain quantity of oil or gas, under a contract promising royalty, is worth to the lessor as much as the value of his royalty at the time the oil or gas should have been produced and delivered or marketed. Therefore, to allow the lessor the value of royalty wrongfully withheld from him complies with the law's fundamental purpose of adequate compensation. The lessor is put in the same position as though the contract had been performed. Freeport Sulphur Co. v. American Sulphur Royalty Co. [117 Tex. 439], 6 S.W.2d 1039 [60 A.L.R. 890].

"Under sound fundamental principles, no deduction should be made from the value of the lessor's royalty on account of the value of unmined minerals which the lessee was entitled to remove from the leased premises. The lessor pays the consideration for the lessee's performance by his conveyance to the lessee of the oil and gas where the lease is in the ordinary form. Stephens County v. Mid-Kansas Oil & Gas Co., 113 Tex. 160, 254 S.W. 290, 29 A.L.R. 566. As declared by Professor Williston: 'Where a unilateral contract is broken, the only performance to be valued is that of the defendant promisor. The plaintiff ex hypothesi has already performed and is therefore entitled to the full value of the defendant's performance. The situation is the same where the contract was originally bilateral but the plaintiff has fully performed his part.' 3 Williston on Contracts, §§ 1349 and 1350, p. 2408. * * * Summers says: 'The nature of the subject-matter is such that it is practically impossible to determine with certainty how much a lessor has lost in the way of royalties or rentals by the failure of his lessee to fully develop the premises or drill wells to offset those on adjoining lands. The difficulty lies in the proof rather than in the measure of damages. If it can be shown with reasonable certainty that the land would have produced a certain amount of gas or oil, or a certain amount more than it did produce, had the lessee exercised reasonable diligence in drilling additional or offset wells, the proper measure of damages is the value of the lessor's royalty of such oil or gas at the time it should have been produced and marketed.' Summers', Oil & Gas, § 139, p. 449."

We therefore conclude that the trial court adopted the proper measure of damages, upon the second cause of action.

[7] The doctrine of anticipatory breach should also be applied to the first cause of action arising out of a breach of covenant to make improvements. The rule in the Bradbury case has never been applied to an action for damages arising out of such a situation, but appears to be applicable only to actions by a lessor to recover rent to the end of the term.

[8] It is contended by appellants that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the award upon the first cause of action, and that the trial court adopted the wrong method of measuring the damages. Under the lease, appellants agreed to make certain improvements upon the property, in the following language:

"Lessees agree, upon execution of this lease agreement, to enter into immediate possession of leased mining properties, and to diligently and constantly operate and develop same, and to have all water facilities, improvements from Jesus Maria Creek, (Juri Properties), fully completed, and all machinery in full operation to take advantage of water run-off for season 1937-1938, to wash and clean up for such materials or metals, or other valuable substances, (not reserved herein by lessor), as lessees may be able to discover and mine within limits of said placer mining properties, and to extract, mill, and reduce, and to otherwise treat said minerals, metals, and other valuable substances."

No work of the character mentioned, or of any character, was done upon the property, and the court so found. An engineering expert testified that such work would cost $167,735. There is ample evidence in the record to support a finding that the damage for failure to perform such covenants amounted to $25,000. Appellants assert, however, that damages must be based upon the injury done to the reversion, and not upon the cost of making the improvements. Conceding that appellants state the correct rule, we see little or no distinction between the two methods, and in any event do not see how any prejudice would arise by the adoption of the method pursued by the court. An analogous situation exists with reference to the rule applying to damages to an automobile. It is stated in Huddy's Enc. of Automobile Law, 17-18, § 253, pp. 527-528:

"Although the difference in value before and after an injury is the technical measure of damages for an injury to a motor vehicle, as a practical proposition this difference in many cases is represented by the cost of repairing the machine. The difference in value of the property before and after the injury is presumptively the amount it would cost for repairs."

In Menefee v. Raisch Impr. Co., 78 Cal.App. 785-789, 248 P. 1031, 1032, it is said: "As held in Overpeck v. Rapid City, 14 S.D. 507, 85 N.W. 990, the difference in value of the property before and after the injury is presumptively the amount it would cost for repairs."

If the improvements cost $25,000, the value of the property or the reversion would be enhanced to that extent.

[9, 10] It is further contended by appellants that the court arrived at the sum of $25,000 solely by reason of a letter which they introduced in evidence, for the purpose of impeachment only. That letter was written by the president of plaintiff corporation to counsel for defendants. It was dated August 16, 1937, some weeks prior to the execution of the lease. It was stated therein that the cost of the improvements had been budgeted at $25,000. When the letter was offered in evidence, its effect was not limited to purposes of impeachment. According to the record, it was in evidence for all purposes. The court could therefore have considered it in finding the facts. However, we do not believe that the findings should be so narrowly construed. The court does state that the sum of $25,000 was the amount "contemplated" by the parties as the cost of the improvements. Elsewhere, however, the court found on the issue as follows:

"The court finds that the defendants, and each of them, failed to enter on the property, to bring water to the mining properties, to repair the water system to make it usable for mining, or to do or perform any other agreement on their part to be performed with respect to said properties. The court further finds that the defendants, and each of them, without attempting to perform under said agreement, repudiated the lease agreement of September 21, 1937, never attempted to perform any of the covenants of said lease agreement, and that such repudiation by the defendants was at a time when all of the leaseholds and property interests embraced in said mining properties and described in said lease agreement of September 21, 1937, were all in good standing; the court finds that at the time of the repudiation by the defendants of said lease, and at the time of their refusal to perform thereunder, there was no default on the part of the plaintiff with respect to any of the leasehold interests transferred under said lease, but all of said leases and other properties were in good standing, free from default, and that the repudiation by the defendants, and refusal to proceed on their part, was without justification or legal excuse. The court finds that the defendants made no attempt at any time to take over possession of said premises; to improve the water facilities; to mine said properties; or to do anything whatsoever to comply with the provisions of the lease, all to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $25,000.00."

[11] It is the duty of this court to adopt that construction of the findings which will support the judgment. We are satisfied that the finding has sufficient evidentiary support.

[12] Appellants contend that the lease was terminated by loss of title. It was set up in the answer that the lease to the Emery property was abrogated on February 1, 1938. This was property held by plaintiff under a lease from the Emery interests, and constituted a major portion of the mining land. Conceding that proper proof was made showing that plaintiff lost its rights in said lease on the date mentioned, we do not believe it would affect the right of recovery here. The lease involved here was breached in October, 1937. The right of action then accrued. It was not incumbent upon plaintiff, nor was it under the legal duty to thereafter maintain the lease in full force and effect. It may be, and apparently is, the fact in this case that the breach by defendants was the direct cause of the failure of respondent to carry out the terms of the Emery lease. To adopt the theory of appellants would, in effect, permit them to take advantage of their own derelictions. The law does not countenance such conduct.

Several other points are relied upon by appellants. We have considered them, and do not find them worthy of extended discussion, due to lack of merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 11736.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

2. Mandamus ⇐163

In mandamus proceeding to compel reinstatement of officer of religious association, allegations stating that petitioner had been an officer and referring to his "alleged expulsion" were mere "conclusions" of law, the truth of which was not admitted by demurrer.

Mandamus ⇐154(5)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas M. Foley, Judge.

Mandamus proceeding by Robert H. Simpson against the Salvation Army to compel the reinstatement of the petitioner in his office in the defendant association. Judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

William F. Herron and Arthur J. Barrett, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert W. Scott, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Petitioner appeals from a judgment entered in favor of respondent after the trial court had sustained a general and special demurrer without leave to amend to his petition for a writ of mandate. The prayer of the petition is that respondent be directed to reinstate petitioner in his office in respondent organization, and for $25,000 damages.

[1] The petition alleges that The Salvation Army is an association organized for religious and charitable purposes; that for many years petitioner was an officer in said organization, holding the rank of major; that on December 30, 1940, petitioner received a letter from the Chief Secretary for the Western Territory of respondent notifying him that charges had been preferred against him, that a court martial had been appointed to try him on these charges, telling him in detail what his rights were and what the procedure would be, and enclosing a copy of the purported charges; that on January 17, 1941, the court martial convened in San Francisco; that petitioner filed with the court martial objections to the alleged charges and to the appointment and power of the court; that the court disregarded these objections and proceeded with the hearing; that no accuser appeared in the proceedings, the entire evidence being letters and parts of letters written by petitioner to officers of respondent and letters written by such officers to petitioner; that petitioner was not permitted to see or read all of the correspondence introduced into evidence; that on January 20, 1941, petitioner received a copy of the decision of the court martial; that by its decision the court martial found petitioner guilty of disobedience and disloyalty and "recommended to the said respondent that petitioner be dismissed as an officer of The Salvation Army"; that the court martial was convened by the Chief Secretary of the Western Territory; that such person had no authority or right to call or convene the court; that thereafter petitioner addressed a letter to Commissioner D. McMillan, the territorial commander for the western territory of respondent, notifying him that he desired to appeal and requesting information as to procedure; that under date of January 23, 1941, he received a reply from McMillan discussing his case in detail, informing him that his letter would be treated as a request for an appeal, and denying the request for reasons stated; that on January 22, 1941, petitioner mailed a letter from San Francisco, "Via Air Mail Atlantic Clipper", to Commissioner A. G. Cunningham, Chief of Staff of respondent in London, England, making application for leave to appeal; that "your petitioner has received no reply thereto to date, although more than a reasonable time has elapsed since said appeal was forwarded to said Chief of Staff;" that "petitioner has exhausted all his remedies within The Salvation Army." The petition was filed on February 20, 1941.

From this recital of the essential allegations of the petition it is obvious that it does not state a cause of action. This is so for at least two reasons.

In the first place, it is not alleged that petitioner has been dismissed, or that any penalty has been imposed upon him as a result of the court martial. The petition and its exhibits affirmatively show that the court martial's finding is advisory only, and amounts to nothing more than a recommendation to the territorial commander. There is no allegation that the territorial commander has taken any action aimed at removing or demoting petitioner—the allegation is simply that such officer denied petitioner's request to appeal. From the allegations of the petition, and its accompanying exhibits, it is apparent that the decision of the court martial had no legal effect of itself, and that the only way appellant's position in respondent organization could be affected or jeopardized was by order of the territorial commander. No such order is pleaded.

[2] Appellant does not argue this point in his opening brief and has not seen fit to file a reply brief to answer the points made by respondent. It is true that in par. II of the petition it is alleged that "for many years past, your petitioner has been and until the acts complained of, was an officer of said respondent," and in par. XIII reference is made to his "alleged expulsion." Under the facts here alleged these allegations are mere conclusions of law, the truth of which is not admitted by a demurrer. The petition and exhibits demonstrate to a certainty that at the time of filing this petition no dismissal or suspension of petitioner had taken place. Since this is so, no cause of action has been pleaded.

[3, 4] In the second place, the demurrer was properly sustained, because the petition shows on its face that petitioner has not exhausted his remedies within The Salvation Army. It is well-settled in this state that a member of an association of this type must first exhaust the rights afforded him by the tribunals of the association before he may secure redress from the courts. Lawson v. Hewell, 118 Cal. 613, 50 P. 763, 49 L.R.A. 400; Levy v. Magnolia Lodge, I. O. O. F., 110 Cal. 297, 42 P. 887; Coffey v. Los Angeles Firemen's R. Ass'n, 22 Cal.App.2d 510, 71 P.2d 328; Hughes v. American Trust Co., 134 Cal.App. 485, 25 P.2d 491; Greenwood v. Building Trades Council, 71 Cal.App. 159, 233 P. 823; Dingwall v. Amalgamated Ass'n, of Street Railway Employees, 4 Cal. App. 565, 88 P. 597.

[5] It is true that there is a limited exception to this rule. Where the organization has violated its own laws and regulations and has arbitrarily violated a member's property rights, such as the right to sick benefits, the member need not exhaust his remedies within the organization before resort is had to the courts. Neto v. Conselho Amor, etc., 18 Cal.App. 234, 122 P. 973; Schou v. Sotoyome Tribe,

No. 12, 140 Cal. 254, 73 P. 996. Obviously, that exception is not here involved.

[6] In the instant case the petition affirmatively shows that appellant had not exhausted his remedies within the organization at the time he filed his complaint —in fact, the petition shows that at that very time he was pursuing a remedy provided for by his contract with The Salvation Army. Par. XI of the petition alleges that after receipt of notification of the court martial's recommendation, on January 22, 1941, "petitioner did direct to Commissioner A. G. Cunningham, Chief of Staff, The Salvation Army, International Headquarters, London, England, an appeal from said decision, in accordance with the Orders and Regulations for Courts of Reference. * * *" The petition for mandate was filed within twenty-nine days of the date this letter was sent. It is true that the petition also alleges in the same paragraph "that your petitioner has received no reply thereto to date, although more than a reasonable time has elapsed since said appeal was forwarded to said Chief of Staff." When the petition is read as a whole these allegations are no more than conclusions of law. The trial court was permitted to, and apparently did, take judicial notice of the fact that in January, 1941, England was at war, and that a period of twenty-nine days, in view of the general unsettled world conditions, was not a reasonable time within which to receive the reply. Respondent states in its brief, and this is not denied by appellant, that after this action was commenced appellant received notice from London that his appeal had been granted. It would be doubtful, even if conditions were normal, if twenty-nine days would be a reasonable time to expect a letter to go from San Francisco to London, for the sendee to read and study the case, and for a reply to reach San Francisco. Certainly, in view of conditions then existing, of which we can properly take judicial notice, it is obvious that appellant did not wait a reasonable time for a reply. In Holt v. White, 221 App.Div. 558, 224 N.Y.S. 507, affirmed in 248 N.Y. 613, 162 N.E. 546, an expelled member of an association appealed to a tribunal within the association. Without awaiting that decision, sixty-eight days thereafter he instituted a court action. Judgment was rendered in his favor. This was reversed on the ground that, as a matter of law, he had not waited a reasonable time to permit the association tribunal to act. The rule of this case is clearly applicable here. Included within the requirement that members of such organizations must exhaust their remedies within the association before resorting to the courts, is the requirement that when a remedy is resorted to the member must give the association a reasonable time to act. The appellant not having waited a reasonable time, has instituted his action prematurely. For that reason, and for the other reason heretofore mentioned, the trial court properly sustained the demurrers.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SUNSET NUT SHELLING CO. v. JOHNSON, State Treasurer.

Civ. 11909.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Jan. 28, 1942.

1. Constitutional law ⇐100
Taxation ⇐113

The 1935 amendment to Franchise Tax Act, raising rate of tax from two per cent. to four per cent. of net income of preceding year is not unconstitutional as applied to a corporation which had paid its tax in full according to the original rate for the calendar year 1935 prior to enactment of the amendment, notwithstanding that amendment did not become effective until after tax became a lien, since corporation's payment did not confer a "vested right" to privilege of exercising its corporate franchise for the year 1935. St. 1935, p. 1246 § 4.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Vested Right".

2. Taxation ⇐319(1)

A taxpayer has no legal or constitutional right to have current excise taxes computed at the rate in existence at commencement of the calendar year.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George J. Steiger, Judge.

Action by Sunset Nut Shelling Company against Charles G. Johnson, as State Treasurer, etc., wherein Charles J. McColgan, as Franchise Tax Commissioner, etc., was substituted as defendant, to recover portion of corporate franchise taxes paid under protest. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Newmark & Strong, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PETERS, Presiding Justice.

Plaintiff, Sunset Nut Shelling Company, paid a portion of its franchise tax for the calendar year 1935 under protest. Thereafter, this action was instituted by the taxpayer to recover the amount so paid. The trial court overruled the demurrer of the State Treasurer. The latter elected to stand upon the demurrer, and judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken.

[1] The problem involved is whether a 1935 amendment to the Franchise Tax Act, effective June 25, 1935 (Stats. of 1935, p. 1245, at p. 1246; Deering's Gen.Laws, 1935 Supp.Act 8488), raising the rate of the tax from 2 per cent to 4 per cent is applicable to this taxpayer for the calendar year 1935.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff is a California corporation; that on March 13, 1935, it made its return to the Franchise Tax Commissioner; that according to the law then in effect it was the duty of the plaintiff to pay for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchise in the state a franchise tax measured by its net income at the rate of 2 per cent upon the basis of its net income for the next preceding year; that the tax constituted a lien upon the property of plaintiff in California, which lien attached on March 4, 1935; that the tax was computed in the manner then provided by law and a remittance so computed made to the Franchise Tax Commissioner on March 13, 1935; that thereafter the legislature changed the rate from 2 per cent to 4 per cent by an enactment which became effective June 25, 1935; that on September 20, 1935, the Franchise Tax Commissioner served notice upon plaintiff demanding an additional tax computed according to the 4 per cent rate; that on October 2, 1935, plaintiff paid the additional tax under protest, and this action was thereafter instituted.

There can be no doubt but that the legislature intended that the 1935 amendment raising the rate should apply to taxes payable for the calendar year 1935. Section 4 (8) of the 1935 amendments expressly so provides. Stats. of 1935 at p. 1247. The question is not whether the legislature intended the tax to apply in the calendar year 1935, but whether the statute so providing is constitutional.

Under the terms of the act the tax for each year is measured by the net income of the taxpayer for the preceding year. The tax involved in the instant case accrued on January 1, 1935, and became a lien on the taxpayer's property in California on the first Monday in March, 1935. One-half the tax becomes due and payable on or before the fifteenth day of the third month following the close of the taxable year, and the balance on or before the fifteenth day of the ninth month following the close of the taxable year, and is delinquent if not paid by those dates. As already pointed out, plaintiff paid its tax in full on March 13, 1935. It is the theory of respondent that since it paid the tax on March 13, 1935, and since on that date the tax was a lien, it acquired a vested right to the privilege of exercising its corporate franchise for the year 1935, which was unconstitutionally impaired by the imposition of the additional tax in June of 1935. The theory is untenable.

[2] The question as to the power of the state to amend existing excise tax laws or to pass new ones during the taxable year, and to make such new or amended tax laws retroactive to the commencement of the taxable year has frequently been presented to the courts of this and other states. It is settled law that a taxpayer has no legal or constitutional right to have current excise taxes computed at the rate in existence at the commencement of the calendar year. Taxes for the current year may be changed any time during the year, or additional taxes may be imposed during the current year on the same subject of taxation. In Holmes v. McColgan, 17 Cal.2d 426, 431, 110 P.2d 428, 431, the Supreme Court stated that: "The constitutional validity of such retroactive provisions is now too well established to be questioned."

The basis of the rule is that the power to tax is proportioned to the public needs. So long as there exists public needs there exists the liability of the individual to contribute thereto. It is impossible to know at the beginning of the year what the needs of that year may be. If situations arise calling for the raising of more money (and the legislature is empowered to determine that question) new taxes may be levied or the rates of old taxes raised without impairment of any constitutional rights of the taxpayer. Patton v. Brady, Executrix, 184 U.S. 608, 22 S.Ct. 493, 46 L.Ed. 713; Wisconsin & Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U.S. 379, 24 S.Ct. 107, 48 L.Ed. 229; Brushaber v. Union Pac. R. R., 240 U.S. 1, 36 S.Ct. 236, 60 L. Ed. 493, L.R.A. 1917D, 414, Ann.Cas.1917B, 713; Roth Drug, Inc., v. Johnson, 13 Cal.App.2d 720, 57 P.2d 1022.

These principles have been applied by the appellate courts of this state to the very tax statute here involved. In Fullerton Oil Co. v. Johnson, 2 Cal.2d 162, 39 P. 2d 796, the problem involved was whether an amendment to the statute effective February 27, 1931, was applicable in computing the 1931 tax. In disposing of the contention that the taxpayer was entitled to compute the allowance without regard to the 1931 amendment, the Supreme Court stated (page 176 of 2 Cal.2d, page 802 of 39 P.2d):

"Based on these sections, respondent contends that since its tax for 1931 accrued on January 1, 1931, based on its net income for 1930, at which time 1928 values could be used in computing depletion, the 1931 amendment denying that privilege cannot be used to compute the 1931 tax. To permit the February 27, 1931, amendment to apply in computing the 1931 tax, according to respondent, would be to give that amendment an unlawful retroactive effect. Respondent strenuously contends that its tax liability for 1931 became a determined and accrued liability before the effective date of the amendment. To this contention there is a conclusive answer. The retroactivity alleged is more apparent than real. If the 1931 amendment be applied in computing the 1931 tax, such application is to give the amendment a prospective rather than a retroactive operation. Although under the act the net income earned in 1930 is used as a base for computing the tax due for 1931, the tax collected in 1931 is not for the privilege of doing business in 1930 but is a tax for the privilege of doing business as a corporation in California for 1931. It is a tax for the privilege of exercising a corporate franchise for the entire year 1931—that is, the current year when the act here involved became effective. The privilege being taxed is a present and continuing privilege, the amount of the tax being measured by the transactions of a prior year. Although, under the act the tax accrued on January 1, 1931, and became a lien on the first Monday in March, 1931, the tax imposed for that year was for the entire current year. There is no reasonable or legal basis for contending that a taxpayer is entitled, regardless of legislative action, to have current taxes computed on the same basis as past taxes have been assessed. It is well settled that taxes for the current year may be changed any time during the year, and, in fact, additional taxes may be imposed during the current year on the same subject of taxation." (Italics ours.)

The same conclusion was reached in Filoli, Inc., v. Johnson, 4 Cal.2d 662, 51 P.2d 1093, as to the legal effect of another amendment to the Franchise Tax Act effective February 27, 1931. In Holmes v. McColgan, supra, the rule of the Fullerton Oil Co. case, supra, was applied to an amendment of the state personal income tax law. It was held that an amendment to that act adopted June 13, 1935, was applicable retroactively to January 1, 1935.

Respondent argues that although in the Fullerton Oil Co. and Filoli cases, supra, it was held that amendments to the Franchise Tax Act could be applied retroactively, that those amendments became effective in February, 1931, before the tax became a lien. It is urged that after the tax became a lien on March 4, 1935, and was paid on March 13, 1935, respondent acquired the right to do business in this state for the taxable year 1935; that this right was a vested property right; that such right was unconstitutionally impaired by the tax passed after the lien date. In respondent's analysis the lien date marks the limit of time when the legislature may increase the tax burden for the current year. This very contention was considered in American States W. S. Co. v. Johnson, 31 Cal.App.2d 606, 88 P.2d 770. In that case an additional assessment was levied on the taxpayer for the year 1935 under the Franchise Tax Act by reason of an amendment to that act effective in June of 1935—after the date the tax became a lien. The court rejected the identical contentions made by respondent in the instant case, holding that "the tax is in the nature of an excise which is always within the power of the legislative department of government to change or increase during the term for which it is imposed" (page 613 of 31 Cal.App.2d, page 774 of 88 P.2d); that the payment of an excise tax for the privilege of doing business creates no contract with the state; that no vested property or contract was unconstitutionally affected by the retroactive amendments passed after the tax became a lien; that such excise taxes constitutionally may be changed or increased "any time during the term for which they are imposed" (page 617 of 31 Cal.App.2d page 776 of 88 P.2d); that the "taxpayer acquires no added rights by virtue of the lien" (page 618 of 31 Cal.App.2d, page 776 of 88 P.2d); that, "Neither the payment of taxes nor the vesting of the lien prior to the amendment of the act conferred upon the appellant vested rights which prevented the legislature from increasing the taxes during that current year" (page 618 of 31 Cal.App.2d, page 776 of 88 P.2d). The opinion considers the exact problem here involved at length and with thoughtful deliberation, and disposes of the arguments urged in the present appeal. A hearing was denied by the Supreme Court. The decision of the trial court in the present case was rendered before the appellate court filed its decision in the American States W. S. Co. case. Respondent's arguments are simply an attempt to revive the issue decided adversely to its contentions in that case, and in the other cases heretofore cited.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

LAMB v. CALIFORNIA WATER & TELEPHONE CO.

Civ. 2720.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Jan. 27, 1942.

Hearing Granted March 23, 1942.

1. Waters and water courses ⇐257(1)

The Railroad Commission had power and jurisdiction to fix rates for furnishing of water from river to irrigate riparian owner's land by corporation which was public utility and dedicated waters of river to public use before it entered into contract with such owner to furnish him water for specified sum per acre.

2. Eminent domain ⇐276

A riparian landowner, allowing construction of large irrigation dam in river by public utility company without protest, has no right to injunction against invasion of his riparian rights by intervening public use of water from river, but can only sue such company for damages.

3. Waters and water courses ⇐257(1)

The fact that corporation's articles of incorporation authorized it to act as public utility is not conclusive, but may be considered, in determining whether it was public utility and dedicated waters of river to public use before entering into contract with riparian landowner to furnish water therefrom for irrigation of his land at specified rate per acre, so as to empower Railroad Commission to fix rates for such corporation's water service to such owner.

4. Eminent domain ⇐13

Condemnation of land lies only in public interest.

5. Waters and water courses ⇐257(1)

Evidence held sufficient to justify trial court's finding that defendant's predecessor dedicated whole capacity of its water system to public use before execution of such contract, so as to empower Railroad Commission to fix defendant's rates for water service to plaintiff.

6. Action ⇐6

In riparian landowner's action against water company for declaration of rights under arbitration agreement, respecting pipeline right of way and water right, between previous owner of plaintiff's land and water company which defendant succeeded, and injunction against repudiation of such agreement by defendant, it was unnecessary for defendant to plead as defense that plaintiff was estopped by his predecessor's acquiescence in construction of dam in river by defendant's predecessor to deny Railroad Commission's power to fix defendant's rates for water service to plaintiff, but finding that all waters of dam were dedicated to public use, as alleged in answer, was sufficient.

7. Appeal and error ⇐717, 854(2)

The reasoning expressed in trial court's opinion does not constitute part of record on appeal from such court's judgment, which will be affirmed, if appellate court finds it correct on any ground or for any reason, regardless of reason given by trial court.

Action by Walter C. GRIFFIN, Justice.

This is an action for declaratory relief and injunction. Generally speaking, the facts are not in dispute. In June, 1868, one Pioche, as a common grantor, owned the Mexican grant known as the Rancho de la Nacion, which included the lower valley of the Sweetwater River in San Diego County, together with certain mesa lands adjacent to it on either side and now in part occupied by the cities of National City and Chula Vista. He entered into a contract to sell that grant to Frank Kimball and Warren Kimball upon installment payments. Under this contract the Kimballs were entitled even before completing their payments to Pioche, to resell at agreed prices per acre. Pioche agreed, when requested by them, to join in deeds to the purchasers. In May, 1869, the Kimballs organized a corporation known as the Kimball Brothers Water Company, and on June 9, 1869, executed to it a deed, undertaking to grant to it "all the water flowing in the stream called the Sweetwater River * * *" with the right to divert the same from its natural channel to, over and upon said lands for purposes connected with the handling of such water supply. This deed was not filed for record until October 9, 1869. Pioche did not join in it. Meanwhile, on October 6, 1869, Pioche and the Kimballs jointly conveyed to Norman Watkins 169 acres out of the said Rancho de la Nacion. This deed was filed for record on October 16, 1869. The property conveyed by it included the 15 acres or thereabouts affected by the present action. By a deed executed in 1882, as corrected by another made in 1884, Watkins conveyed the 15 acres to one Eratus Lake, by whom it was eventually conveyed to the present plaintiff, Lamb. The Kimballs having completed their payments, Pioche, on July 8, 1871, conveyed to them the Rancho de la Nacion, excepting the parcels, such as that deeded to Watkins, which Pioche had already conveyed to persons to whom the Kimballs had made sales.

In 1880 the Kimballs Brothers Water Company conveyed to one Pratt all of its property, and the following year that property was conveyed by Pratt to the San Diego Land & Town Company, a Kansas corporation, authorized by its charter to engage in the business of supplying water to the public. In November, 1886, this corporation commenced, and early in 1888 completed, the construction of what is known as the Sweetwater Dam for the purpose of impounding the waters of the Sweetwater River at a point some distance above the Lake land (the 15 acres here involved). At the same time it commenced constructing the water mains and distributing systems necessary to the devotion of the water so impounded to beneficial uses. About March 10, 1887, the San Diego Land & Town Company filed an action in the Superior Court of San Diego County against George Neale et al., to condemn a portion of lot G of Jamacha Rancho for use as reservoir and necessary margin lands for the Sweetwater Dam. Neither appellant nor his predecessors in interest, however, were parties to this action. This complaint recited that its corporate purposes were the construction and maintenance of dams, canals and water works for domestic, irrigation and manufacturing purposes.

Meanwhile, on February 15, 1888, and before the execution of the Lake agreement hereinafter referred to, in anticipation of sales of water service to the residents of National City, the San Diego Land & Town Company commenced receiving applications therefor. On February 29, 1888, the city of National City passed an ordinance authorizing the San Diego Land & Town Company to lay and maintain pipe lines on the streets of National City and to supply the inhabitants thereof with water, and on the same day passed an ordinance establishing the rates to be charged for such water service. These ordinances did not become effective until July 1, 1888. Up to May 29, 1888, the San Diego Land & Town Company received 212 applications for water. For a more complete history of the nature of the proceedings leading up to the construction of the dam and the establishing of the rates for the city of National City see Lanning v. Osborne, C.C., 76 F. 319. Meanwhile, however, certain differences which had previously arisen between Eratus Lake and the San Diego Land & Town Company regarding a pipe-line right of way and Lake's water rights were arbitrated in National City on April 17, 1888. On May 29, 1888, the agreement in controversy was executed "in confirmation and enlargement of the aforesaid agreement under the arbitration of April 17," 1888. This agreement was recorded the following month. It provides, among other things, that "For and in consideration of a perpetual right to him and his assigns, said right to be appurtenant to and run with the land, to use all the water necessary for the irrigation at all times" of Lake's 15-acre tract at a rate not to exceed $3.50 per acre per annum, "* * * confirm a grant by him to the San Diego Land & Town Company of the right to lay and maintain its main water pipes and necessary taps over and upon said land forever," and under certain restrictions granted to that corporation "the right to enter upon said land at all times for the purpose of inspecting and repairing its water pipes and taps upon said lands" and "expressly waiving all claims for other or further compensation or damage, which said tract of land or said Eratus Lake as the owner thereof, may have already sustained or which may hereafter be sustained by said tract of land or said (Eratus Lake) by reason of the diversion of the waters of said river by the said San Diego Land & Town Company," or the construction and maintenance of the pipe line or the entry upon the lands for the inspection and repair thereof.

It is conceded that the appellant's 15-acre tract was, when the Sweetwater Dam was built, riparian to the Sweetwater River. By mesne conveyances the Sweetwater Dam and the water system had become the property of the respondent California Water & Telephone Company. From May 29, 1888, to June 19, 1937, a period of 49 years, appellant and his predecessor received water service pursuant to the terms of the above-mentioned agreement. On June 19, 1937, respondent notified appellant by letter that it had completed the construction of a new water main through which he was being served across other properties than his; that respondent had abandoned the easement created by the grant from Lake, and that after July 1, 1937, service to him would be rendered pursuant to the company's applicable rules and regulations and to the company's rates applicable for such services on file with the Railroad Commission of the State of California. Thereupon, on August 7, 1937, appellant filed the present action for declaratory relief, seeking, as Lake's successor, a decree enjoining the respondent from repudiating the agreement between Lake and the San Diego Land & Town Company, and the adjudication of his perpetual right to receive, for the irrigation of his 15-acre tract, water from the respondent's system at the rate of $3.50 per acre per annum.

Respondent filed its answer, setting forth several defenses, most of which were either abandoned by respondent or ordered stricken by the court. The gist of the second defense, on which the discussion mainly hinges, was that immediately upon the completion of the dam and before the making of the Lake contract, the San Diego Land & Town Company dedicated to the public use all the water rights that it owned, and assumed the position of a public utility, and that having once so done, it could make no subsequent contracts affecting waters from the Sweetwater Dam, which would be immune from public regulations.

The ultimate question before the trial court was whether the rights of the respective parties continued to be governed by the Lake agreement, or, contrariwise, the respondent's obligation to render service to the appellant's 15-acre tract is merely that of a public utility corporation and subject as such to regulation by the Railroad Commission and to the rates from time to time established by it to be charged to the respondent's consumers generally.

The court found that "as respects that part of the water supply impounded by the Sweetwater Dam and controlled by the San Diego Land & Town Company, other and different from that destined for use within the City of National City, the company had, prior to the execution of the Lake contract, become a public utility"; that "when the Lake contract was made, the San Diego Land & Town Company was entitled, in the capacity of a public utility, to make use of all of the flow of the Sweetwater River effectively impounded by the dam"; that plaintiff is not "entitled to either injunctive relief or relief in the form of specific performance"; that "the Lake contract * * * providing for water from the defendant's system at the rate of $3.50 (per acre per annum) has not been cancelled by the nonuser of the pipeline easement, but remains a valid subsisting contract subject, however, to the regulation of the Railroad Commission of the State of California."

Appellant complains and now argues that the court went outside of the pleadings and the theory upon which the case was tried, and decided the case upon the theory of "estoppel" when that defense was not even pleaded or argued; that the trial court decided adversely to the appellant on the theory that appellant's predecessor (quoting from the trial court's written opinion filed herein) "stood by and allowed the erection of a dam manifestly designed and intended by the San Diego Land & Town Company to accomplish the devotion to the use of a public utility of the whole flow of the stream susceptible of being effectively impounded by it"; and that, therefore, appellant cannot deny that the agreement now before the court is subject to public regulation, even though the effect of such a decision is to deprive appellant of his riparian rights; that it reached that result solely by charging appellant's predecessor in interest with knowledge of an allegation in the complaint filed by the San Diego Land & Town Company in the Neale case alleging the construction of the dam, etc., and "that said use is a public use."

It is apparent that the trial court found in favor of appellant on all defenses except the one above mentioned. It is also apparent from the court's written opinion that the court recognized the rule stated in Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 82, 175 P. 466, 472, 8 A.L.R. 249, wherein it was said: "a company having a single and undivided supply of water * * * may devote its properties and a part of those waters to public service and may retain a part for the advantages of private sale, and not become a public service corporation as to all by virtue of the dedication of a part."

It becomes apparent that the court's determination that the whole capacity of the system had been dedicated to public use prior to the execution of the Lake contract was based partly on the filing of the suit in condemnation above mentioned.

Appellant, in analyzing the position assumed by the trial court, claims that it (a) extended the rule of "estoppel" by substituting imputed knowledge for actual knowledge; (b) charged Lake with knowledge of the contents of the complaint in the Neale case where there was no evidence in the record that Lake knew of the existence of the complaint, and the issues raised thereby were not finally determined until almost three years after the agreement now before the court had been consummated; (c) ignored the necessary element in the rule of estoppel requiring a change in position on the part of the public in reliance on the acquiescence of the riparian owner; and (d) ignored the fact that the estoppel had not been pleaded.

At the time the Sweetwater Dam was constructed by the San Diego Land & Town Company, appellant's predecessor in interest, Eratus Lake, was admittedly a lower riparian owner. The San Diego Land & Town Company could have condemned his riparian rights, but until it did so, Lake was entitled to the continuous flow of the Sweetwater River across his land. The parties entered into the agreement in controversy, the necessary effect of which was, in part, in the nature of an exchange. Lake gave up his right to receive at least a greater portion of his riparian waters from the Sweetwater River and received in return the right to receive his riparian waters from the pipe line and system of the San Diego Land & Town Company. The Supreme Court has held that where the riparian owner transfers his riparian rights to a company and simultaneously receives from the company a right to receive a quantity of water for the irrigation of his land, the water conveyed to him retains its riparian character, and the riparian right of the land is thereby preserved to it even though the land no longer borders on the stream. Copeland v. Fairview Land & Water Co., 1913, 165 Cal. 148, 131 P. 119. In the Copeland case the owner of the riparian land transferred to the company his riparian rights, receiving in return therefor, and as part of the same transaction, a perpetual right to receive a certain quantity of water from the company for the irrigation of his land.

[1] The trial court, however, stated that as to the water which continued to flow past appellant's land notwithstanding the existence of the dam, "that his riparian rights have not been severed from the land and remain a part of it, but, as to the right here in controversy to a water supply from the dam * * * Lake in effect elected to substitute for his riparian rights a different status involving the taking of water from a public utility." Regardless of the correctness of this statement, if the San Diego Land & Town Company, at the time the Lake contract was entered into, was a public utility and the waters had been dedicated to a public use, the Railroad Commission had the power and jurisdiction to fix the rates. Wallace Ranch Water Co. v. Foothill Ditch Co., 5 Cal.2d 103, 121, 53 P.2d 929, 938. It should also here be noted that counsel for appellant, in open court, in the presence of respondent's counsel and during the arguments on the merits of this appeal, stated in response to a question propounded by this court inquiring if the Railroad Commission had assumed jurisdiction of this controversy and fixed the rates applicable to appellant, that, "There was a proceeding to have this contract abrogated. The Railroad Commission denied that without prejudice."

It was stated in Wallace Ranch Water Co. v. Foothill Ditch Co., supra, that if the Railroad Commission, with full knowledge of the claimed rights of appellant, fixed rates applicable to the consumers of respondent company, including appellant, "the trial court had no jurisdiction directly or indirectly to overrule an order of the Railroad Commission. The power to reverse, review, correct, or annul orders of that commission rests solely in the Supreme Court (section 67 of the Public Utilities Act [Stats.1915, p. 115, as amended]), and the superior court is without jurisdiction in the premises."

[2] It has been heretofore determined that where a riparian owner has allowed, without protest, the construction of a large irrigation dam and a public use of his water has intervened, such a riparian owner has no right to an injunction against an invasion of his riparian rights, but can merely sue for damages. Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 248, 76 P. 1032, 65 L.R.A. 940; Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 509, 101 P. 790, 23 L.R.A.,N.S., 331; Collier v. Merced Irrigation District, 213 Cal. 554, 2 P.2d 790; Reed v. Oakdale Irrigation District, 46 Cal. App. 139, 188 P. 832. It was the ultimate theory of the trial court that as there was no dispute that the appellant's predecessor, Lake, as the owner of the lands here involved, was originally a riparian appropriator downstream from the dam, his right to the use of the stream as it was accustomed, prior to the erection of the dam, to flow past his lands, could only be held to have been modified or abridged on the theory of estoppel based on his having stood by and allowed the erection of a dam manifestly designed and intended by the San Diego Land & Town Company to accomplish the devotion to the use of a public utility of the whole flow of the stream susceptible of being effectively impounded by it. Such a devotion to public use is recognized in several cases. In Conaway v. Yolo Water & Power Co., 204 Cal. 125, 266 P. 944, 58 A.L.R. 674, it was held that (quoting from syllabus):

(1) "While not even a corporation possessing the power of eminent domain may under the constitution (Art. 1, sec. 14) take or damage private property without first making adequate compensation, this right may be waived by the owner and in order to prevent the obstruction of progress he must be held to diligence in ascertaining his right as against a concern administering a public use; and if he allows his property right to be invaded and either taken or damaged for a public use and the public right has so far intervened as to justify the belief that objection has been waived, in law the property right so taken or damaged is to that extent dedicated to the public use."

And paragraph (5) of syllabus: "The private owner who stands by in such a case inactive, hesitating or half consenting, until the burden to his land becomes a part of the public use must content himself with legal as distinguished from equitable remedies for relief."

See, also, Collier v. Merced Irrigation District, supra.

In Williamson v. Railroad Commission, 193 Cal. 22, at page 29, 222 P. 803 at page 806, it was stated: "While it is true that purposes avowed in articles of incorporation do not fix the character of the corporation in its future activities as being a public service corporation, as stated in Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra, and that the additional act of dedication is necessary to the creation of a public use, it is also true that when the original appropriators of water from a stream, having declared by broad terms that its purposes are to secure the commodity for a consumption or use which cannot be otherwise than to supply a general public use, organize a corporation which in its articles of incorporation declare its purposes to be that of utilizing the water thus acquired for sale, for manufacturing, mining, mechanical, chemical, agricultural, and for general domestic purposes, to be conducted by means of canals, flumes, aqueducts, reservoirs, pipes, and other necessary conduits to a vast area of gold-bearing regions, agricultural lands, and to inhabited districts and communities widely separated from each other, and to all other places lying adjacent to the route of its main system and its lateral branches, and when such corporation proceeds under such declared purposes and does establish a distributing system, and actually furnishes water for mining, irrigation and domestic purposes in large quantities through a period of many years to thousands of consumers indiscriminately, and without refusal to any one who made application or request for the use of its water for any purposes whatsoever, at rates adjusted to the uses to be made of the water, and has apparently held itself in readiness to comply with its declaration of purposes as rapidly as the growth of the communities to which it extends would permit or has required, it must be held that substantial evidence of such a carrying into effect of the originally declared purposes of the original appropriators of such water and of the corporation formed by them has been presented as would suffice, in the absence of countervailing facts, to justify a finding that the water thus acquired and utilized by such corporation had from its inception been dedicated to a public use and that such corporation was a public utility." (Italics added.)

In that case, in consideration of a conveyance of a right to the water company to construct a canal upon petitioner's property, by written agreement, the water company agreed to perpetually furnish such waters as petitioner might thereafter require at a price not to exceed $5.00 per calendar year per acre. It was held that the water company was a public utility and that the Railroad Commission had jurisdiction over the rate to be charged notwithstanding the agreement. To like effect is Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 415, 147 P. 567.

In Limoneira Co. v. Railroad Commission, 174 Cal. 232, 162 P. 1033, it was held that (quoting from syllabus): "A contract, made subsequent to the adoption of the constitution of 1879, whereby a public utility undertook to furnish water for a certain period to a mutual water company, is subject to the power of the state, vested in the railroad commission, to modify and practically to annul it in so far as the prescribed rate is concerned in the regulation of the public use." See, also, Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigation Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 P. 404, 29 L.R.A.,N.S., 213.

We have next to inquire whether the evidence shows and supports the finding that on or before the completion of the Sweetwater Dam in February of 1888, the San Diego Land & Town Company definitely indicated the intention to devote all of the flow of the river to be effectively impounded by it to public use, as distinguished from private use or private sale, and, if it did, whether the evidence shows such purpose to have been so manifested as to charge Lake as a lower riparian owner, with the notice of such intention essential to invoke the so-called doctrine of estoppel against him. In doing this, we assume, without holding, that such dedication to public use before the date of the Lake contract must appear before the judgment can be affirmed. It is, of course, not to the point in this inquiry that the defendant California Water & Telephone Company may now be a public service corporation and nothing else (except to the extent that it is, if indeed it be, serving Lake in a different capacity). Neither is it to the point that the defendant's predecessor, the San Diego Land & Town Company, has in many decisions been recognized as an out and out public utility, insofar, at least, as these decisions are based on its conduct at times subsequent to the Lake contract. What concerns us now is what the situation was and appeared to be when the Lake contract was made.

Under article XIV, section 1 of the State Constitution it was provided that "The use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the State, in the manner to be prescribed by law * * *."

Under the Statutes of 1881, chapter LII, section 1, page 54, and Statutes of 1885, chapter CXV, sections 1 and 2, page 95, the board of supervisors or legislative body of the city was authorized to annually fix the rates to be charged by any company for water furnished to any such county or city respectively.

[3] With these principles above mentioned and with these laws in mind, we will analyze the evidence. Under the San Diego Land & Town Company's articles of incorporation it was authorized to act as a public utility. While not conclusive, this fact may be considered in the determination of the ultimate question. Brewer v. Railroad Commission, 190 Cal. 60, 79, 210 P. 511; Del Mar Water, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 P. 591, 948.

There is no dispute about the fact that the construction of the Sweetwater Dam was commenced in 1886 and completed early in 1888. The evidence shows that on February 29, 1888, the San Diego Land & Town Company was authorized by ordinance of the city of National City to "lay and maintain water pipes in and upon any or all of the streets of National City, for the purpose of supplying water to the said city and the inhabitants thereof for domestic, irrigating and mechanical purposes for the term of 50 years from and after the passage of this ordinance, and to charge and collect therefor such fees or rates as may be established by the board of trustees or common council of said city." On the same day, by another ordinance, the board of trustees of said city proceeded to fix the rates which, on and after the first day of July following, it should be lawful "for any person or association of persons or water company supplying water to the inhabitants of the city of National City or to any corporation, company or persons doing business or using water therein to charge, collect and receive therefor." It appears that the San Diego Land & Town Company provided a form of application for water service which was in general used by it, one of which is in evidence and is dated February 15, 1888, and made by Frank A. Kimball as applicant. This application was dated at National City and was apparently intended to apply to premises therein. However, there appears as a printed foot-note on the bottom of the application, the following: "(This contract shall remain in force until the first day of next January, when it may be terminated at the request of either party, but in case no such request is made, then the same shall continue in force for one year thereafter, and so on from year to year, until such request is made; which request, when made, shall be to terminate this contract on the then following January 1st.)" The records of the San Diego Land & Town Company show that prior to May 29, 1888, some 212 such applications had been made to it. By the condemnation complaint entitled The San Diego Land & Town Company, plaintiff, v. George Neale, et al., defendants, and verified on March 10, 1887, the defendant's predecessors set up that one of its corporate purposes was "the construction and maintenance of dams, canals, and water works, for domestic, irrigation, and manufacturing purposes"; that it "has constructed upon land of its own, to wit, the Rancho de la Nacion, a dam across the valley of the stream called the Sweetwater River, in said county and across said stream, for the purpose of collecting and holding and distributing the water thereof for the use of the inhabitants of the said Sweetwater Valley, the said Rancho de la Nacion, the Mission Rancho, National City, and a portion of the city of San Diego, and the lands adjacent thereto, in said county, for domestic, farming, irrigating, manufacturing, and all other purposes to which water may lawfully be applied." It was also in this complaint alleged "that said use is a public use, and that plaintiff is in charge of the same." Insofar as the city of National City is concerned, the courts have fully recognized as a fact that the San Diego Land & Town Company is and was, at least subsequent to the date of the Lake agreement if not before, a public utility and that the rates to be charged were subject to regulation and control in the manner prescribed by law. Osborne v. San Diego Land & Town Co., 1899, 178 U.S. 22, 20 S.Ct. 860, 44 L.Ed. 961; Lanning v. Osborne, supra, 1896; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. City of National City, C.C.1896, 74 F. 79; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. City of National City, 1899, 174 U.S. 739, 19 S.Ct. 804, 43 L.Ed. 1154.

The evidence in the case at bar makes it entirely clear that, as respects such portions of its water supply as the San Diego Land & Town Company intended for distribution within the city of National City and to the inhabitants thereof, the said company was, by every test, a public utility, at least some months before it entered into the Lake contract.

[4, 5] As it has been held that a water company may be a public utility as to a portion of the supply controlled by it, but not as to the rest, the next question presented is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the court's finding as respects that part of the water supply impounded by the Sweetwater Dam and controlled by the San Diego Land & Town Company, other and different from that destined for use within the city of National City, viz., that the company had, prior to the execution of the Lake contract, become a public utility. There is no dispute that the San Diego Land & Town Company had already begun actual service of water to areas under the flow of its pipes outside of the city of National City, including principally that part of the Sweetwater Valley below its dam and the mesa now occupied by the city of Chula Vista. It is not claimed that any application to the Board of Supervisors was made to fix rates for service in the region outside the city of National City until a subsequent time. This, however, in nowise militates against the contention that the company was already supplying this water in the capacity of a public utility. Public utilities were, at the time, authorized in unincorporated areas, to fix and collect rates for water supplied by them even in the absence of supervisorial action on the subject. Stats.1885, chap. CXV, page 95 et seq.

There is no dispute that the company used condemnation to acquire portions of its reservoir lands. It is, of course, only in the public interest that condemnation lies and, as has been already observed, the complaint in the Neale case distinctly alleges the company's character as a public utility. That is a declaration of its then present status, made by it at a time long anterior to the Lake contract. It may perhaps be assumed that a corporation acting in respect of part of the water supply controlled by it as a public utility might not in all circumstances be disqualified to maintain a condemnation suit even in case, as to the other parts of such supply, it were not so acting. The nature of this condemnation suit, however, hardly admits of that construction. That which was condemned was not anything, in the use of which any differentiation could be made between the company's public functions and any private functions that it might claim to be performing. The company had built the dam on its own land. What it sought was more land for a reservoir, and "for the necessary margin and protection thereof for the uses and purposes aforesaid." Such uses and purposes were specified as being not only the use of water in National City but also over the whole of the general region which has since been supplied by the system, and it is with respect to all of this that there is used in the complaint the above-quoted language that "said use is a public use." This seems to be explicit. In thus availing itself of the right of eminent domain and for that purpose making use in its complaint of the most sweeping language in respect of the whole use stated as in contemplation, there seems to be no reservation whatever. Nothing was suggested about any intention to confine the public character of the use to the municipality of National City and to act as a mere retailer of water at private sales elsewhere. On the contrary, all the use of water contemplated is expressly placed in the same category of a "public use" and on that representation the company condemned the Neale lands, portions of which would appear, from the language of its complaint, to be on the marginal of the reservoir site and, as may be inferred, to be flooded only when the reservoir should be filled to its utmost capacity. There is a plain inference that the company intended to represent and did represent that the entire capacity of the reservoir, that is, all of the water effectively to be impounded, was to be devoted to the public use. When this declaration was made the dam was nearly finished and, therefore, its capacity to impound largely if not entirely complete.

Correlating all of these facts and circumstances, the trial court was justified in finding that there was a dedication of the whole capacity of the system to public use, insofar, at least, as it was within the capacity of the San Diego Land & Town Company to so dedicate it. In Byington v. Sacramento Valley, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 124, 132, 148 P. 791, 794, it was said that: "At the trial it was proven that the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company in developing the system of irrigation canals and ditches had prosecuted suits in eminent domain. This shows that it was a public service corporation." See, also, Knox v. Roehl, 153 Wis. 239, 140 N.W. 1121; State ex rel. Wood v. Consumers' Gas Trust Co., 157 Ind. 345, 61 N.E. 674, 55 L.R.A. 245. It also should be noted here that the San Diego Land & Town Company had laid and maintained its main water pipes over and upon the tract of land owned by Lake. It was from these facilities that Lake made use of the water from the dam. In 1937 respondent constructed a new water main which was apparently not constructed upon appellant's land but through which facilities he was to be served such water as he cared to take from the water system under the contract.

In Wallace Ranch Water Co. v. Foothill Ditch Co., supra, the court held that the plaintiff had a perpetual easement in the ditch to convey its water to its properties, but subject to regulation by the Railroad Commission. In that case plaintiff's easement and right to one-third of the waters flowing in defendant's ditch was created at a time when neither owner was a public utility. The interests of defendant's predecessor were subsequently transferred to defendant, a public utility corporation. Plaintiff company was not charged for its proportionate share of the use of the ditch through which plaintiff had the easement to divert its agreed and established share of the water. The Railroad Commission determined it had jurisdiction over the question of rates and so fixed them, contrary to and different from that determined by the trial court. The Railroad Commission's order was sustained for reasons therein expressed. However, at page 120 thereof in 5 Cal.2d, 53 P.2d 929, the Supreme Court points out that there was an order of the Railroad Commission discussed in the briefs to which the court referred. It reads in part as follows: "'In the Matter of the Application of Foothill Ditch Company, a Corporation, to Increase Rates for Water Supply.' * * * This opinion recites in detail the controversy over the ownership of the Foothill Ditch and over plaintiff's claims therein, and specifically holds that that question should not be decided by the commission but by the courts. The opinion holds, however, that since the evidence in that proceeding shows (as does the evidence in the present case) that the utility is furnishing plaintiff a service, the commission has the power to fix rates for that service, whether plaintiff owns a part of the ditch or an easement therein or not. The commission thereupon fixed a rate applicable to the consumers of defendant, including plaintiff * * *."

In the instant case the appellant must make use of the facilities of the respondent corporation, a public utility, in securing water from the dam for his lands. If the above-quoted interpretation is to be given effect and applied here, the Railroad Commission, notwithstanding the other question presented, would have the power to fix rates for that service.

From our understanding of the evidence and the question in dispute, respondent has not, and appellant does not contend that the respondent has refused to deliver water under the contract. The only dispute about the contract is over the price or rate to be charged. The judgment specifically declares that "the Lake contract * * * providing for water from the defendant's system at the rate of three and 50/100 dollars ($3.50) per acre per annum, has not been cancelled by the nonuser of the pipe line easement, but remains a valid, subsisting contract, subject, however, to the regulation and control of the Railroad Commission of the State of California" and that "plaintiff is not entitled to either injunctive relief or relief in the form of specific performance." This conclusion is amply supported.

Appellant lays particular stress in his brief on the fact that estoppel was not pleaded as one of the defenses and he was not afforded an opportunity to show, in rebuttal thereto, that the San Diego Land & Town Company issued "water right certificates" purporting to entitle the holders thereof to a perpetual right to water at a specific rate. The so-called "certificates" were fully described, discussed, and considered in Osborne v. San Diego Land & Town Co., supra, and held not to be determinative of a like issue there presented.

[6, 7] Whether the so-called rule of estoppel invoked by the trial court should have been pleaded will therefore be considered. Respondent's contention that all waters of the Sweetwater Dam were dedicated to public use is plainly set forth in the second defense of respondent's answer. The manner in which it was dedicated was a matter of proof. The finding that it was dedicated to public use would suffice. The reasoning expressed by the trial court in its written opinion, no matter how well expressed, does not constitute a part of the record on appeal. Since an opinion is not part of the record, it must be carefully distinguished from a finding and from a decision. If the appellate court finds that upon any ground or for any reason the action of the court below was correct, its action will be affirmed regardless of the reason which the court may have given for it. White v. Merrill, 82 Cal. 14, 22 P. 1129.

The case of Conaway v. Yolo Water & Power Co., supra, involved a property right taken under the theory of laches, and to that extent dedicated to public use. In their answer the defendants did not plead laches as a defense, but did plead the "intervention of a public use." This was held sufficient. There is no merit to this argument. From the trend of the reported decisions and the ultimate finding of the trial court, the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

TOBINSKY v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al.

Civ. 13365.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 9, 1942.

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇐11(3)

Evidence of woman's symptoms before visiting physician, purposes for which she went to physician's office, manner of operation performed by physician and admissions of physician supported findings of board of medical examiners that physician had performed an abortion and supported order revoking physician's certificate to practice. St.1937, p. 1274, § 2377.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⇐11(3)

Under rule that administrative board passing upon the issue of the revocation of a license to practice medicine is not limited by the strict rules applicable to the trials of a criminal case, hospital records introduced in evidence before the board of medical examiners hearing unprofessional conduct charges against a physician did not have to be authenticated in manner as to be admissible in accordance with the strict rules of procedure followed in criminal cases. St. 1937, p. 1274, § 2377.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⇐11(3)

In proceedings before board of medical examiners hearing unprofessional conduct charges against a physician, introduction in evidence of hospital record describing former patient of accused physician as suffering from post-abortive abscess was not prejudicial to physician in light of testimony by hospital resident surgeon fully explaining basis for use in the records of the term "post-abortal". St.1937, p. 1274, § 2377.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Proceeding in mandamus by John Jerome Tobinsky against Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California to compel annullment of order revoking a certificate to practice medicine wherein a demurrer to the petition was sustained without leave to amend. From a judgment for respondent, petitioner appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles A. Thomasset, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., and Thomas Coakley and J. Albert Hutchinson, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondents.

W. J. WOOD, Justice.

Petitioner seeks by writ of mandate to compel the Board of Medical Examiners to annul an order revoking his certificate to practice medicine as a physician and surgeon. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the petition without leave to amend. Petitioner has appealed from the judgment denying redress and discharging the alternative writ which had been issued.

Petitioner was charged before the respondent board with unprofessional conduct as defined in the Business and Professions Code, section 2377, St.1937, p. 1274, § 2377, in that on or about April 3, 1940, petitioner did "procure, and/or abet, and/or attempt, agree and/or offer to procure a criminal abortion upon a pregnant woman, to-wit: Mrs. Shirley Reece." Upon a hearing on this charge petitioner was found guilty. Attached to the petition filed in the lower court is a transcript of the proceedings had before the respondent board, including all of the testimony and evidence presented.

It is now claimed by petitioner that the evidence received by the board was insufficient to justify the board's action in revoking petitioner's license. It is asserted that there was no evidence that Mrs. Reece was pregnant and that petitioner had performed an abortion or attempted to do so. From the transcript of the proceedings before the board it appears that Mrs. Reece testified that before going to the office of petitioner she had experienced nausea and dizziness for about six weeks and that she had missed one menstrual period; that she knew she was pregnant and went to petitioner's office for the purpose of having an abortion performed; that she visited petitioner's office on April 1, and had a discussion with a nurse; that she returned on April 3, at which time petitioner operated upon her using instruments in her vagina; that her husband paid $60 to the nurse in petitioner's office and that this nurse was in the room while the operation was being performed. Mr. Reece testified that petitioner told him in a conversation subsequent to the operation that "it couldn't have been a very long pregnancy." Agents of the respondent board testified that they had had a conversation with petitioner concerning his treatment of Mrs. Reece and at this conversation petitioner stated: "I just want to make a clean breast of the thing and I am giving you the whole story." At this conversation petitioner was asked, "Well, in other words, it was just a plain out and out abortion?" To this question petitioner responded, "Well I guess it is that way if you want to put it that way." There was also testimony that after the operation petitioner had paid $130 to Mr. Reece. This sum was claimed by petitioner to be a "loan" to Mr. Reece. We are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the order of the respondent board in revoking petitioner's license.

After the operation Mrs. Reece was taken to the Los Angeles County General Hospital for treatment and it is now contended that the respondent board erred in admitting in evidence the records of the hospital concerning the case. Dr. Heldfond, the resident surgeon at the hospital, testified that he examined Mrs. Reece on April 19, 1940, and that she remained in the hospital until May 13, 1940; that Mrs. Reece told him that an abortion had been performed on her on April 6, 1940; that she had had slight bleeding for some two days following the abortion and then was apparently well; that one week later she had chills and fever; that his diagnosis was post-abortal abscess; that he had made this diagnosis from statements made by Mrs. Reece but that in so far as his examination disclosed he could not tell whether her trouble had resulted from an abortion or from gonorrhea. The hospital records contain notations by physicians other than Dr. Heldfond in which Mrs. Reece's trouble was characterized as "post-abortal."

[2, 3] Whether the hospital records were authenticated in such manner as to be admissible in accordance with the strict rules of procedure to be followed in criminal cases need not be decided, for an administrative board passing upon the issue of the revocation of a license to practice medicine is not limited by the strict rules applicable to trials of criminal cases. See In re Hardenbrook, 135 App.Div. 634, 121 N.Y.S. 250; Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 430, 108 P. 322. Moreover, we are satisfied that petitioner could not have been prejudiced by the introduction of the hospital records. The testimony of Dr. Heldfond fully informed the members of the board concerning Mrs. Reece's condition while she was at the hospital. The basis for the use in the records of the words "post-abortal" was fully explained to them.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 12742.

Under statute making a principal responsible to third persons for wrongful acts committed by his agent in transacting business of the agency, responsibility of the principal results from acts so committed even though they are contrary to the principal's explicit instructions or otherwise unauthorized or are malicious or willful. Civ.Code, § 2338.

2. Master and servant ⇐302(1)

In considering whether an agent's unauthorized wrongful act is attributable to his principal, the court cannot look to the nature of the act alone to determine whether it was committed in transaction of principal's business but must consider as well the activity of agent on behalf of principal in connection with which act was committed, and the inquiry is not whether act itself was authorized, but whether it was committed in the course of a series of acts of the agent authorized by the principal. Civ.Code, § 2338.

3. Master and servant ⇐302(1)

Where an agent, for however brief a period, has ceased to serve his principal, the agent alone is responsible for his acts during period of such cessation, but fact that questioned act was unauthorized or, if wrongful, that it was not committed to further principal's interests, will not show such a departure from principal's service as will absolve principal if act was committed while agent was still occupying himself with principal's business within the scope of his employment. In action against beer hall owner and his employee for assault and battery, evidence showed that quarrel between plaintiff and employee was precipitated by employee's efforts to collect for drinks which had been served to customers and that argument over bill and encounter both occurred in course of employee's unfinished effort to induce plaintiff to pay for drinks, and hence trial judge properly held that assault was committed as part of business which employee was authorized to transact for owner and that therefore owner was liable to plaintiff. Civ. Code, § 2338.

Kent Rogers, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry Alkow and Samuel A. Rosenthal, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHINN, Justice.

In this action for assault and battery respondent was awarded $1,535 as damages against Seidner, owner of a cafe and beer hall, and Haimsohn, his employee. Both defendants appeal, urging the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

Respondent entered the beer hall, sat on a stool in front of the bar and had several glasses of beer. He was asked by Haimsohn, who was known to the customers and is referred to in the record as Murphy, and who was behind the bar and in charge of the place in the absence of the owner, to pay for drinks consumed by two women who sat at the bar on stools next to respondent. An argument ensued between respondent and Haimsohn, in which the former denied ordering the drinks and insisted that if he was to be charged for them he would credit the amount, 60 cents, upon a debt for carpenter work which he had done for Seidner which he claimed was unpaid. Haimsohn declined to settle on this basis. Respondent proceeded to the end of the bar where a small gate led into the bartender's domain.

The argument continued. Thus far the evidence was without conflict. Plaintiff testified that as he stood outside the gate he was suddenly struck by either Haimsohn or one Brazelton, a customer, and was shoved through a door into the kitchen, where he was beaten by both men, receiving severe lacerations, bruises, and a broken leg. The testimony of other witnesses was that respondent entered the area behind the bar through the gate and attacked Haimsohn; that the latter retreated through the door into the kitchen, where he was followed by respondent. The court accepted the testimony of respondent, found that he was not the aggressor, that he was an invitee and not a trespasser, that Haimsohn was not acting in defense of his person, and that his claim that he used only the force necessary to expel respondent from a portion of the premises where he had no right to be was unfounded. The court also found that Haimsohn was acting at the time within the scope of his employment and upon this finding based the judgment against the employer Seidner.

The facts found with relation to the manner in which the brawl occurred find support in the evidence, and we conclude that the finding that Haimsohn was acting within the scope of his employment, which is challenged by appellant Seidner, is likewise supported. In the attack make on this finding it is argued that upon a view of the evidence most favorable to respondent this court must hold, as a matter of law, that the employee was acting solely on his own behalf and responsibility in committing the assault.

[1-3] The statutory law on the subject is found in section 2338 of the Civil Code, which provides in substance that a principal is responsible to third persons for wrongful acts committed by his agent in and as a part of the transaction of the business of the agency. Responsibility of the principal results from acts so committed even though they be contrary to the principal's explicit instructions or otherwise unauthorized, or malicious or wilful. In considering whether an unauthorized wrongful act of an agent is attributable to his principal, we cannot look to the nature of such act alone to see whether it was committed in and as a part of the transaction of the principal's business, but we must consider as well the activity of the agent on behalf of the principal in connection with which the act was committed. The inquiry is not whether the wrongful act itself was authorized but whether it was committed in the course of a series of acts of the agent which were authorized by the principal. Of course, where the agent, for however brief a space of time, has ceased to serve his principal, he alone is responsible for his acts during the period of such cessation. But the fact that the questioned act was unauthorized or, if wrongful, that it was not committed in order to further the interests of the principal, will not show such a departure from the service of the principal as will absolve the latter if the act was committed while the agent was still occupying himself with the principal's business within the scope of his employment. Support for these statements, with full citation and discussion of authorities will be found in Johnson v. Monson, 1920, 183 Cal. 149, 190 P. 635; Ruppe v. City of Los Angeles, 1921, 186 Cal. 400, 199 P. 496; Hiroshima v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 1936, 18 Cal.App.2d 24, 63 P.2d 340; Stansell v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 1941, 44 Cal.App.2d 822, 113 P.2d 264.

[4] In applying the foregoing rules to the facts of the instant case we find that the quarrel between respondent and appellant Haimsohn was precipitated by the efforts of the latter to collect for the drinks that had been served to customers. There was no other contributing cause nor was the controversy a personal one between the participants. The argument over the bill furnished the sole cause of the encounter and both occurred in the course of an unfinished effort of the agent to perform an authorized act for his principal, namely, to induce the customer to pay the price of the drinks. The argument was still under way when the fight started and Haimsohn had not then abandoned his effort to collect the bill. We must take this view of the facts because it is obvious that the trial judge accepted the testimony of respondent in all important particulars and his story is not incredible.

Under these circumstances the trial judge properly held that the assault was committed in and as a part of business which the employee was authorized to transact for his employer; from this fact the liability of the latter necessarily results.

The judgment is affirmed.

In prosecution for failure to stop and give information and render aid to a bicyclist struck by motorist, statements of accused that she had observed girl on bicycle while driving, had heard a slight noise and felt her automobile skid, and that she looked back and saw the girl standing in the road brushing her clothes were admissible under evidence showing automobile in passing bicycle in the daytime struck the rear end and passed to its left, that motorist drove off rapidly and that the noise of the collision was heard some 50 feet away, there being no showing that accused suffered from impairment of her faculties. Vehicle Code, § 480, St.1935, p. 170.

3. Automobiles ⇐336

Knowledge that a bicyclist has been struck by an automobile and has been thrown to the ground is sufficient evidence of injury to the rider to call into operation the provisions of the statute requiring motorist involved in an accident resulting in injury to any person to stop, give information and render assistance. 4. Automobiles ⇐355(8)

In prosecution for failure to stop, give information and render aid to injured bicyclist, evidence that motorist in overtaking the bicycle struck rear end of the bicycle and passed to the left in the daytime, that the noise of the collision was audible 50 feet away and motorist left scene rapidly, constituted a substantial showing motorist had knowledge her automobile had been involved in an accident resulting in personal injury. Vehicle Code, § 480, St.1935, p. 170.

5. Criminal law ⇐351(10)

In prosecution of motorist for failing to stop after an accident resulting in injury to a bicyclist, statements of accused denying and then admitting she was driving the automobile involved in the collision were admissible as tending to prove consciousness of guilt. William G. Kenney, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

SHINN, Justice.

An automobile driven by appellant struck a bicycle ridden by a young girl, throwing the latter to the street. In a prosecution of appellant for violation of section 480 of the Vehicle Code, St. 1935, p. 170, which requires a driver involved in an accident resulting in injury to any person to stop, give his name, render assistance if necessary, etc., admissions of appellant, consisting of statements made to police officers, were received in evidence over her objection. Her statements were related as follows: "She then told us that she had been using the Dodge, that she was driving north on Hillhurst or some street, she was not quite certain of the street. She observed this girl on the bicycle and heard a slight ping and felt her car skid apparently to one side; that she looked back and observed the girl standing in the road brushing her clothes off. She thought there was no damage that amounted to anything and drove on." The basis of the objection to this testimony was that no evidence had been presented which tended to show that appellant knew that her car had been involved in an accident or that any person had been injured. It is contended that such knowledge was an essential element of the corpus delicti; that it could not be established by the extra-judicial admissions of appellant; that proof of knowledge by independent evidence was necessary in order to lay a foundation for her admissions or declarations; that such proof was lacking and that it follows from such deficiency of evidence not only that her statements were erroneously admitted but that she stands convicted without competent evidence of one of the necessary elements of the crime charged. People v. Simonsen, 1895, 107 Cal. 345, 40 P. 440.

Without discussing the legal premises upon which the argument proceeds, we will examine the evidence touching the question of appellant's knowledge that she had been involved in an accident. The record discloses that the accident occurred at about 9 or 9:30 a. m. on a well-traveled street. The vehicles were traveling in the same direction, the car overtook the bicycle, struck the rear end of it, and passed to its left. Appellant immediately speeded up her car and left the scene rapidly, driving through an intersection just as the signals changed. These facts were testified to by a passenger who witnessed the accident from a car which was closely following that of appellant. The noise of the collision between the car and the bicycle and the fall of the bicycle into the street attracted the attention of a witness who was some 50 feet away, and was also heard by the witness in the other car. The victim lay in the street until she was assisted to her feet and to the sidewalk, and while in the street did not stand alone or brush off her clothes.

[1] If the proof independently of any extra-judicial admission or declaration of the accused makes out a prima facie case of the commission of the crime charged, including all of the essential elements thereof, a sufficient foundation has been laid for the receipt of evidence of such admissions or declarations. The rule is stated with full citation of authorities in People v. Kaye, 1941, 43 Cal.App.2d 802, 111 P.2d 679.

[2] We find no insufficiency of evidence to justify the receipt of the statements of the accused. There is no contention on the part of appellant that she suffered from any impairment of her faculties which would prevent their use in a normal manner. While it was not stated in so many words, the inference is to be drawn from the testimony of eyewitnesses to the accident that the weather was clear and there was no limitation of visibility. From the absence of any evidence that one vehicle swerved into the other or that either altered its course immediately before the accident, it was to be inferred that the front part of appellant's car struck the bicycle. The noise of this collision and of the bicycle as it fell would naturally have attracted the attention of appellant if she had not actually seen or felt the impact.

[3] Knowledge that a rider on a bicycle which has been struck by an automobile has been thrown to the ground is sufficient evidence of injury to the rider to call into operation the provisions of the statute.

[4] From all of the foregoing we conclude that the evidence, apart from any admission on appellant's part, constituted a substantial showing that she had knowledge that her car had been involved in an accident resulting in personal injury. There was no error in the admission of her statements to the police officers.

[5, 6] It was in evidence that appellant at first denied to the officers but later admitted that she was driving the car that was involved in the accident. Her contradictory statements were admissible as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt. People v. Cole, 1903, 141 Cal. 88, 74 P. 547; People v. Singh, 1934, 136 Cal.App. 233, at page 240, 28 P.2d 416; People v. Martin, 1936, 16 Cal.App.2d 515, at page 517, 60 P.2d 1014. Appellant did not testify in her own behalf nor offer other evidence to rebut the case of the People. Her statements made to the officers containing the admissions and contradictions to which we have referred, taken with proof of the circumstances of the accident, including the conduct of appellant in speeding up her car immediately thereafter, were sufficient to establish her guilt.

The judgment is affirmed.

Judgment ⇐363

The statute authorizing a court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect is addressed to the legal discretion of the trial court, and in absence of a clear showing of abuse in the exercise of that discretion, an appellate court will not disturb an order of the trial court. The probate court had jurisdiction to vacate an order of confirmation of sale of realty on motion of either a prospective bidder or an administrator under statute authorizing a court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, as against contention that the probate court has no power to vacate a sale except where proceedings are unfair or the price is disproportionate to the value as provided in probate code provision. Proceeding in the matter of the estate of James A. Moreland, deceased, wherein S. C. Sample and another made motions to vacate an order confirming the probate sale of realty to J. S. Canham, the successful bidder. From an order granting the motions, J. S. Canham appeals.

Affirmed.

Henry F. Boyen and Frank J. Fontes, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Oscar Samuels and Tevis Jacobs, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, Presiding Justice.

This appeal is taken by the successful bidder from an order granting motions to vacate an order confirming a probate sale of real property to him. The motions were made by the administrator of the estate and the original bidder upon the grounds that the administrator had, by inadvertence and mistake, notified both the original and a prospective bidder that the hearing upon the return of sale would be held on September 5, 1940, instead of on September 4, the day for which said hearing had been duly noticed and was in fact held; that, because of such error, the original and the prospective bidder, each of whom intended and was prepared to make a substantially higher bid, were led to remain away from the court and failed to take any part in the proceedings. At the hearing of the motions to set aside the order of confirmation the court had evidence of the intention and purpose of both the original and the prospective bidder that they would increase the amount bid by the appellant, and we must assume that the court found that it would be of benefit to the estate to call for new bids.

[1] The appellant states three questions upon which he relies for a reversal of the order. (1) "Is a mere statement of intent to increase a bid a sufficient ground to vacate a probate sale of real estate after confirmation?" As stated, the question must of course be answered in the negative, but this record does not present that question. The order appealed from was based upon the motions showing that the order of confirmation was made "through mistake and/or inadvertence" and not upon the "mere statement of an intent to increase a bid."

[2] (2) "Where the purchaser is ready, willing, and able to buy, may the Court vacate the order of confirmation for the sole purpose of seeking further bids?" This statement is open to the same objections. It does not present a debatable question on appeal since the grounds of the motions are incorrectly stated. If the probate court had jurisdiction to grant relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure such jurisdiction attached as a result of a motion made in compliance with the terms of that section—a motion based upon the ground that the order sought to be set aside had been taken against the mover "through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect."

(3) "Has the Probate Court any power to vacate an order of confirmation of sale of real estate under Section 473 C. C. P. on motion of either a prospective bidder or the administrator?" This is the real question raised by the appeal. If this section of the code applies to such an order in probate the attack on appeal must rest upon a clear case of abuse of discretion. On this subject it is said in 14 Cal.Jur., page 1075, that "The policy of the law is to have every litigated case tried upon its merits; and it looks with disfavor upon a party who, regardless of the merits of his case, attempts to take advantage of the mistake, surprise, inadvertence, or neglect of his adversary. The discretion of the court ought always to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law and in such manner as will subserve rather than defeat the ends of justice."

[3, 4] It is the settled law that the section is addressed to the legal discretion of the trial court "and in the absence of a clear showing of abuse in the exercise thereof an appellate court will not disturb the order of the court below," Waybright v. Anderson, 200 Cal. 374, 377, 253 P. 148, where numerous cases are cited. Here the appellant does not claim that the trial court abused this discretion, except by the inferences running through the briefs and arising from the fact that no definite or binding promise was made by the prospective bidders that they would increase the bid at a new hearing. Aside from the fact that this is a matter which should concern the respondent administrator rather than the appellant, it is wholly insufficient to show an abuse of discretion justifying a reversal.

[5] Turning to the direct question raised—the jurisdiction of the court to grant relief from a probate order under section 473—we find the authority expressly confirmed in Levy v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 590, 73 P. 417. In that case the superior court, sitting in probate, made an order setting aside a homestead. In due time the executors and an heir moved to set aside the order upon grounds stated in section 473. The only question raised on the appeal was whether the court had jurisdiction to proceed under that section. The Supreme Court held that both the executor and the heir were interested parties entitled to move for relief from the order under the code section. To the same effect is Estate of Hickey, 129 Cal. 14, 61 P. 475. Jurisdiction under the section was assumed in Lilienkamp v. Superior Court, 14 Cal.2d 293, page 301, 93 P.2d 1008, 1012, where the real question involved was what notice was required under the section, but the court said that the jurisdiction of the superior court following the order of partial distribution "extended to the hearing and determination of a motion pursuant to section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, after due notice, as required by that section." In Estate of Nolan, 145 Cal. 559, 79 P. 428, it was held that, in the absence of an appeal from an order in probate, and in the case of a non-appealable order, the only remedy was under section 473. Similar rulings as to the application of the section are found in Estate of Tymms, 78 Cal.App. 79, 82, 247 P. 1091; and Estate of Hunter, 99 Cal.App. 191, 195, 278 P. 485.

The appellant relies upon a portion of the syllabus in Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 71 P. 171, stating that the probate court has no power to vacate a sale except under section 1552 of the Code of Civil Procedure (now section 785, Probate Code). The opinion does not support the statement. On page 200 of 138 Cal., on page 174 of 71 P. it is said: "It is claimed that the court had the power to relieve the heirs from the order under Code Civ.Proc. § 473, which provides that the court may relieve a party 'from a judgment, order, or other proceeding, taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.' If it be conceded that the above statute applies to a case like this, the showing was not sufficient to justify the order of the court." It should be noted that the author of the foregoing also wrote the opinion in Estate of Nolan, supra, and there is no indication of a ruling that the power to proceed under section 473 did not exist. On the other hand, the statement referred to is clearly explained in Estate of Verwoert, 177 Cal. 488, 492, 171 P. 105, 107, where the court said: "The decision in the Estate of Leonis does not, as appellant contends, hold that the court is without any power whatever to vacate a sale of real property made by an administrator or guardian, except where the proceedings are unfair or the price disproportionate to the value, as provided in section 1552 of the Code of Civil Procedure. All that the case really decides on that point is that, under the facts shown in that case, the court had no power to vacate the sale, except for those reasons."

We find no error in the record.

The order is affirmed.

1. Homestead ⇐84

Prior to 1929 amendment to statute providing that a homestead may be selected from community property or the separate property of the husband or with consent of wife, from her separate property, a homestead could not be selected by owner or spouse, nor a probate homestead set aside to surviving spouse, out of land held in common or joint tenancy by one spouse and a third party, and the amendment did not extend the right of one of spouses to select a homestead to property owned by other spouse and third party as tenants in common. 2. Homestead ⇐137

Where deceased at time of his death and his brother owned vineyard lands as tenants in common, which they operated together and on which they both lived, probate court was not required under statute to select a homestead out of the lands upon petition of deceased's widow. 3. Homestead ⇐137

The section of Probate Code providing for setting apart of a homestead for use of surviving spouse does not purport to enlarge the field of property from which such a homestead must be selected beyond that from which one may be voluntarily selected or to require setting apart to the surviving wife of property interests which did not belong to decedent, or in which others have an undivided interest. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Harry Kachigian, deceased, wherein Aghavnie Kachigian filed a petition to have the court select as a homestead and set apart for her use an undivided one-half interest in certain real property and to set apart to her, as exempt from execution, certain personal property, opposed by Toros

Affirmed.

Harold M. Child and L. N. Barber, both of Fresno, for appellant.

BARNARD, Presiding Justice.

This is an appeal from an order of the probate court denying a petition of the surviving wife of the deceased to have the court select as a homestead and set apart for her use an undivided one-half interest in certain real property and to set apart to her, as exempt from execution, certain personal property.

The facts are undisputed. From February 4, 1928, to July 29, 1940, when Harry Kachigian died, he and his brother, the respondent herein, owned 40 acres of vineyard land as tenants in common, which they operated together and on which they both lived. They also owned together certain farming implements used on this property. The deceased and the appellant had no children, and the property in question was his separate property.

[1, 2] The main question presented is whether, under section 661 of the Probate Code, it was the duty of the court to select a homestead out of the real property thus owned by the deceased and his brother as tenants in common. The possibility of such a question arising was suggested in 11A Cal.Jur. at page 631.

Prior to the 1929 amendment to section 1238 of the Civil Code a homestead could not be selected by the owner or his or her spouse, nor a probate homestead set aside to the surviving spouse, out of land held in common or joint tenancy by one spouse and a third party. Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 148 Cal. 548, 83 P. 999; Watson v. Peyton, 10 Cal.2d 156, 73 P.2d 906. In the latter case, it was held that under the 1929 amendment to this section a husband could select a homestead, without the consent of his wife, out of property owned by them as joint tenants since his interest was an "estate" which vested in him an immediate right of possession although such right was not exclusive. It was pointed out that prior to that amendment a valid declaration of homestead upon property held by a husband and wife as joint tenants could only have been declared by the wife or by the husband and wife together. The appellant now contends that a wife's right to select a homestead is also extended by this amendment to property owned by her husband and a third party as tenants in common and that such an interest, being "property" as now defined in section 1238, must be set apart to her use as a probate homestead under section 661 of the Probate Code, which provides that a homestead must be set apart out of the separate property of the decedent when there is no community property and no property which was owned in common by the spouses. A consideration of this contention involves not only the meaning of section 1238 of the Civil Code but a construction of section 661 of the Probate Code keeping in mind its purpose and object.

Prior to 1929, section 1238 of the Civil Code provided "* * * the homestead may be selected from the community property, or the separate property of the husband, or, with the consent of the wife, from her separate property." The 1929 amendment added the following: "Property, within the meaning of this section, includes any freehold title, interest, or estate which vests in the claimant the immediate right of possession, even though such right of possession is not exclusive." This section applies to a homestead to be selected by one of the spouses during the lifetime of both and the 1929 amendment includes, among the property which may be thus selected, any interest in property which the selecting spouse then has which then vests in him or her an immediate right of possession. This includes, of course, a joint tenancy interest where the other spouse is the co-owner since it is then an estate in which each has a right of possession, though not exclusive. The ordinary meaning of the language used would not, however, include the selection by a wife during the lifetime of her husband of land held by a husband and a third person as tenants in common, the husband's interest being his separate property, since the wife, as claimant, would not have a present interest which vested in her the immediate right of possession. The right to select a homestead from separate property of a husband which he holds with a third person as tenants in common is not specifically given to a wife under the terms of section 1238, as amended in 1929. In speaking of that amendment the court in Re Miller, D.C., 27 F.Supp. 999, 1001, said: "This amendment obviously pertains to cotenancies, the most frequently used in California by married persons in acquiring real property for homesites being joint tenancies." The views we have expressed are somewhat confirmed by the fact that in 1937 section 1238 was again amended by omitting the words "or, with the consent of the wife, from her separate property" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or, subject to the provisions of section 1239, from the property held by the spouses as tenants in common or in joint tenancy or from the separate property of the wife." While property owned as tenants in common by the spouses is thus specifically included, property owned as tenants in common by one of the spouses and a third person is not expressly authorized to be selected as a homestead. That fact not only suggests that the latter was not intended but, taken in connection with the provision that the claimant must then have a vested right of possession, indicates an intent to make the homestead selectable out of property actually belonging in some way to one of the spouses and not to him and third parties as tenants in common, and tends to negative any intention to change the long-existing rule that such a homestead could not be selected from property owned by one spouse and a third person as tenants in common. Property rights have long been acquired in reliance upon that rule and any change should be particularly and definitely declared by the legislature.

[3] Section 661 of the Probate Code relates to a so-called probate homestead, which is the one here involved. That section was enacted in 1931, being based in part upon certain former sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. It provides, among other things, for the setting apart of a homestead for the use of the surviving spouse (1) out of the community property, (2) out of property owned in common by the spouses or if there be no such property, (3) out of the separate property of the decedent, in which event it may be set apart only for a limited period. This statute also mentions property owned in common by the spouses and does not expressly mention property held by one of the spouses and a third person as tenants in common. No intent appears, in the wording of the statute, to enlarge the field of property from which such a homestead must be selected beyond that from which one may be voluntarily selected, under section 1238 of the Civil Code, or to require the setting apart to the surviving wife of property interests which did not belong to the decedent, or in which others have an undivided interest.

[4] This construction is in accord with the purpose of a probate homestead which is to set certain property apart for the use of a decedent's family. The object is to provide the family with a home (Estate of Schmidt, 94 Cal. 334, 29 P. 714; Estate of Adams, 128 Cal. 380, 57 P. 569, 60 P. 965), and that very object indicates an intent that this use of the property should be exclusive. It is unthinkable that it was intended that this use should be one which must be shared with a stranger who as a tenant in common has an equal right to such use. A homestead would be useless for the purpose intended unless an exclusive right to use the property as a home is given.

A further consideration is that to construe these statutes as so changing the prior law as to require a court to set apart for the use of a surviving wife property which was held as tenants in common by the decedent and a third party, would subject the third party to a loss of the use of his property or a part thereof, without compensation and without due process of law, in which event it would be unconstitutional. In many instances, this would lead to rather absurd results. For example, it would be hardly reasonable to believe that it was intended to provide that where ten persons owned a parcel as tenants in common and one died the court must set apart the entire property for the use of the family of one who had himself owned but a small part of the property, and this without regard to the rights of the co-owners. It would be equally unreasonable to suppose that it was intended to compel the setting apart of a portion of the property for the use of the family of the one, such use to be shared with the other co-owners. It is not to be assumed, in the absence of any specific indication thereof, that the legislature intended to require anything of this kind in adopting these statutes.

[5] The order appealed from also refused to set apart to the appellant, as property exempt from execution, certain personal property of the value of about $700 and consisting of farming tools and implements situated and used upon the real property in question. In support of her contention that this part of the order is erroneous the appellant argues that under the holding in Stanton v. French, 83 Cal. 194, 23 P. 355, the exemptions from execution provided for in the Code of Civil Procedure include "the interest of a tenant in common." Be that as it may, the setting apart to the surviving spouse of such exempt personal property is a matter specifically left to the discretion of the court. Estate of Mattingly, 19 Cal. App.2d 550, 65 P.2d 1338. No facts indicating an abuse of that discretion are here called to our attention.

For the reasons given the order is affirmed, the respondent to recover costs on appeal.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to a certain lot of land against defendants' claim of an easement for a right of way over a ten foot strip at the rear of said lot. The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts supplemented by certain evidence. At the time of the creation of the easement the lot here in question was a part of a much larger tract of land, which has since been subdivided, and the easement was created by the owner of this larger tract by the same deed which conveyed to defendants' and appellants' predecessor the land which they now own and to which they claim the easement is appurtenant.

The agreed statement of facts contains the following recitals:

"In 1927 certain lands now known as the 'East 14th Street Homesites' were subdivided and roads laid out, graded and dedicated to the use of the public. The defendants used these dedicated roads since that time for a portion of the way to their property. For the remainder of the way they cut across certain lots, among said lots being the lot of land now owned by the plaintiff.

"On or about August 22nd, 1939, the plaintiff herein attempted to build on the lot owned by him and described in the complaint, but the defendants objected to such use and refused to permit the plaintiff to build.

"Subsequently and in settlement of any claims the defendants may have had for a right of way over the lot owned by the plaintiff, the defendants on September 15, 1939, made, executed and delivered to plaintiff a quitclaim deed to the property owned by the plaintiff. * * * In exchange for this quitclaim deed the defendants were deeded a lot in the tract and a road built thereon to enable them to have proper and uninterrupted way to the property."

In the face of these agreed facts, and in an apparent attempt to both eat their cake and have it, appellants claim that an easement appurtenant to a dominant tenement cannot be released or surrendered to the owner of the servient tenement by a quitclaim deed. The basis of this claim is not entirely clear from a reading of their brief, but on no conceivable ground is their position tenable.

[1-3] A quitclaim deed transfers whatever present right or interest the grantor has in the property. Thornton v. Middletown Educational Corp., 21 Cal.App.2d 707, 709, 70 P.2d 234. [4] A quitclaim deed, being a transfer and release to the grantee of whatever present title or interest the grantor has in the property quitclaimed, when made by the owner of an easement to the owner of the servient tenement operates as a release and extinguishment. The court briefly disposes of the question in La Plant v. Schuman, supra, 196 N. W. at page 284: "The quitclaim deed was a method universally recognized as proper under the law to release any claim plaintiff had of an easement of a right of way over lot 11."

[5] In view of the facts quoted from the agreed statement this was the effect that the quitclaim deed was intended to have in this case, and no reason appears not to give effect to the intention of the parties.

Criminal Law ⇐553

In prosecution for negligent homicide and drunk driving, evidence on issue whether defendant or decedent was driving the culpably operated automobile supported conviction in view of physical facts as disclosed by collision that defendant was driving. Vehicle Code, §§ 500, 501, St.1935, pp. 173, 174.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Vaughan N. Thompson, Judge Assigned.

Clifford William Van Osdoll was convicted of negligent homicide and drunk driving, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Neil G. McCarroll, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Warren, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SCHAUER, Presiding Justice.

Defendant appeals from the judgment pronounced after he was found guilty of (1) violation of section 500 of the Vehicle Code, St.1935, p. 173 (negligent homicide), and (2) violation of section 501 of the Vehicle Code ("drunk driving").

The sole ground of appeal is alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment, and the only particular wherein the sufficiency of the evidence is challenged is that which identifies the defendant as the driver of the culpably operated automobile. The judgment must be affirmed.

No witness was produced who testified that he had seen and recognized the defendant as the driver of the automobile while it was in motion. The defendant himself testified that he owned and had driven the car from the city of Glendale to a point about eight miles south of the town of Palmdale, and that there, after a brief stop, he and his companion, one Odin Hatfield, who was the brother-in-law of defendant, exchanged places and that Mr. Hatfield was driving, with defendant riding as a passenger, at the time of an accident in which the former was fatally injured. Immediately after the crash the defendant stepped out of the car and during the ensuing several minutes he told various persons that he was the driver; to quote his own language as a witness, he testified, "I told everybody that I met that I was driving." Defendant further testified, however, in effect, that he made such statements not because they were true but because he "felt morally responsible for the whole thing."

On this appeal it is argued that the evidence, other than defendant's extrajudicial admissions, not only fails to prove that defendant was driving at the time of the collision but by a clear preponderance establishes the untruth of defendant's admissions and the truth of his presently asserted hypothesis that he was the passenger and Hatfield the driver. The evidence from which defendant draws his inferences is in substance as follows: Defendant was only slightly injured, while the decedent suffered a broken leg and severe head and chest injuries; photographs of the car in which they were riding show that most of its damage was on its left side; the steering wheel was bent, and the windshield, which was in two sections, was more extensively damaged in the left than in the right section; defendant's exhibits A and B (photographs) disclose a jagged hole near the right side of the left section adjacent to the center post. It may be inferred that it was decedent's body which crushed the steering wheel and decedent's head which crashed the glass. But that does not place him in the driver's seat.

The evidence shows without contradiction that when the collision occurred defendant's car, traveling between fifty and sixty miles per hour, was endeavoring to negotiate a curve to the right—a turn in a cut from south towards the north on the west slope of a hill—a curve sharp enough that the car at its operating speed left the right side of the highway and bulged out left of the center line into the southbound traffic lanes where its front and left sides collided with an approaching car. Reasonable inferences would be that inertia and centrifugal force combined to throw the passenger sitting on the right side, who apparently was not protected by a safety belt or other support, forward and to the left, crashing him into the steering wheel, dashboard, and windshield, and that the driver, braced by the door at his left and the wheel in front, could well have escaped with less injury than his unfortunate companion.

In addition to the circumstances related, a witness, Thomas McConnell, testified that immediately after the collision he saw defendant "get out on the lefthand side, walk around to the front and open the door" on the right side and that at that time the decedent was sitting "practically in the center" of the front seat. Another witness, Mrs. Lyon, saw one of two persons in defendant's car leave it by the left door; she did not recognize defendant but she did state that the person remaining in the car, on the righthand or passenger side, was the decedent Hatfield. Although Mrs. Lyon apparently became somewhat confused between right and left a fair import of her testimony places defendant at the left or driver's position and the decedent in the center of the seat. Such uncertainties and inconsistencies as appear in her narrative may have affected its weight but they are not such as to render its evidentiary value legally unsubstantial.

The position of the two automobiles after the collision, more or less side by side athwart the east side of the highway, heading east, with the defendant's car two or three feet nearer than the other to the bank at the edge of the highway, is not inconsistent with the testimony of either Mr. McConnell or Mrs. Lyon. In view of the position of the vehicles, facing the bank with defendant's car several feet closer to it than was the car in which Mrs. Lyon was seated, her statement that the "other man" (defendant) "got out next to the bank" is certainly not inconsistent with Mr. McConnell's testimony that defendant got out on the left and walked around the front of his car. The witness Brown, who did not see the crash but arrived shortly afterward, testified that the left front door of defendant's car was open. In the light of this testimony and other evidence, the trial judge was not bound, as argued by defendant, to find that the two automobiles were so close together as physically to have precluded defendant from leaving his car via the left door.

Even without defendant's admissions we find the evidence ample to support the convictions. The judgment is affirmed.

NATIONAL AUTOMOBILE INS. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Supreme Court of California.

1. Insurance ⇐379(7, 8)

Where an insured in good faith makes truthful answers to questions contained in an application, for workmen's compensation insurance, but his answers owing to fraud, mistake or negligence of agent filling out application, are incorrectly transcribed, insurer is "estopped" to assert their falsity as a defense to an action on the policy, and acts of agent, whether a general agent with power to issue policies, a soliciting agent, or merely a medical examiner, are in such respect acts of the insurer, even though agent is stipulated in application to be insured's agent.

Where insurer's general insurance agent knew that each of three brothers owned trucks registered in his own name, that each contracted for jobs separately, and that when a job would require more trucks than one brother possessed, he would arrange to hire trucks of the other brothers, and brothers in applying to the agent for workmen's compensation insurance, made no false representations, but relied on agent to give them the coverage needed, and policy was issued to the brothers jointly and not severally, insurer, in compensation proceeding by employee of one of the brothers, was "estopped" to take advantage of the "jointly and not severally" clause on ground that agent was agent of the brothers.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by John G. Elston, compensation claimant, against Arthur S. Hubbs, employer, and the National Automobile Insurance Company. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation to the compensation claimant, and the National Automobile Insurance Company brings a proceeding to review the award.

Award affirmed.

Rehearing denied; CURTIS and EDMONDS, JJ., dissenting.

C. W. Bowers, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett A. Corten and Eldon B. Spofford, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, Justice.

This is a proceeding to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. John G. Elston, a worker, was injured while in the employ of Arthur S. Hubbs. The petitioner had issued a policy of workmen's compensation insurance to "Jesse Hubbs, Arthur S. Hubbs, and Herbert O. Hubbs, jointly and not severally, a co-partnership." The Industrial Accident Commission held the petitioner liable on the policy on the theory that the petitioner had waived or was estopped to invoke the clause, "and not severally" because of its conduct in past dealings and because of the knowledge of its agent, Kincaid, in regard to the method of operations of the assured.

The assured, Jesse Hubbs, Arthur S. Hubbs and Herbert Hubbs are brothers. Each owned trucks that were registered in his own name. Each contracted for jobs separately. Often a job would require more trucks than the particular brother possessed and he would then arrange to hire the trucks of the other brother or brothers. A stipulated rental would be paid for the hire of the other's trucks. Each however looked after the upkeep of his own trucks. The brothers paid their Social Security Tax from one payroll and also based the premium on the policy here involved on a single payroll.

The facts as to the method of operation were familiar to Mr. S. H. Kincaid, a general insurance agent who was authorized by the petitioner to write policies for the petitioner. The assured did not specify the particular type of policy in their request to the agent but they relied upon Mr. Kincaid to give them the coverage which they needed.

[1] The facts here presented are very similar to those involved in Pacific Employers' Ins. Co. v. Arenbrust, 85 Cal.App. 263, 259 P. 121. In that case it appeared that Arenbrust, Farahan and Loran each owned a truck. By agreement they made it a practice to help each other on jobs where more than one truck was required. They had common headquarters although each was in business for himself. These facts were made clear to an insurance agent who issued the policy for Pacific Employers Insurance Co., and made it a coverage for a co-partnership. The company denied liability when a worker in the individual employ of Loran was injured. The court stated, "When an insured in good faith makes truthful answers to the questions contained in the application, but his answers, owing to the fraud, mistake, or negligence of the agent filling out the application, are incorrectly transcribed, the company is estopped to assert their falsity as a defense to the policy. The acts of the agent, whether he is a general agent with power to issue policies, a soliciting agent or merely a medical examiner for the company, are in this respect the acts of the company, and he cannot be regarded as the agent of the insured, even though it is so stipulated in the application."

[2] The same rule should apply in the present case. Mr. Kincaid was the agent of the petitioner insurance company which issued the policy here involved. He questioned the assured as to their method of operations. They made no false representations to him. Therefore the petitioner should be estopped in this case to take advantage of the "jointly but not severally," clause.

The facts in this case distinguish it from the case of National Automobile Insurance Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 11 Cal.2d 694, 81 P.2d 928. In that case there was a definite co-partnership, which owned certain equipment. One of the partners started a joint venture of the same nature with another party, not one of the partners. One of the employees of the venture was injured. The court held, correctly, that the employee of the separate venture was not covered by the partnership policy.

[3] The injured man, Elston, was the husband of a niece of Arthur S. Hubbs. Specific classes of relatives were excluded from coverage under the policy. The policy expressly excluded some relatives by marriage as, "son-in-law," "daughter-in-law," "mother-in-law," "father-in-law," "sister-in-law," "brother-in-law." The policy expressly mentioned nephews and nieces but no mention was made of nephews or nieces by marriage. Therefore it must be held that they were not excluded. Inasmuch as the policy expressly excluded certain designated relatives by marriage, and inasmuch as nephews or nieces by marriage were not so expressly excluded, it must be concluded that there was no intention to exclude them. It has also been held elsewhere that the word "nephews" should not be construed to include nephews by marriage. Boyd v. Perkins, 130 Ky. 77, 113 S. W. 95, 96; In re Lamberton's Estate, 105 Pa.Super. 348, 161 A. 596; In re Hunt's Estate, 53 Hun. 466, 6 N.Y.S. 186; Fedl v. Ryan, 118 N.J.L. 516, 193 A. 801.

The award is affirmed.

1. Action ⇐6

In view of statutory provision that declaratory relief may be asked for alone or with other relief, court may make a binding declaration of rights whether or not other relief is, or could be claimed at the time, the remedy is cumulative, and the mere fact that contract has already been breached and a cause of action therefor has accrued, does not necessarily deprive the court of the power to grant declaratory relief. 6. Contracts ⇐170(2)

In action for declaratory relief to determine whether plaintiff as owner and producer of foreign language motion picture by entering into contract granting defendant the exclusive rights to produce and distribute English version in certain countries and "The United Kingdom" granted rights with respect to Eire, wherein defendant introduced evidence that according to custom and usage of the motion picture industry, Eire was included in The United Kingdom, parties by modifying the contract to include Malta and Gibraltar which are political subdivisions of The United Kingdom, did not place a practical construction on the contract negativing presence of custom and usage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clement D. Nye, Judge.

Action for declaratory relief by Joseph N. Ermolieff against R. K. O. Radio Pictures, Incorporated, to determine whether defendant or plaintiff held certain motion picture rights in Eire. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment reversed.

Mitchell, Silberberg, Roth & Knupp and Guy Knupp, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph L. Fainer, L. A. Bloom, and Thomas Connell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CARTER, Justice.

Plaintiff and defendant are producers and distributors in the motion picture industry. Plaintiff was the owner and producer of a foreign language motion picture entitled "Michael Strogoff," based on a novel by Jules Verne, which prior to July 6, 1936, he had produced in the German and French languages. On that date the parties entered into a contract in which plaintiff granted to defendant the exclusive right to produce and distribute an English version of that picture in only those "countries or territories of the world" listed on an exhibit annexed to the contract. On the exhibit is listed among other places "The United Kingdom." Plaintiff reserved the rights in the picture in both foreign and English language in all countries or territories not listed in the exhibit. The contract was modified in December, 1936, and September, 1937, to add other countries or territories to the list. Plaintiff commenced the instant action on May 8, 1940, pleading the contract and its modifications and alleging that defendant had produced an English version of the picture under the title "Soldier and a Lady" in the United States and elsewhere; and that a controversy has arisen between the parties as to the countries and territories granted to defendant and those reserved by plaintiff under the contract and its modifications. Those allegations were admitted by defendant and it alleges that the only controversy between the parties is with respect to the area referred to as "The United Kingdom"; that the only dispute is whether "The United Kingdom," in which the contract grants rights to defendant, includes Eire or the Irish Free State; and that there is a custom and usage in the motion picture industry that that term does include Eire and that such usage is a part of the contract. Both the complaint and the answer pray for declaratory relief, namely, a declaration of their rights with respect to those areas embraced in the contract which are in dispute.

It was stipulated that the sole issue with respect to the territory embraced in the contract was whether defendant or plaintiff held the rights in the picture in Eire, which in turn depended upon whether The United Kingdom included Eire; that defendant did distribute the picture in Eire, and that The United Kingdom, from a political and legal viewpoint, did not include Eire, the latter being independent from it.

At the close of plaintiff's case the trial court denied defendant's motion to dismiss made on the ground that the case was not a proper one for declaratory relief under sections 1060–1062a of the Code of Civil Procedure. It granted a motion to strike all of defendant's evidence that by the custom and usage of the motion picture industry The United Kingdom included Eire on the ground that such evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff determining that he, rather than defendant, possessed the rights with respect to the picture in Eire. From that judgment defendant appeals, claiming error in the above-mentioned rulings of the trial court. Defendant takes the position, with relation to the propriety of declaratory relief under the circumstances, that because it was stipulated that it had distributed the picture in Eire, an action for damages had arisen for that breach of the contract, if such it was, and therefore declaratory relief was not available.

Section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part: "Any person interested under a * * * contract * * * may, in cases of actual controversy relating to the legal rights * * * of the respective parties, bring an action * * * for a declaration of his rights and duties in the premises, including a determination of any question of construction or validity arising under such instrument or contract. He may ask for a declaration of rights or duties, either alone or with other relief; and the court may make a binding declaration of such rights or duties, whether or not further relief is or could be claimed at the time. The declaration may be either affirmative or negative in form and effect, and such declaration shall have the force of a final judgment. Such declaration may be had before there has been any breach of the obligation in respect to which said declaration is sought." (Emphasis added.)

Section 1062 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The remedies provided by this chapter are cumulative, and shall not be construed as restricting any remedy, provisional or otherwise, provided by law for the benefit of any party to such action, and no judgment under this chapter shall preclude any party from obtaining additional relief based upon the same facts."

[1] It is clear from the above provision stating that declaratory relief may be asked for alone or with other relief, that the court may make a binding declaration of rights whether or not other relief is or could be claimed at the time, and that the remedy is cumulative, that the mere fact that the contract has already been breached and a cause of action therefor (one of the traditional remedies) has accrued, does not necessarily deprive the court of the power to grant declaratory relief under the law. Neither the fact that a party has another remedy nor that a breach has occurred prior to the commencement of his action compels the court to deny relief. Ordinarily, the alternative remedy, such as damages, injunctive relief and the like would be more harsh, and if he chooses the milder remedy, declaratory relief, the court is not required for that reason to compel him to seek a more stringent one. It is said in Tolle v. Struve, 124 Cal.App. 263, 267, 12 P.2d 61, 62: "Appellant asserts further that, if her attempt to terminate her obligations under the leases constituted a breach of legal duty, it was one which gave rise to a cause of action for remedial relief against her, and, that being so, there was no longer any room or occasion for the invocation of the statute authorizing declaratory relief. The statute itself seems to afford a complete answer, providing as it does (Code Civ.Proc. § 1060): 'He (the plaintiff) may ask for a declaration of rights or duties, either alone or with other relief. * * *' (Italics ours.) We can conceive of no meaning to be attributed to the italicized language unless the statute contemplates the giving of declaratory relief as well after a breach of legal duty as before. This conclusion is strengthened by the additional language of the section that 'the court may make a binding declaration of such rights or duties, whether or not further relief is or could be claimed at the time.' The concluding sentence of the section further bears this out: 'Such declaration may be had before there has been any breach of the obligation in respect to which said declaration is sought.' (Italics ours.) The use of the word 'may' is permissive, not mandatory. It serves to make clear what the Legislature feared might otherwise be obscure, in view of the fact that historically nearly all relief by way of judgment in common-law courts had been limited to redress for completed wrongs, that this statute contemplated declaratory relief, regardless of whether there had been an actual breach of obligation or not. It does not limit the right to such relief to cases where no breach has in fact occurred." See, also, Hamilton Corp. v. Corum, 218 Cal. 92, 21 P.2d 413; Wollenberg v. Tonningsen, 8 Cal.App.2d 722, 48 P.2d 738; Borchard, Declaratory Judgments, 2d Ed., pages 315-390. Defendant relies upon Standard Brands of California v. Bryce, 1 Cal.2d 718, 37 P.2d 446, and Fritz v. Superior Court, 18 Cal.App.2d 232 63 P.2d 872, as stating a contrary rule. In the Bryce case the court was concerned with the true nature of an action which involved the injury to real property, a tort in considering the proper place of trial of the action. When making such determination the true nature of the action is involved rather than what the parties may designate it. The court merely held that the action was not one for declaratory relief and that the law on venue could not be thwarted in that manner. In the instant case the interpretation of the rights and duties under the contract is clearly a case for declaratory relief. The same comment is applicable to the Fritz case, and furthermore in that case the court held that there was no actual controversy, that the facts as pleaded rather than establishing an action within the purview of section 1060, comprehended an action founded upon special statutory authority (Civil Code, sec. 315) and that there was no compliance with the requirements of that statute. It may well be that by reason of the discretion vested in the trial court in the granting of declaratory relief (Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 1061) the court may under proper circumstances deny that relief where other remedies will serve as well or better. See Orloff v. Metropolitan Trust Co., 17 Cal.2d 484, 110 P.2d 396; Stenzel v. Kronick, 102 Cal.App. 507, 283 P. 93; Welfare Investment Co. v. Stowell, 132 Cal.App. 275, 22 P.2d 529; A. Hamburger & Sons, Inc., v. Kice, 129 Cal.App. 68, 18 P.2d 115.

In the instant case plaintiff in his complaint claimed a controversy with respect to the respective rights of the parties under the contract. Defendant in its answer set forth with particularity the controversy as being whether The United Kingdom included Eire. It was stipulated that that was the sole controversy and the case was tried on that issue. The court denied defendant's claim that the case was not within the purview of section 1060 and granted declaratory relief. While it is true that defendant has already distributed pictures in Eire, it is also true that if plaintiff is correct in his assertion that Eire is not included in The United Kingdom, he has reserved the right in the contract to distribute pictures there. If defendant is correct it has the right to make a further distribution of pictures in Eire. Defendant's contention must therefore fail.

[3] Defendant asserts, however, that the judgment must be reversed because of the granting of plaintiff's motion to strike defendant's evidence that according to the custom and usage of the moving picture industry Eire is included in The United Kingdom. With that contention we agree. Both plaintiff and defendant are engaged in the business of producing and distributing moving pictures and rights in connection therewith. Defendant's evidence consisted of the testimony of several witnesses familiar with the distribution of motion pictures to the effect that in contracts covering the rights to produce pictures the general custom and usage was that the term "The United Kingdom" included Eire, the Irish Free State. Plaintiff's motion to strike out all of that evidence on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial was granted. Plaintiff, reserving his objection to defendant's evidence, offered contrary evidence concerning such custom and usage.

[4] The correct rule with reference to the admissibility of evidence as to trade usage under the circumstances here presented is that while words in a contract are ordinarily to be construed according to their plain, ordinary, popular or legal meaning, as the case may be, yet if in reference to the subject matter of the contract, particular expressions have by trade usage acquired a different meaning, and both parties are engaged in that trade, the parties to the contract are deemed to have used them according to their different and peculiar sense as shown by such trade usage. Parol evidence is admissible to establish the trade usage, and that is true even though the words are in their ordinary or legal meaning entirely unambiguous, inasmuch as by reason of the usage the words are used by the parties in a different sense. See Code of Civil Procedure, sec. 1861; Civil Code, secs. 1644, 1646, 1655; Jenny Lind Co. v. Bower & Co., 11 Cal. 194; Callahan v. Stanley, 57 Cal. 476; Higgins v. California Petroleum, etc., Co., 120 Cal. 629, 52 P. 1080; Caro v. Mattei, 39 Cal.App. 253, 178 P. 537; Wigmore on Evidence, vol. IX, sec. 2463, p. 204; Restatement, Contracts, secs. 246, 248; Hurst v. W. J. Lake & Co., 141 Or. 306, 16 P.2d 627, 89 A.L.R. 1228. The basis of this rule is that to accomplish a purpose of paramount importance in interpretation of documents, namely, to ascertain the true intent of the parties, it may well be said that the usage evidence does not alter the contract of the parties, but on the contrary gives the effect to the words there used as intended by the parties. The usage becomes a part of the contract in aid of its correct interpretation.

Plaintiff relies upon such cases as Brant v. California Dairies, Inc., 4 Cal.2d 128, 48 P.2d 13, and Wells v. Union Oil Co., 25 Cal. App.2d 165, 76 P.2d 696, as announcing a rule contrary to the one above stated. However, in those cases evidence of custom or usage was not offered, and no contention was made therein that the words employed in the contracts there involved had any other than their ordinary, popular or legal meaning in reference to the subject matter of said contracts. That is not the case here. Plaintiff also cites other authorities. In New York Cent. R. R. Co. v. Frank H. Buck Co., 2 Cal.2d 384, 41 P.2d 547, and the cases therein cited, the rule stated is merely that where the terms of the contract are expressly and directly contrary to the precise subject matter embraced in the custom or usage, parol evidence of that custom or usage is not admissible. The provision in the contract was tantamount to a clause that custom or usage shall not be a part of the contract. They did not involve a situation where the evidence was introduced to define a term in the contract. In the case at bar it cannot be said that there was a provision of that character. The contract stated that the defendant's rights existed only in the countries or territories listed in the annexed exhibit and plaintiff reserved the rights in all other countries or territories. "Territories" is a more comprehensive term than countries, and may well include more than one political entity or nation. The term "The United Kingdom" as a territory or area, does not necessarily limit that area to a political entity known as The United Kingdom. The fact that it is expressly stipulated in the contract that defendant has no rights in any countries not named in the exhibit, does not alter the situation. It falls short of being tantamount to an express and direct agreement that Eire shall not be considered as included in The United Kingdom. The door is still open to evidence of custom and usage with reference to the scope of The United Kingdom. The foregoing comments are equally applicable to the other cases cited by plaintiff, namely, Withers v. Moore, 140 Cal. 591, 74 P. 159; May v. American Trust Co., 135 Cal.App. 385, 27 P.2d 101; Brandenstein v. Jackling, 99 Cal.App. 438, 278 P. 880; Fish v. Correll, 4 Cal.App. 521, 88 P. 489, and California Jewelry Co. v. Provident Loan Ass'n, 6 Cal.App.2d 506, 45 P.2d 271.

[5] Plaintiff urges that since judicial notice may be taken and it was stipulated that Eire is independent of The United Kingdom and not a part thereof, the custom and usage evidence is not admissible to contradict that stipulation or notice. That notice and stipulation add nothing material to the situation. In any case where a word in a contract had an unquestioned common meaning there could be no dispute as to that common meaning, but the custom and usage is evidence of the peculiar sense in which it was used. The stipulation would add nothing that was not already plain on the face of the contract.

[6] It is contended that the parties placed a practical construction on the contract which negatived presence of custom and usage as a part thereof. The contract was modified on December 1, 1936, and September 8, 1937, to include countries not mentioned in the original contract. Eire was not among the added areas and nothing was said therein with reference to the territory embraced by The United Kingdom. Malta and Gibraltar which are political subdivisions of The United Kingdom were added. It does not necessarily follow that these modifications constituted a construction of the contract by the parties to the effect that Eire was not included in the term "The United Kingdom," nor that evidence of custom or usage was removed from the picture. Indeed, it may reasonably follow from those modifications that the criterion to be used in construing the area embraced within The United Kingdom was not the political or legal boundaries thereof. It may well be said to indicate an uncertainty as to the extent of the area embraced by that term because upon plaintiff's present reasoning The United Kingdom is circumscribed by the political and legal boundaries thereof. That being the case, there would be no occasion for the modification because Malta and Gilraltar being political subdivisions of The United Kingdom would be embraced in the contract as originally written. For those reasons, it is also a fair inference to conclude, that the parties because of the modifications, had some meaning in their mind for the term "The United Kingdom," other than that territory which is a political and legal part thereof.

[7] Finally, plaintiff asserts that the custom and usage evidence was inadmissible because a custom and usage to be available must be known by the parties or so generally known that knowledge must be presumed, citing Security Commercial & Savings Bank of San Diego v. Southern Trust & Commerce Bank, 74 Cal.App. 734, 241 P. 945. But in this case defendant's excluded evidence showed that the custom was general in the moving picture industry and both parties were engaged in the production of motion pictures. As plaintiff expresses it in his brief, "Respondent (plaintiff) is a world famous producer." It is stated in Restatement, Contracts, section 248, page 352: "Where both parties to a transaction are engaged in the same occupation, or belong to the same group of persons, the usages of that occupation or group are operative, unless one of the parties knows or has reason to know that the other party has an inconsistent intention."

[8] Plaintiff further urges in support of the exclusion of the evidence of usage; that the witnesses were biased, that it was a "low quality of proof," that it was insufficient and the like. These are matters that go to the weight of the evidence, rather than to its admissibility. With that we are not concerned. There is no necessity for a detailed analysis of the evidence. It is clear that the trial court did not purport to weigh or evaluate that evidence. It disregarded it in toto as is evinced by its order striking it out. On retrial of the action, if the parties so desire, the trial court may consider and give such weight to such evidence as may be introduced.

The judgment is reversed.

BARD v. KENT.

L. A. 17820.

Supreme Court of California

Feb. 10, 1942.

Rehearing Denied March 9, 1942.

1. Contracts ⇐172

An "option" is an "offer" and if it is without consideration, it is revoked by the offeror's death prior to acceptance, but if consideration is given, it is a "contract" binding on the offeror and his successors in interest after his death. Civ.Code, § 1587, subd. 4.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Option", "Offer" and "Contract".

2. Appeal and error ⇐1009(2)

Where trial court in action by offeror's administrator to cancel an option to extend a lease, found that no consideration for the option was given and that the option was therefore revoked by the offeror's death, judgment for administrator was required to be upheld if the finding was supported by sufficient evidence. Civ.Code, § 1587, subd. 4.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇐86(1)

The payment by the holder of an option to extend a lease, of architect's fee for sketches of proposed improvements of leased premises, is "consideration" sufficient to make the option irrevocable only if the offeror agreed to accept the payment as consideration.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Consideration".

4. Landlord and tenant ⇐86(1)

An act of an offeree does not constitute "consideration" binding on offeror and render option to extend lease irrevocable, unless the offeror agreed to be bound in return therefor.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇐86(1)

"Consideration", sufficient to make an option to extend lease irrevocable, must actually be bargained for as the exchange for the promise, and the existence or nonexistence of a bargain depends on the manifested intention of the parties.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇐86(1)

The fact that a promisee relies on a promise to his injury, or the promissor gains some advantage therefrom, does not establish "consideration" which will render option to extend lease irrevocable, without the element of bargain or agreed exchange.

7. Landlord and tenant ⇐86(1)

In action by deceased offeror's administrator to cancel option to extend lease, trial court was justified under evidence in concluding that offeror did not promise to grant option in return for offeree's engaging of an architect to draw sketches of proposed improvements on leased premises, though offeror suggested engaging the architect.

8. Estoppel ⇐93(1)

In action by offeror's administrator against offeree to cancel option to extend lease, on ground that there was no consideration and that option was not accepted during offeror's lifetime, offeree was not entitled to judgment under doctrine of "promissory estoppel" because he engaged an architect to make sketches of proposed improvements on leased premises in accordance with offeror's suggestion, where there was no showing that offeror promised to keep option open or made any other promise on which offeree could rely.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Roy V. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Ben Bard, as special administrator, etc., against L. E. Kent, individually, and as director, etc., to cancel and set aside an option to extend a lease. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed.

Paul Vallée and Jerome H. Kann, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

The defendant in this action, L. E. Kent, administered the business affairs of Mrs. Ruth Roland Bard, hereinafter referred to as Miss Roland, under a general power of attorney for many years before her death. In 1933, Kent, acting as agent for Miss Roland, leased for five years a parcel of real property owned by her to Cliff Odums and Albert M. Berkson, who constructed a building on the property and installed equipment for the operation of a restaurant named the Cat and the Fiddle. The restaurant failed, and Odums and Berkson abandoned the venture. Thereupon Kent, acting in his personal capacity together with Howard Hastings and Don Carpenter, organized a corporation, known as the Cat and the Fiddle Company, which assumed the obligations of Odums and Berkson and took over the operation of the restaurant. When this venture likewise proved unprofitable, Kent bought the stock of Hastings and Carpenter in the Cat and the Fiddle Company and continued to pay off the obligations that the company had assumed. Various sublessees who thereafter tried to operate a restaurant on the premises were unsuccessful.

On August 21, 1935, Miss Roland executed a lease of the premises to the Cat and the Fiddle Company for a term of five years. The lessee subsequently obtained an extension of the lease and written authority to sublease the premises to M. A. McDonnell. On August 30, 1935, the premises were subleased to McDonnell for a term of five years ending August 31, 1940, with an option to renew the lease for one year. This lease from the Cat and the Fiddle Company to McDonnell included the right to use the equipment and fixtures on the premises and provided for rental payments of 10% of the gross receipts up to $6,000 and 8% of the gross receipts over that amount, with a minimum payment of $450 per month. The restaurant operated by McDonnell proved highly successful, and he made improvements costing approximately $30,000. Meanwhile Kent dissolved the corporation distributed its assets to himself, and continued his business as an individual under the fictitious name of the Cat and the Fiddle Company. As owner of the improvements upon the property he received half of the rent, but upon termination of the lease the improvements were to revert to Miss Roland.

During 1936 McDonnell told Miss Roland and Kent that he would undertake additional improvements at a cost of about $10,000 if his lease were extended for another four years. Miss Roland in subsequent conversations with Kent expressed a willingness to grant the extension if the proposed improvements would cost approximately $10,000. She suggested that Kent check the figures and have an architect draw sketches for the purpose of making an estimate. On August 17, 1937, Miss Roland executed to the Cat and the Fiddle Company an option to extend its lease for an additional four years in order that it in turn could give McDonnell an extension of his lease. The option was signed for Miss Roland by Kent as her attorney in fact. It recited that "For consideration of Ten Dollars ($10.00) and other valuable consideration" the Cat and the Fiddle Company was granted an option to extend its lease for an additional period of four years. After the option was signed, Kent instructed Kenneth McDonald, an architect, to draw sketches of the proposed improvements. These sketches were billed to Kent and paid for by him subsequent to the deaths of the architect and Miss Roland.

On September 22, 1937, before the option was exercised, Miss Roland died. The special administrator of her estate brought this action against Kent to cancel and set aside the option on the grounds that it was not only given without consideration and therefore revoked by the death of the offeror, but that it was obtained by fraud. It was stipulated that the sum of $10 was not paid to Miss Roland and that none of the proposed improvements were made. The trial court found that defendant made a complete disclosure of all the transactions to Miss Roland and that he was not guilty of any fraud or wrongdoing in his dealings with her. The court also found, however, that there was no consideration given for the option and that it was therefore revoked by Miss Roland's death. Defendant has appealed from the judgment in favor of plaintiff.

[1, 2] An option is an offer and if it is without consideration, it is revoked by the death of the offeror prior to acceptance. If consideration is given, it is a contract binding upon the offeror and upon his successors in interest after his death. See case cited in 6 Cal.Jur., pp. 48–53, §§ 27, 28, 29; Williston, Contracts (Revised Ed.), §§ 61, 62; Cal.Civ.Code, § 1587(4). Since the trial court found that no consideration was given for the option in question, the judgment must be upheld if the finding is supported by sufficient evidence.

[3-6] Defendant contends that his payment of the architect's fee for sketches of the proposed improvements is a consideration sufficient to make the option irrevocable. There is no doubt that such payment would be consideration for an option if the offeror agreed to accept it as such. Marsh v. Lott, 8 Cal.App. 384, 97 P. 163; Chrisman v. Southern Calif. Edison Co., 83 Cal. App. 249, 256 P. 618; 6 Cal.Jur. 168, 169, § 117; 1 Williston, Contracts (Revised Ed.), §§ 102, 102a; Rest. Contracts, § 75; see Hemenway v. Abbott, 8 Cal.App. 450, 97 P. 190. No act of an offeree, however, can constitute consideration binding upon the offeror unless the latter agrees to be bound in return therefor. Williams v. Hasshagen, 166 Cal. 386, 390, 137 P. 9; Shadburne v. Daly, 76 Cal. 355, 359, 18 P. 403; Commercial Bank of Madera v. Redfield, 122 Cal. 405, 409, 55 P. 160, 772; Tiffany & Co. v. Spreckels, 202 Cal. 778, 790, 262 P. 742. See Williston, Contracts (Revised Ed.), § 61, at pp. 180, 181, note 16; §§ 100, 102, 102a. In the words of the Restatement of Contracts (§ 75): "Consideration must actually be bargained for as the exchange for the promise. * * * The existence or non-existence of a bargain where something has been parted with by the promisee or received by the promisor depends upon the manifested intention of the parties. * * * The fact that the promisee relies on the promise to his injury, or the promisor gains some advantage therefrom, does not establish consideration without the element of bargain or agreed exchange."

[7] In the present case the trial court was justified in concluding from the evidence that Miss Roland did not promise to grant the option in return for Kent's engaging the architect. Under this interpretation of the evidence Miss Roland merely stated the conditions under which she was willing to extend the lease. Although, according to Kent's testimony, she suggested engaging an architect to check the figures on the proposed improvements, this suggestion did not constitute a promise by her to grant the option if that were done. Kent employed the architect to convince her that the necessary conditions existed, but she made no promise to extend the lease in the event they did, and remained free to withdraw her offer at any time before acceptance. Kent could have exercised the option as soon as it was executed, but he chose instead to wait rather than to undertake immediately the obligations incident to leasing the property for another four years. The engagement of the architect was to actuate Miss Roland to keep her offer open, but it did not constitute consideration binding her to do so. At best the evidence created a conflict for the trial court to resolve. Estate of Thomson, 165 Cal. 290, 131 P. 1045.

[8] Defendant contends that in engaging the architect he acted in reliance upon the option given him by Miss Roland to extend the lease, and that under the doctrine of promissory estoppel a promisor who has received no consideration is nevertheless bound by his promise when he has induced another to suffer detriment in reliance thereon. See Rest. Contracts, § 90; 1 Williston, Contracts (Revised Ed.), § 139. There must, however, be a promise on which reliance may be based. See Medberry v. Olcovich, 15 Cal.App.2d 263, 59 P.2d 551, 60 P.2d 281; Lasar v. Johnson, 125 Cal. 549, 58 P. 161; University of Southern Calif. v. Bryson, 103 Cal.App. 39, 283 P. 949; Magee v. Magee, 174 Cal. 276, 162 P. 1023. Defendant did not plead the issue of promissory estoppel at the trial, and there is nothing in the record to show that Miss Roland at any time promised to keep the option open or made any other promise on which defendant could rely. She merely made without consideration an offer, which was never accepted, to renew the lease.

The judgment is affirmed.

The Supreme Court may not disturb findings based on conflicting evidence.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇐17, 88(3)

Evidence sustained finding that there was a valid acceptance by tenants of landlords' offer to renew the lease, that thereafter tenants improved the realty in consideration of terms of renewal offer, that tenants executed a quitclaim deed by reason of false representations of one of the landlords, and that landlords were "estopped" to deny that terms of offer to renew lease were fully binding on them.

Where trial court in action for restitution of realty properly found that one of the plaintiffs was guilty of actual fraud in obtaining quitclaim deed from defendants, trial court properly found that plaintiffs were "estopped" to set up statute of frauds as defense to defendants' cross-complaint seeking specific performance of a renewal lease, where defendants had made improvements relying on renewal lease.

Action by George W. Halsey and others against M. R. Robinson, and wife, to compel restitution of property held by defendants under a purported lease and to recover rents, profits, and damages alleged to have accrued during the withholding period, wherein the defendants filed a cross-complaint seeking specific performance of renewal lease. HOUSER, Justice.

The plaintiffs herein appeal from a judgment rendered on the defendants' cross-complaint by which the court decreed specific performance of a lease.

The plaintiffs, George W. Halsey and Frances L. Halsey (husband and wife) and Joseph Halsey, who are the owners of farm land in Kern County brought this action to compel restitution of the property which was held by M. R. Robinson and his wife under a purported lease. The plaintiffs also sought to recover rents, profits and damages which allegedly had accrued during the withholding period. The defendants answered and cross-complained, asserting they possessed a leasehold interest in the land, also claiming they were holding under an agreement for a renewal lease and asking for a decree of specific performance of such lease. The findings made by the trial court in favor of the defendants and cross-complainants were based on the following factual situation as revealed by the evidence:

The defendants had held the land here involved since 1936 under successive leases from the plaintiffs, who resided in Los Angeles. At the time this litigation arose the defendants were in possession of the farm under a lease for the year 1940, which had been executed by plaintiff George W. Halsey as lessor. In December, 1939, at the time such lease was entered into, some discussion was had between the parties thereto relative to the renewal of the lease at the expiration of the 1940 term. Again in the early part of 1940 defendant Robinson and George W. Halsey carried on correspondence with respect to a proposed renewal of the lease, and on May 30, 1940, Halsey wrote to Robinson with regard to certain conditions on which he would execute a five-year renewal lease and asked Robinson to make a bid therefor. On June 4, 1940, Robinson replied to that communication, advising Halsey that he would pay $1,000 a year as rental under the proposed renewal lease and stating that he desired an early reply because he wished to do some leveling of the land during the following month. On June 7, 1940, Halsey again wrote to Robinson, stating that the lessors would give him a lease for five years beginning January 1, 1941, on the condition that Robinson would meet the payment of an expenditure which had been incurred on the farm in connection with the installation of a pump and well, and on the further condition that Robinson would agree to make three separate rental payments each year, aggregating the sum of $1,000 annually during the five-year term. That letter concluded with the statement that if Robinson felt he could handle the new lease under the specified terms he could begin to level the land. The facts just related are not in dispute. However, the evidence includes testimony with respect to other facts, which was sharply conflicting. Robinson testified that on June 10 he wrote to Halsey and accepted the terms as set forth in the letter of June 7, and advised that he would "start leveling" the land; and there was evidence to show that shortly thereafter the defendants made improvements on the farm to the extent of approximately $400 in value. Halsey denied having received the purported acceptance letter, but two witnesses corroborated Robinson's testimony with respect thereto. The evidence also shows that subsequent to the time Robinson received the letter of June 7, and prior to November 14, 1940, George W. Halsey and his wife visited Robinson at the farm, where they had some discussion relative to a proposed change in the terms of the renewal lease, although no such change was ever effected. Thereafter, and on November 14, 1940, the defendants visited the Halseys in Los Angeles, at which time Robinson delivered to George W. Halsey written proof of his payment of the expenditure relating to the pump and well. At such time and place the parties again discussed the matter of the five-year renewal lease; and the defendants testified that George W. Halsey thereupon fraudulently represented to them that before a formal renewal lease could be executed, and in order to clear the record, it would be necessary for the Robinsons to execute a quitclaim deed to the property, and that he advised them the renewal lease would be executed immediately after they turned over to him the said quitclaim deed. The defendants testified further that in reliance on such representations they delivered to Halsey a quitclaim deed, but that immediately thereafter he refused to execute a renewal lease and informed them the land was being sold and they "would have to get off the place." They also testified that during that conversation at the Halsey home George W. Halsey offered Robinson the sum of $200 for "making the trip to Los Angeles," but that Robinson refused to accept it and informed Halsey that he had entered into an agreement for a five-year lease to the land and would not move from the farm. In his testimony, Halsey denied that the conversation had on November 14 was as related by the defendants, but stated that on such occasion he told the defendants he had secured a purchaser for the farm and that they would have to give it up for that reason—whereupon, he asserted, they agreed to execute the quitclaim deed. Halsey admitted having offered Robinson the sum of $200, but testified that such sum was tendered as reimbursement for the improvements made on the land by the defendants.

Shortly after the quitclaim deed was executed, it was recorded by the plaintiffs, who thereupon gave the defendants a thirty-day notice to vacate. In December, prior to expiration of the 1940 lease, and in reliance on the validity of the quitclaim deed, the plaintiffs instituted the present action.

The principal question presented for determination here is whether the findings were sufficiently supported by the evidence. As heretofore indicated, a reading of the transcript reveals a conflict in the evidence on the question whether Halsey received notice of Robinson's acceptance of the terms of the June 7 letter, also as to what was said and done by the parties at the Halsey home on November 14 when the quitclaim deed was executed. The trial court resolved all conflicts in favor of the defendants. It made findings to the effect that there was a valid written acceptance of the June 7 letter: that commencing on that date Robinson began to and did level and improve the land to the value of over $400, which improvements were not required by the terms of the 1940 lease under which the Robinsons were then in possession of the land but were made solely in consideration of the terms of the letter of June 7; that on or about the 13th day of August, 1940, the plaintiffs inspected the property and were shown the improvements so made; that at that time and place they requested the defendants to change the terms of the purported five-year lease from a "cash rental" to a "crop rental" basis, which request was refused by the defendants; that the latter executed the quitclaim deed solely by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of George W. Halsey as to the purported necessity therefor and on his promise that immediately thereafter a five-year renewal lease would be executed in favor of the defendant; and that by reason of the matters and things as set forth in the findings herein, the plaintiffs were estopped to deny that the conditions and terms of the June 7 letter were fully binding on them.

[1, 2] Aside from the fact that under well-settled principles of law this court may not disturb findings based on conflicting evidence, on an examination of the entire record we are of the view that there was ample evidence to sustain the findings just referred to, including the finding that the quitclaim deed was in fact executed by the defendants solely because of the false and fraudulent representations of plaintiff George W. Halsey. Several inconsistencies appear in his testimony. Thus, although he denied having received Robinson's acceptance of the June 7 letter, his conversation with Robinson at the farm in August, at which time he proposed that the terms of the five-year lease be changed from a cash basis to a crop rental basis, imports a recognition by him of an existing agreement under which the Robinsons were to be given a renewal lease. Moreover, having been present in person at the farm on that occasion, Halsey had constructive, if not actual, notice that among other improvements made to the land, some "leveling" had been done—a project which was contemplated by the terms of the Halsey letter of June 7, conditional on Robinson's acceptance of such terms. The fact that thereafter Robinson had proceeded to level the land gives rise to the inference that he had in fact taken the necessary steps to assure himself that the lease would be renewed, before assuming the hazard of making any such improvements. Nor would it appear reasonable to assume—in accordance with the testimony of plaintiff George W. Halsey—that on the occasion on which the defendants executed the quitclaim deed they voluntarily consented to do so solely on Halsey's statement that he intended to sell the land. Robinson's prior letters to Halsey and his actions thereafter, including payment of the pump and well expenditure, reveal a continuous effort on his part to effect a renewal of the lease and to meet the conditions advanced by George W. Halsey as a prerequisite thereto. Moreover, had the defendants willingly consented to execute the quitclaim deed solely because Halsey told them he intended to sell the land, and for that reason indicated their willingness to vacate the property, no explanation is suggested for Robinson's refusal to accept the $200 which George W. Halsey offered him, if, in accordance with Halsey's testimony, it was tendered as reimbursement for the improvements made on the land. The fact that Robinson refused to accept the money—and Halsey admitted it was refused—affords strong proof that the version given by the defendants of the conversation and actions of the parties hereto at the Halsey home on November 14, was true and correct, and that the testimony given by Halsey in that respect was false.

[3] In view of our conclusion that the trial court was correct in finding that the plaintiffs were estopped to deny the validity of the June 7 writing, no further consideration need be given the plaintiffs' contention that it was the intention of the parties to reduce their contract (the letter of June 7) to a more formal writing before being bound thereby—and having failed to do so there was no contract which could be enforced. As reflected by the findings of the trial court, the facts of this case which give rise to an estoppel afford no basis for the application of the rule of law which is embodied in that contention.

[4] Nor, in the light of the trial court's ruling as to estoppel, is it necessary to give consideration to the plaintiffs' contention that there was no memorandum of the agreement to execute a lease sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds.

In Hambey v. Wise, 181 Cal. 286, 289, 184 P. 9, 10, the court said: "* * * in general relief is given * * * first, where to allow the statute [of frauds] to be set up would be to secure to the party relying upon it the fruits of actual fraud * * *." Due to the presence of actual fraud in the present case, there can be no doubt but that the trial court here was warranted in finding that the plaintiffs were estopped to set up the statute of frauds under the rule stated in the cited case. The equitable doctrine of estoppel to raise the statute of frauds has been judicially recognized and frequently applied in this state since 1909 when the decision in Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 P. 88, 134 Am.St.Rep. 154, was rendered. See, also, Wilson v. Bailey, 8 Cal.2d 416, 421, 65 P.2d 770; Notten v. Mensing, 3 Cal.2d 469, 474, 45 P.2d 198; Fleming v. Dolfin, 214 Cal. 269, 4 P.2d 776, 78 A.L.R. 585; Kraft v. Rooke, 103 Cal. App. 552, 556, 284 P. 935; 19 Cal.Law Rev. 80. That such doctrine serves a just and salutary purpose in the field of equity jurisprudence is well illustrated by its application to the facts of this case. Here a valuable property right was sought to be wrested from these defendants who, the record shows, were farming people of limited education and who, due to their lack of familiarity with legal procedure and business methods in general, were willing to and did rely on the promises and representations of the plaintiffs in executing the quitclaim deed.

[5] There is no merit in the contention that the June 7 letter, having been written and signed only by George W. Halsey, would not be binding on the other two co-owners of the land. There is evidence in the record to show that both of the latter had full knowledge of the several leases to the Robinsons from 1936 up to and including the 1940 lease, and that prior to the institution of the present action neither of the two co-owners ever made any objection to any of the leases which had been made to the Robinsons. See Swartzbaugh v. Sampson, 11 Cal.App. 2d 451, at pages 462, 463, 54 P.2d 73. The evidence also was sufficient to show a ratification by the co-tenants of the purported agreement of June 7 (Bessho v. General Petroleum Corp., 186 Cal. 133, at page 141, 199 P. 22), which, in part, was evidenced by their reliance on the quitclaim deed in prosecuting the present action. Restatement of Agency, vol. I, § 97, p. 241.

Nor is there merit in the claim that the renewal lease, which by the terms of the judgment the plaintiffs were ordered to execute, was not just, fair and equitable. In essence, it was not essentially different from the former leases which the parties had executed. The court directed that the renewal lease specify a yearly rental of $1,000, and such is the amount which the plaintiffs demanded by the letter of June 7.

From the foregoing it follows that the judgment should be and it is affirmed.

Proposed agreements for construction and leasing of a rubbish incinerator to city constituted a "lease" and "option to purchase" and did not violate constitutional "debt" limit provision, where it was admitted that amount of rentals which city might be required to pay in any single fiscal year, together with its other liabilities, would not exceed its income for that year, city was in no event to have right to purchase incinerator at less than its fair appraised value when city elected to purchase, and city after learning appraised value could decline to purchase under option and continue with lease. In Bank.

Proceeding in mandamus by the City of Los Angeles against Milton Offner, as Secretary of the Board of Public Works, to compel the posting and publishing of notices inviting sealed bids for the construction and leasing to the city of a rubbish incinerator.

Peremptory writ ordered to issue.

Ray L. Chesebro, City Atty., and Bourke Jones, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Richard C. Waltz, of Beverly Hills, for respondent.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

By this proceeding in mandamus the city of Los Angeles seeks to compel the respondent as secretary of its board of public works, to post and publish notices inviting sealed bids for the construction and leasing to the city of a rubbish incinerator. The respondent demurred to the petition, contending that the proposed lease will create a municipal indebtedness or liability which will exceed in the year of its execution the income and revenue then available to the city in violation of article XI, section 18, of the state Constitution.

The Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles by resolution has adopted specifications for the construction and leasing to the city of a rubbish incinerator, and for the receipt of bids therefor. The agreements to be entered into between the city and the successful bidder are to provide for the leasing by the city to such bidder of certain city-owned property for a period of ten years at a rental of $1 a month, it being contemplated that the contractor will construct the incinerator on the property within nine months thereafter. Simultaneously with the execution of this lease and construction contract, the successful bidder is to execute a lease to the city of the demised premises with the incinerator thereon for a period of nine years and nine months, the city to pay a monthly rental to be specified in the bid. The city is to be given an option to purchase the incinerator at various intervals during the term of the lease with a minimum option price for each interval being specified by the bidder. If the city elects to purchase, the option price shall be the then appraised value of the incinerator as determined by three independent appraisers, provided only that it shall not be lower than the minimum price specified in the bid. Title to the incinerator is to remain in the successful bidder unless the city elects to purchase. The land lease from the city is to run for a period of three months after the expiration of the incinerator lease and option agreement from the successful bidder to the city, thus affording the bidder time within which to remove the incinerator, a right expressly reserved to him in the event the city elects not to exercise the option to purchase.

It is alleged in the petition "that the present rubbish incinerator facilities of petitioner City are inadequate and obsolete, and constitute a fire hazard, and that the public health and safety demand the immediate construction of a large, modern rubbish incinerator."

In refusing to post and publish notices inviting sealed bids for the construction and leasing of such incinerator, the respondent secretary challenges the validity of the proposed agreements on the ground that they would violate the constitutional provision which prohibits a city from incurring an indebtedness or liability in any year in excess of the income and revenue provided for that year without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors of the city. In this connection the petition alleges that while the aggregate of the rentals that might accrue under the lease, together with other municipal debts and liabilities incurred during the fiscal year when the leases and contract will be entered into, will exceed the income and revenue for that year, the amount of rentals that the city may be required to pay in any single fiscal year, together with its other debts and liabilities, will not exceed the income and revenue provided for such year. The question for consideration, therefore, is whether the city in entering into the proposed leases and contract will incur an indebtedness or liability for the rentals for the entire term or whether such action will create an indebtedness or liability in that year for such rentals only as will become payable during that fiscal year. Or, as respondent states, whether "such an arrangement is equivalent in reality to an installment contract for the purchase of said incinerator over a period of nine years and nine months."

[1, 2] It has been held generally in the numerous cases that have come before this court involving leases and agreements containing options to purchase that if the lease or other agreement is entered into in good faith and creates no immediate indebtedness for the aggregate installments therein provided for but, on the contrary, confines liability to each installment as it falls due and each year's payment is for the consideration actually furnished that year, no violence is done to the constitutional provision. McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 P. 358, 31 L.R.A. 794, 53 Am.St.Rep. 191; Smilie v. Fresno County, 112 Cal. 311, 44 P. 556; Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 553, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670; Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 180, 181, 76 P. 958; Krenwinkle v. City of Los Angeles, 4 Cal.2d 611, 613, 51 P.2d 1098. If, however, the instrument creates a full and complete liability upon its execution, or if its designation as a "lease" is a subterfuge and it is actually a conditional sales contract in which the "rentals" are installment payments on the purchase price for the aggregate of which an immediate and present indebtedness or liability exceeding the constitutional limitation arises against the public entity, the contract is void. Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 201 P. 925; City and County of San Francisco v. Boyle, 195 Cal. 426, 233 P. 965; Mahoney v. City and County of San Francisco, 201 Cal. 248, 257 P. 49; Garrett v. Swanton, 216 Cal. 220, 13 P.2d 725.

[3] The rule as applied to each of these situations is well stated in Garrett v. Swanton, supra, 216 Cal. at page 226, 13 P.2d at page 728, as follows: "The law is well settled in this state that installment contracts of any kind, where the installment payments are to be made over a period of years and are to be paid out of the ordinary revenue and income of a city, where each installment is not in payment of the consideration furnished that year, and the total amount of said installments, when coupled with the other expenditures, exceeds the yearly income, are violative of the constitutional provision in question unless approved by a popular vote. This is so whether the contract be denominated a mortgage, lease, or conditional sale. * * * It is true that under the doctrine enunciated in McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 P. 358, 31 L.R.A. 794, 53 Am.St.Rep. 191 * * * contracts for the furnishing of property in the future have been upheld, but only where no liability or indebtedness came into existence until the consideration was actually furnished. In other words, such contracts are valid where each year's installment is within the city's income, and where each year's payment is for the consideration actually furnished that year." (Italics added.)

[4] We are satisfied that the proposed agreements involved in the proceeding now before us are within the rule as applied in the McBean and Krenwinkle cases and are therefore valid and do not violate the debt limitation provision of the constitution. The transaction here challenged constitutes in reality a lease with reasonable terms and option to purchase. We find no evident present intention on the part of the city to purchase the incinerator. The rentals are for a definite amount, to be specified in the bid. The amount of the rentals and the minimum option prices are to be determined by competitive bidding, but in no event is the city to have the right to purchase the incinerator at less than its fair appraised value at the time it elects to purchase. Under such circumstances, the city is not required to exercise the option in order to protect its prior investment in the form of rental payments. The rental payments are intended to represent the fair rental value of the incinerator and the option purchase price is intended to represent the then fair value of the incinerator itself. The city after learning the appraised value may decline to purchase under the option and continue with the lease. If the city has not exercised the option to purchase during the term of the lease, provision has been made for the removal of the incinerator by the lessor. In view of the admitted fact that the amount of rentals that the city may be required to pay in any single fiscal year, together with its other debts and liabilities will not exceed its income and revenue for such year, it cannot be said that the proposed agreements violate the debt limitation provision of the Constitution.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

BUTLER et al. v. WOODBURN.

Sac. 5413.

Supreme Court of California.

Rehearing Denied March 6, 1942.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇐189

Where the purchaser of land under an executory contract has entered into possession thereof according to the terms of the agreement, during the life of such agreement, the purchaser in possession is "estopped" from denying the validity of his vendor's title for the purpose of defeating the agreement.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Estop".

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇐296, 308(8)

The purchaser of land under an executory contract, who has entered into possession of the land according to the terms of the contract, so long as he remains in possession of the land under such contract, cannot successfully resist either the vendor's action for the purchase price or an action to recover possession of the land upon the ground that vendor's title is defective.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇐190

Where purchaser of land under an executory contract, having entered into possession thereof according to terms of the contract, acquires an outstanding interest in the land, such outstanding title thus acquired cannot be used for the purpose of defeating purchaser's obligation under the contract so long as the possession originally obtained in accordance with the contract continues.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇐190

Where the holder of an exclusive option to purchase land, in which optionor actually owned only an undivided seven-eighths interest, with knowledge of optionor, entered into executory contract to sell the land to defendant and himself, permitting defendant to go into possession thereunder in order to commence mining operations, general rule that any outstanding title acquired by a purchaser in possession of realty under an executory contract of purchase inures to benefit of the contract vendor for purposes of the contract was not applicable to "estop" the defendant, who after going into possession had acquired the outstanding one-eighth interest, from asserting title thereunder as against optionor.

5. Deeds ⇐208(3)

Possession of a deed by the grantee is "prima facie evidence" that deed was properly delivered to grantee.

Where the true owner of realty permits another to appear as the owner or as having full power of disposition over the realty, an innocent third party who is thus led into dealing with the apparent owner will be protected by equity against the claims of the true owner under statutory principle that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, the one whose negligence made the act possible must be the sufferer. Civ.Code, § 3543.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇐190

Where owner of undivided seven-eighths interest in land, by permitting holder of an option to purchase the land to retain a deed purporting to convey all the land from owner to optionee, made it possible for optionee to induce defendant to enter into executory contract whereby optionee agreed to convey the land to himself and defendant and permitted defendant to remain in possession of land under contract expending money thereon, owner of seven-eighths interest could not in equity assert that title to outstanding one-eighth interest acquired by defendant after going into possession was held in trust by him for owner and must be conveyed to owner upon repayment to defendant of the amount expended in the acquisition thereof. CARTER, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Warren Steel, Judge.

Action by E. F. Butler and others against Walter M. Woodburn to establish a trust in favor of the named plaintiff as to an undivided one-eighth interest in certain realty, the legal title to which was held by defendant, and to require the execution by defendant of a conveyance to the named plaintiff upon repayment to defendant of the amount expended by him in acquiring the interest. From a judgment denying the relief sought and quieting defendant's title to the one-eighth interest, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

GIBSON, Chief Justice.

The plaintiffs brought this action in the Superior Court of Yuba County to have it adjudged that the defendant, Walter M. Woodburn, holds title to an undivided one-eighth interest in certain real property as a trustee for the plaintiff, E. F. Butler. The complaint also prayed that defendant Woodburn be compelled to execute and deliver a deed conveying title in the one-eighth interest to plaintiff Butler upon the repayment to defendant of the amount expended by him in acquiring the property. The trial court rendered a judgment which denied the relief sought and quieted defendant's title to the one-eighth interest in the property. Plaintiffs bring this appeal from the judgment for defendant.

The plaintiff Butler was the owner of a seven-eighths interest in two parcels of real property in Yuba County which consisted of the "Lost Channel Mine" and 160 acres of additional land. The remaining one-eighth interest in the property was owned by one Frank Butler, a half-brother of plaintiff Butler. In 1931, plaintiff Butler entered into an agreement with the plaintiff Maynard in which Maynard was given an exclusive option to purchase the property for a period of five years, which was extended until 1946 by a later agreement. Under this agreement Maynard was entitled to possession of the property for the purpose of engaging in mining operations thereon. On July 10, 1934, Maynard and his wife, as parties of the first part, agreed to sell the "Lost Channel Mine" together with certain water rights to the defendant Woodburn and to Maynard, as parties of the second part. Maynard and his wife represented that they were the owners of the property and agreed to place a good and sufficient deed in escrow for the duration of the agreement. Woodburn and Maynard, as parties of the second part, agreed to purchase the land for the sum of $60,000, all but $500 of which was to be paid in specified percentages of the gross proceeds derived from mining operations. For the purpose of completing the contract of purchase, the defendant was permitted to go into possession of the property in order to commence mining operations. A separate operating agreement was entered into at the same time between Woodburn and Maynard relating to the operation of the mine. This agreement was modified by later agreements entered into on January 15, 1935, and March 5, 1936.

Pursuant to the contract of purchase a deed purporting to convey title to the property was placed in escrow on January 21, 1935. On or about June 26, 1936, after the defendant Woodburn had expended over $20,000 on the "Lost Channel Mine," he discovered for the first time that Frank Butler was the owner of record of an undivided one-eighth interest in the property. The trial court found that during this entire period plaintiffs knew that the plaintiff Butler was the owner of seven-eighths in the property and that Frank Butler was the owner of the other one-eighth interest. It was also found that at the time the contract of purchase was entered into, the plaintiff Maynard falsely represented to defendant that he was the owner of all the properties described. In support of these false statements he exhibited to defendant a deed executed by plaintiff Butler and purporting to convey all of the property from Butler to Maynard. The court found that after Woodburn discovered the false representations made by Maynard and after he learned the condition of the title, he sought to protect his investment in the property by purchasing the undivided one-eighth interest in the property which was owned by Frank Butler. This purchase from Frank Butler was made on August 11, 1936, and the court found that it was made by defendant in good faith to protect his interests and only after he had expended a large sum of money on the property and had been lulled by Maynard, acting with the approval of the plaintiff Butler, into thinking that the title to the entire property was vested in Maynard. The trial court resolved all conflicts in favor of defendant, ordered that the plaintiffs take nothing by reason of their complaint, and gave judgment quieting defendant's title to the undivided one-eighth interest which he purchased from Frank Butler.

The contentions advanced upon this appeal by the plaintiffs are the arguments which the trial court rejected. Plaintiffs rely on the established rule that any outstanding title acquired by a purchaser in possession of real property under an executory contract of purchase inures to the benefit of the contract vendor for the purposes of the agreement and that all the contract purchaser can ask is to be reimbursed for his expenditures in acquiring the outstanding interest. In arguing that this doctrine should be applied in favor of the plaintiff Butler in the present case, plaintiffs cite only the general statement of the rule which is found in Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, 533, 91 P. 498. Also, 25 Cal.Jur. 689. The main portion of the brief upon appeal, therefore, is devoted to the contention, which is contrary to the conclusion of the trial court, that the plaintiff Butler was not connected with the fraud practiced by Maynard in such a way that he is barred by unclean hands from coming into a court of equity to seek relief. Under the facts of the present case, however, it is unnecessary for us to consider this contention because, assuming that the plaintiff Butler was not barred by his conduct from coming into a court of equity, it is clear that the general doctrine cited furnishes no basis for the recovery sought in the present case.

[1, 2] The general rule relied upon is one of universal application where the purchaser of land under an executory contract has entered into possession of the land according to the terms of the agreement. During the life of such a contract, a purchaser in possession of the land is estopped to deny the validity of his vendor's title for the purpose of defeating the agreement. 25 Cal.Jur. 688; 27 R.C.L. 543 et seq.; Sheehan v. McKinstry, 105 Or. 473, 210 P. 167, 34 A.L.R. 1321, 1324; Page v. Bradford-Kennedy Co., 19 Idaho 685, 115 P. 694, Ann.Cas.1912C, 402. The purchaser, for example, cannot remain in possession of the land under the contract and successfully resist either the vendor's action for the purchase price or an action to recover possession of the land upon the ground that the vendor's title is defective. Coates v. Cleaves, 92 Cal. 427, 28 P. 580; Garvey v. Lashells, supra; Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 103, 103 P. 329; Keele v. Clouser, 92 Cal.App. 526, 268 P. 682; Burnett v. Caldwell, 9 Wall. 290, 293, 19 L.Ed. 712; Ann.Cas.1912C, 404–406. The reason which supports the rule was stated in Garvey v. Lashells, supra, 151 Cal. page 531, 91 P. page 500: "A purchaser cannot retain possession of property delivered to him under a contract of sale without complying with the terms of the contract as to payment, for the reason that the title of his vendor is not satisfactory. If a perfect title was to be conveyed, and the vendor is unable to give such a title, the vendee has appropriate remedies, but he cannot keep both the property and the purchase money."

[3] A specific application of this general doctrine is found where the purchaser in possession of land under an executory contract, after discovering that the title of his vendor is defective because of an outstanding claim in the hands of a third party, attempts to deny the vendor's title following an acquisition of the outstanding interest. Under such circumstances the courts have refused to permit the outstanding title thus acquired by the contract purchaser to be used for the purpose of defeating his obligations under the contract, so long as the possession originally obtained in accordance with the contract continues. Garvey v. Lashells, supra, 151 Cal. page 533, 91 P. 498; Galloway v. Finley, 12

Pet. 264, 295, 9 L.Ed. 1079; Mizamore v. Berglin, 197 Ala. 111, 72 So. 347, L.R.A. 1916F, 1024; Latin-American Bank v. Rogers, 87 Fla. 147, 99 So. 546; Frink v. Thomas, 20 Or. 265, 25 P. 717, 12 L.R.A. 239; First Nat. Bank v. Mapson, 181 Wash. 196, 42 P.2d 782; 40 A.L.R. 1078 et seq.; 25 Cal.Jur. 689; 27 R.C.L. 547; 1 Warvelle, Vendors, 2d Ed., p. 232, sec. 186; Maupin, Marketable Title, 3d Ed., p. 549, et seq.

The court in Slocum v. Peterson, 131 Wash. 61, 70, 229 P. 20, 23, 40 A.L.R. 1071, accurately summarized this application of the doctrine: "A critical examination * * * will show, we think conclusively, that this view of the law has no application, except where the purchaser has gone into possession of the land under the sale contract. A purchaser so in possession cannot assert a title acquired by him, adverse to his vendor, while he remains in possession under the sale contract, because his remaining in possession under the sale contract is wholly at variance with the rescission of or the nonexistence of such contract, and the purchaser will, while in such possession, no more be permitted to so challenge or impair the title of his vendor with a view of defeating the vendor's title than a tenant in possession will be permitted to challenge or impair the title of his landlord." (Italics ours.) The whole purpose behind the rule is the protection of the contract obligation existing between the vendor and vendee, as is further illustrated by the fact that once the contract is executed the rule no longer applies. Cassin v. Nicholson, 154 Cal. 497, 507, 98 P. 190; City and County of San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 465, 476, 79 Am.Dec. 187.

[4, 5] This doctrine of equitable estoppel cannot be applied against the defendant under the facts of the present case in favor of plaintiff Butler. No contractual obligation for the purchase of the property exists, or ever has existed, between the plaintiff Butler and the defendant. Obviously, therefore, the defendant did not go into possession of the land under the provisions of any contract with plaintiff Butler and his continued possession of the land is not dependent upon the performance of any contractual obligations due from defendant to plaintiff Butler. Defendant, therefore, cannot use the outstanding title acquired by him for the purpose of defeating any contract obligations between himself and Butler. That being so, the whole basis for the application of the doctrine which is set forth in the cases cited is absent in this case. Indeed, rather than compelling the defendant to recognize the title of plaintiff Butler, the doctrine relied upon would not, in fact, permit defendant to do so. The contract under which defendant actually acquired possession of the land names the plaintiff Maynard and his wife as vendors. Under his contract, therefore, defendant was required to recognize the title of Maynard, according to the doctrine discussed above. In view of the deed from Butler to Maynard which defendant had seen in Maynard's possession Butler might have been merely a third party making a claim adverse to that of his vendor. This is particularly so since possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence that the deed was properly delivered to him. Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 409, 221 P. 191; Ward v. Dougherty, 75 Cal. 240, 242, 17 P. 193, 7 Am.St.Rep. 151.

[6, 7] In addition to the considerations already mentioned, the inequitable nature of the relief sought by the plaintiff Butler is demonstrated further by the following fundamental principle of equity. Civil Code, section 3543 provides: "Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer." Where, as here, the true owner permits another to appear as the owner of the property or as having full power of disposition over it, it is established that an innocent third party who is thus led into dealing with the apparent owner will be protected by a court of equity against the claims of the true owner whose conduct made the fraud possible. Conklin v. Benson, 159 Cal. 785, 793, 116 P. 34, 36 L.R.A.,N.S., 537; Jeannerette v. Taylor, 2 Cal.App.2d 568, 38 P.2d 831; cf. Trout v. Taylor, 220 Cal. 652, 32 P.2d 968; 10 Cal.Jur. 506, et seq. In the present case not only did Butler permit Maynard to remain in possession of a deed apparently conveying title to the latter, but for a considerable time, so far as appears, he made no objection to the continued possession of the property by defendant under his contract with Maynard.

The judgment is affirmed.

CURTIS, EDMONDS, HOUSER, and TRAYNOR, JJ., concurred.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent. Briefly stated, there is presented in this case the following situation, plaintiff Butler granted an option to plaintiff Maynard to purchase certain mining property, in which the latter was given the right of possession. Plaintiff Maynard then agreed to sell the property to defendant, and in a transaction with which plaintiff Butler has no connection, falsely represents that he (Maynard) was the owner of the property; defendant is given the right to possession and does go into possession under the agreement with Maynard. Thereafter, and before defendant has paid the purchase price of the property, the condition precedent to his right to a conveyance thereof from Maynard, he discovers that plaintiff Butler, not Maynard, is the true owner of the property and that Frank Butler owns an outstanding one-eighth interest therein. In spite of that knowledge he makes no attempt to rescind the contract or give up possession of the property. On the contrary, he maintains that his contract with Maynard is still in full force and effect, and that he is entitled to remain in possession of the property and extract the minerals therefrom. He continues to hold under plaintiff Butler's title because obviously he has no other basis for a claim to any right or interest in the property. Under these circumstances, that is, knowing that plaintiff Butler is the owner of the property, and that any right he asserts therein must be by virtue of and pursuant to Butler's title, he acquires the outstanding one-eighth interest owned by Frank Butler. These facts certainly justify the application of the rule that defendant is estopped to deny plaintiff Butler's title and that any outstanding interest he acquires while holding possession under that title inures to the benefit of plaintiff Butler. Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, 91 P. 498. The reason for that rule is that a vendee of real property shall not be permitted to have the benefits arising from the possession of the real property which are enjoyed by reason of the rights acquired under another's title, and at the same time refuse to pay the purchase price and take a position adverse to the holder of the title by acquiring an outstanding interest in the property adverse to him. The vendee is not entitled to a clear title to the property until he has paid the full purchase price thereof and in the interim may not object to a defect in the vendor's title. The situation is not altered by the fact that his contract of purchase was with Maynard rather than Butler. He continued to enjoy and insist on his right to possession after he knew Butler, not Maynard, was the owner of the property. That enjoyment or advantage was therefore necessarily predicated upon Butler's title; it could not be derived from any other source. His conduct constituted a recognition in effect of Butler as the true owner and vendor of the property. The situation is no different in reality than if Maynard had assigned his option from plaintiff Butler to defendant, rather than having made a separate contract with him.

The majority opinion states that the equities are in favor of the defendant; that when one of two innocent persons must suffer (Butler and defendant) by reason of another's conduct, the one who put the third person in a position to cause the injury must bear the burden. But here, as far as appears, defendant has not been and will not be injured nor will he suffer in any manner. It does not appear that any royalties have been paid, thus defendant has paid nothing on the purchase price except the original down payment. In return for that he has had possession of the property for several years. It may be true that he and his associates have expended a considerable sum in mining activities on the property, but whether those expenditures improved or made the property more valuable is not shown. He is in no worse or different position than he would have been if Maynard rather than Butler held title to the property. He still has his rights under his contract with Maynard and may proceed to cause those rights to mature into the right to receive a conveyance of the property. If he can prove that he has suffered any damages by reason of Maynard's false representation as to ownership, he may recover the same from Maynard or have the amount of such damage credited against the purchase price payable to Maynard. He is not injured by being estopped to question Butler's title, inasmuch as he is entitled to receive from Butler as a condition upon which Butler's recovery of the one-eighth interest is predicated, the $100 he paid for that one-eighth plus interest thereon.

In my opinion, the majority opinion is based upon a very tenuous and highly technical ground, and overlooks the basic equitable principle involved in the case. To my mind, it is obvious that plaintiff Butler is the only one who can be injured in this case. As he has not been guilty of any fraud or come into court with unclean hands, he should be entitled to invoke the rule contended for by him, and the judgment should be reversed.

Ex parte BELL et al.

Cr. 4298.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 13, 1942.

Rehearing Denied March 12, 1942.

1. Habeas corpus ⇐32

In California, only a writ of habeas corpus enables a higher court to decide the question of the constitutionality of an ordinance in cases which arise in a justice's or municipal court and can be appealed only to the superior court. Const. art. 6, § 5.

2. Habeas corpus ⇐4

In California, the requirement that all available remedies by appeal be exhausted before habeas corpus can be invoked to test the constitutionality of an enactment is not "mandatory".

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Mandatory".

3. Habeas corpus ⇐4

A court may in its discretion refuse to grant a writ of habeas corpus to test constitutionality if the remedy by appeal is not exhausted, since granting of writ results in release of the petitioner, whereas reversal on appeal might result merely in a new trial with the exclusion of those charges found based on unconstitutional enactments or the inclusion of that procedure found constitutionally guaranteed.

4. Habeas corpus ⇐32

Where petitioners seeking by habeas corpus to assert the invalidity of a county ordinance as a whole had exhausted their remedy by appeal from justice court judgment, habeas corpus was not merely the proper remedy, but the only one that would enable the Supreme Court to decide on the constitutionality of the ordinance. Const. art. 6, § 5.

5. Habeas corpus ⇐92(1)

On petition for a writ of habeas corpus to test the validity of a county ordinance prohibiting picketing of an employer's premises for purpose of inducing an employee or person seeking employment to quit employment or refrain from seeking employment by means of compulsion, coercion, etc., the ordinance was required to be judged on its face to determine whether it unconstitutionally prohibited acts falling within the category of peaceful picketing.

6. Counties ⇐55

In determining whether a county ordinance unconstitutionally prohibited acts falling within the category of peaceful picketing, it was not the function of the Supreme Court to determine whether the restrictions imposed could be validly applied to the facts of a particular case.

7. Criminal law ⇐13

Language in a statute prohibiting conduct that may be prohibited and conduct that may not be prohibited affords no reasonably ascertainable standard of guilt and is therefore too uncertain and vague to be enforced, and a conviction based on such a statute cannot stand, even though the acts of misconduct in the particular case could be validly prohibited by properly drafted legislation.

8. Constitutional law ⇐274
Counties ⇐55

The section of a county ordinance making it unlawful for any person to loiter, stand or sit on any public highway, alley, sidewalk or crosswalk so as to hinder or obstruct free passage of persons or vehicles encompasses conduct well within bounds of "peaceful picketing" sanctioned by the guaranties of "due process of law" and entire section of ordinance so providing is invalid, even though county might validly prohibit excessive and unnecessary obstruction of streets and highways. Const.Cal. art. 1, §§ 9, 10; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Due Process of Law" and "Peaceful Picketing".

9. Constitutional law ⇐274

"Peaceful picketing" sanctioned by the guaranties of "due process of law" involves besetting the premises of another in the course of a labor dispute for the purpose of inducing employees to quit their employment or dissuading others from seeking employment, and fact that to some extent compulsion, coercion, intimidation, or threats are employed does not detract from its peaceful nature so long as those means constitute only economic, moral, or social pressure and not the pressure of violence. Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 9, 10; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

10. Constitutional law ⇐274

Whether picketing in the course of a labor dispute is peaceful picketing sanctioned by the guaranties of due process of law is determined not by the existence of a threat, but by what is actually threatened. Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 9, 10; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

11. Constitutional law ⇐274

The provisions of a county ordinance prohibiting picketing of an employer's premises for the purpose of inducing an employee or person seeking employment to quit employment or refrain from seeking employment by means of compulsion, coercion, intimidation, or threats are invalid as making conduct generally recognized as "peaceful picketing" unlawful. Const.Cal. art. 1, §§ 9, 10; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

12. Counties ⇐55

The provisions in a particular section of a county ordinance prohibiting picketing by acts of violence are valid, notwithstanding invalidity of other separate provisions of that section making conduct generally recognized as peaceful picketing unlawful, particularly in view of provision of ordinance that if any provision is held unconstitutional the decision should not affect the validity of the remaining portions of the ordinance. Const.Cal. art. 1, §§ 9, 10; U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

13. Statutes ⇐64(1)

Where part of a statute is declared unconstitutional, the remainder will stand if it is complete in itself and would have been adopted had the legislative body foreseen the partial invalidation of the statute.

14. Counties ⇐21½

The provisions of a county ordinance prohibiting use of violence for purpose of preventing employees or patrons from entering premises being picketed in connection with a labor dispute do not conflict with general state laws relating to assault, battery, riot, disturbing the peace, and unlawful assemblage, within rule that an ordinance making illegal the same acts made illegal by general state laws is invalid, since picketing by acts of violence is an offense distinct from those offenses even though it may sometimes involve them. Const. art. 11, § 11.

15. Habeas corpus ⇐32

Where a petitioner has been convicted of violating a statute which is entirely unconstitutional, the court will ordinarily issue a writ of habeas corpus releasing him from custody.

16. Habeas corpus ⇐32

A complaint charging petitioners with picketing by acts of violence in violation of valid provision of county ordinance charged a "public offense", and where punishment imposed on them was not excessive for violation of that provision of ordinance, which also contained invalid provisions, petitioners could be released by habeas corpus only if it was clear that they were not convicted of violating the valid provision.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Public Offense".

17. Habeas corpus ⇐1
Judgment ⇐495(1)

A habeas corpus proceeding is in the nature of a "collateral attack", and a judgment which is collaterally attacked carries with it a presumption of regularity.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Collateral Attack".

18. Judgment ⇐496

The presumption of regularity attaching to a judgment collaterally attacked applies to proceedings of a justice's court only if the judgment affirmatively shows that the court had jurisdiction over the person and subject matter.

19. Habeas corpus ⇐85(1)

In habeas corpus proceeding collaterally attacking a justice court judgment finding petitioners guilty of violating any one "and/or" any other provision of two sections of county ordinance on ground of unconstitutionality of ordinance, presumption of regularity of judgment was not conclusive, but placed on petitioners burden of proving that their convictions were based not on the constitutional but on the unconstitutional provisions of the ordinance.

20. Habeas corpus ⇐92(1)

A petitioner seeking habeas corpus is not confined to the face of the record in attempting to sustain his burden of proving that his conviction was in violation of his constitutional rights, but the remedy permits an examination of the actual evidence introduced at petitioner's trial and also of any necessary additional evidence bearing on the infringement of petitioner's constitutional rights. Pen.Code, § 1484.

21. Habeas corpus ⇐92(1)

On petition for writ of habeas corpus on ground that conviction was in violation of petitioner's constitutional rights, evidence introduced at the trial and any necessary additional evidence bearing on infringement of those rights will be examined, not to pass on sufficiency of evidence to support the verdict, but to determine what the verdict actually was, so that the court may decide whether it violates constitutional guaranties, and such an examination will be made whenever a petitioner has been deprived of due process of law, whatever form that deprivation has taken. Pen.Code, § 1484.

22. Habeas corpus ⇐92(1)

In a habeas corpus proceeding, the court must look beyond the face of the record at the actual evidence when necessary to determine whether a petitioner has been deprived of constitutional rights, but if the statute under which he was convicted is entirely unconstitutional, the court will discharge him on habeas corpus without examining the evidence, and if the statute is entirely constitutional, the conviction will be upheld without examination of the evidence. Pen. Code, § 1484.

23. Habeas corpus ⇐92(1)

Where the statute under which a petitioner seeking a writ of habeas corpus was convicted is in part unconstitutional, and it cannot be determined from charge and conviction whether petitioner was tried and convicted for violating the valid part, the court must examine the evidence, not to test whether it is sufficient to support a verdict, but to determine whether petitioner was tried and convicted for violating the invalid part alone, in which event the conviction must fall, or whether he was tried and convicted for violating the valid part as well, in which event the conviction must stand. Pen. Code, § 1484.

24. Counties ⇐21½

The forcible stopping of automobiles and intimidating occupants by gathering in large numbers exceeds the bounds of "peaceful picketing" and constitutes forcible "intimidation" and "violence" within county ordinance prohibiting picketing by acts of violence.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Intimidation" and "Violence".

25. Habeas corpus ⇐32

In habeas corpus proceeding challenging validity of county ordinance containing invalid provisions making conduct generally recognized as peaceful picketing unlawful and valid provisions prohibiting picketing by acts of violence, petitioners who were found guilty of violating any one "and/or" any other provision of ordinance failed to introduce evidence sufficient to sustain their burden of proving that they were not convicted of the valid provisions of ordinance prohibiting acts of violence, and hence writ issued would be discharged and petitioners would be remanded to custody. Pen.Code, § 1484.

CARTER, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding in the matter of the petition of Rufus Bell and others for a writ of habeas corpus to secure release from custody.

Writ discharged and petitioners remanded to custody.

Rehearing denied; CARTER, J., dissenting.

Andersen & Resner, George R. Andersen, and Herbert Resner, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Joseph L. Heenan, Dist. Atty., and Erling S. Norby, both of Marysville, for respondent.

TRAYNOR, Justice.

Petitioners, members of a labor union, while engaged in picketing certain ranches and orchards, were arrested and charged with violating sections 2 and 3 of an anti-picketing ordinance adopted by the Board of Supervisors of Yuba County in 1937. These sections read as follows: "Section 2. It is unlawful for any person to loiter, stand, or sit upon any public highway, alley, sidewalk or crosswalk so as to in any manner hinder or obstruct the free passage therein or thereon of persons or vehicles passing or attempting to pass along the same, or so as to in any manner annoy or molest persons passing along the same."

"Section 3. It is unlawful for any persons to beset or picket the premises of another, or any approach thereto, where any person is employed or seeks employment, or any place or approach thereto where such employee or person seeking employment lodges or resides, for the purpose of inducing such employee or person seeking employment, by means of compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear to quit his or her employment or to refrain from seeking or freely entering into employment."

The complaint did not specify the acts of misconduct on the part of petitioners but followed the language of the ordinance. It charged petitioners in count 1 with violating any one "and/or" any other provision of section 2, and in count 2, with violating any one "and/or" any other provision of section 3. They were tried in the Justice's Court of Marysville Township, County of Yuba, found guilty "as charged in the complaint," and sentenced "on said conviction" to a fine of $500 or 6 months in jail. On appeal the superior court, the court of last resort in cases arising in a municipal or justice's court, Cal.Const., art. VI, § 5, upheld the constitutionality of the ordinance and affirmed the conviction, but reduced the jail sentence to 3 months. Petitioners thereafter applied to the superior court for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the ordinance was unconstitutional. When that court denied the writ, petitioners renewed their application in the District Court of Appeal, but the latter court also denied the writ and upheld the ordinance as constitutional. 37 Cal. App.2d 582, 100 P.2d 339. Petitioners now ask this court for a writ of habeas corpus, contending that the ordinance prohibits peaceful picketing and therefore abridges freedom of speech, press and assemblage in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and article I, sections 9 and 10 of the Constitution of California.

A preliminary question is whether the constitutionality of an ordinance may be tested by application for a writ of habeas corpus. Most jurisdictions permit such a use of habeas corpus. See cases collected in 25 Am.Jur. 164, § 29; 13 Cal.Jur. 225, § 8; 39 L.R.A. 450; 32 A.L.R. 1054. They adhere to the theory, however, that habeas corpus can lie, not to substitute for a writ of error, but only to test the jurisdiction of the trial court or to secure the release of persons detained without judicial authorization or under a void proceeding. See 25 Am.Jur. 151, § 13; 13 Cal.Jur. 217, § 4; Ex parte Nielsen, 131 U.S. 176, 9 S. Ct. 672, 33 L.Ed. 118; Harlan v. McGourin, 218 U.S. 442, 31 S.Ct. 44, 54 L.Ed. 1101, 21 Ann.Cas. 849; Ex parte Moran, 8 Cir., 144 F. 594, 75 C.C.A. 396; 1 Bailey, Habeas Corpus [1913], § 2, 30 et seq.; 12 N.Y.L.Q.R. 525. The theory and the practice are somewhat inconsistent. In order to reconcile them the courts have resorted to the artificial reasoning of Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 25 L.Ed. 717, that an unconstitutional statute is actually not a statute, and that a trial court therefore has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of proceedings based upon such a statute. The unconstitutionality of a statute, however, is not a foregone conclusion but the very question at issue and it has traditionally been one that trial courts have jurisdiction to decide. See 39 L.R.A. 454. State courts constantly make decisions regarding the validity of statutes under the Constitution of the United States, and the United States Supreme Court, which reviews their determinations by writ of error, has expressly stated that they have jurisdiction in such cases. See Robb v. Connolly, 111 U.S. 624, 4 S.Ct. 544, 28 L. Ed. 542. If they lacked it the United States Supreme Court would be compelled to reverse the decision of a state court because of lack of jurisdiction without further inquiry into the merits of the case. See Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 4 S.Ct. 510, 28 L.Ed. 462. It has never been held that a decision holding a statute invalid is void because the statute itself was void. "Therefore, unless we adopt the peculiar theory that the court has jurisdiction to decide right, but none to decide wrong, we are driven to the conclusion that a decision is not void for lack of jurisdiction merely because it decides that an unconstitutional statute is valid." 39 L.R.A. 454; see McGovney, Cases on Constitutional Law, 1st Ed., pp. 198–200.

[1] A minority of courts, realizing the inconsistency between the practice of using habeas corpus to test constitutionality and the theory that it lies only to test jurisdiction, will not permit the question of constitutionality to be raised by habeas corpus. See cases cited in 25 Am.Jur.; 39 L.R.A.; 32 A.L.R., all supra. There is, however, a less drastic solution. The courts can permit an independent review by habeas corpus of matters over which the trial court had jurisdiction, apart from any remedy by appeal, because it is warranted by the importance of securing a correct determination on the question of constitutionality. "It must never be forgotten that the writ of habeas corpus is the precious safeguard of personal liberty and there is no higher duty than to maintain it unimpaired. * * * the rule is not so inflexible that it may not yield to exceptional circumstances where the need for the remedy afforded by the writ of habeas corpus is apparent." Chief Justice Hughes in Bowen v. Johnston, 306 U.S. 19, 26, 27, 59 S.Ct. 442, 446, 83 L.Ed. 455. There are instances where habeas corpus affords the only method of testing constitutionality as when a statute upheld as valid at the time of conviction is subsequently declared invalid in another case and in the interim the petitioner either exhausts his remedy by appeal or the time for taking an appeal expires. Ex parte Lockhart, 25 Okl.Cr. 429, 221 P. 119; In re Jarvis, 66 Kan. 329, 71 P. 576. In California only a writ of habeas corpus enables a higher court to decide the question of constitutionality in cases which, like the present one, arise in a justice's or municipal court and can be appealed only to the superior court. See Ex parte Siebold, supra, involving a similar situation.

Habeas corpus is also widely used to test the constitutionality not only of a statute but of the procedure in petitioner's trial, even though the trial court has jurisdiction to try the petitioner (see Ex parte Nielsen, supra; 35 Columb. L. Rev. 404 at 412), and any infringement of constitutional right during the trial may be raised on appeal. The federal courts have repeatedly held that habeas corpus lies if the accused has been deprived of such fundamental constitutional guarantees as the right to counsel (Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 58 S.Ct. 1019, 82 L.Ed. 1461; see Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 53 S. Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158, 84 A.L.R. 527), the right to a fair trial free from mob violence (Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86, 43 S.Ct. 265, 67 L.Ed. 543) or free from the use of testimony known to the prosecution to be perjured. Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 105, 55 S.Ct. 340, 79 L.Ed. 791, 98 A.L.R. 406. See, also, Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 47 S.Ct. 437, 71 L.Ed. 749, 50 A.L.R. 1243, insuring the right to an impartial judge. The federal courts regard these rights as so fundamental as to admit an additional special procedure to insure their protection once the remedy in the state courts is exhausted (Mooney v. Holohan, supra), or is no longer available. Johnson v. Zerbt, 304 U.S. 458, 58 S.Ct. 1019, 82 L. Ed. 1461.

There are other situations in which habeas corpus is used, not as a test of jurisdiction, but to review a question of law that cannot otherwise be raised or is so important as to render the ordinary procedure inadequate. Thus, it lies to test whether there is probable cause to justify the committing magistrate in holding petitioner for trial. Pen.Code § 1487; Ex parte Williams, 52 Cal.App. 566, 199 P. 347; Application of Hartwell, 28 Cal.App. 627, 153 P. 730; see, also, cases cited in 13 Cal.Jur. 230, § 12; 25 Am.Jur. 170, § 37. There is no other method of securing a review of the magistrate's determination in this regard. People v. Creeks, 170 Cal. 368, 149 P. 821; Ex parte Williams, supra. It also lies to test whether the complaint charges a public offense (Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 P. 706; Ex parte McNulty, 77 Cal. 164, 19 P. 237, 11 Am.St.Rep. 257; People ex rel. Perkins v. Moss, 187 N.Y. 410, 80 N.E. 383, 11 L.R.A.,N.S., 528, 10 Ann.Cas. 309; see, also, 13 Cal.Jur. 232, § 14; 25 Am.Jur. 174, § 42; and 35 Columb. L. Rev. 850 at 862) even though this question falls within the jurisdiction of the trial court and may be raised on appeal. Certain courts go so far as to permit the use of habeas corpus before trial when the statute of limitations has run upon the offense charged. United States v. Mathues, D.C., 27 F.2d 137; see Ex parte Vice, 5 Cal. App. 153, 89 P. 983; People v. McGee, 1 Cal.2d 611, 36 P.2d 378; People v. Hoffman, 132 Cal.App. 60, 22 P.2d 229; see 35 Columb.L.Rev. 407.

[2, 3] While a few courts require that all available remedies by appeal be exhausted before habeas corpus can be invoked to test constitutionality (see Goto v. Lane, 265 U.S. 393, 44 S.Ct. 525, 68 L. Ed. 1070), most jurisdictions, including California, do not make the requirement mandatory (see cases collected in 13 Cal.

Jur. 225, § 8; 25 Am.Jur. 164, § 29), and even permit the issue of constitutionality to be raised by habeas corpus before trial. Ibid, Matter of Zany, 20 Cal.App. 360, 129 P. 295; Ex parte Royall, 117 U.S. 241, 6 S.Ct. 734, 29 L.Ed. 868; contra, Glasgow v. Moyer, 225 U.S. 420, 32 S.Ct. 753, 56 L.Ed. 1147; Johnson v. Hoy, 227 U.S. 245, 33 S.Ct. 240, 57 L.Ed. 497. Since the granting of a writ of habeas corpus, however, results in the release of the petitioner, while reversal on appeal may result merely in a new trial with the exclusion of those charges found based on unconstitutional enactments or the inclusion of that procedure found constitutionally guaranteed, the court may in its discretion refuse to grant the writ if the remedy by appeal is not exhausted. This rule, adopted by the federal courts (In re Lancaster, 137 U.S. 393, 11 S.Ct. 117, 34 L.Ed. 713; In re Chapman, 156 U.S. 211, 15 S.Ct. 331, 39 L.Ed. 401; Riggins v. United States, 199 U.S. 547, 26 S.Ct. 147, 50 L.Ed. 303; United States v. Sing Tuck, 194 U.S. 161, 24 S.Ct. 621, 48 L.Ed. 917; Henry v. Henkel, 235 U.S. 219, 35 S.Ct. 54, 59 L.Ed. 203; see 35 Columb.L.Rev. 404 at 412, 414), should also be followed by the courts of this state.

[4] In the present case petitioners, having exhausted their remedy by appeal, seek by habeas corpus to assert the invalidity of the ordinance as a whole. Habeas corpus is not merely the proper remedy under such circumstances but the only one that will enable this court to decide upon the constitutionality of the ordinance.

[5-7] The ordinance must be judged on its face to determine whether it unconstitutionally prohibits acts that fall within the category of peaceful picketing. Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 60 S.Ct. 736, 84 L.Ed. 1093; Carlson v. California, 310 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 746, 84 L.Ed. 1104; Hague v. C. I. O., 307 U.S. 496, 518, 59 S.Ct. 954, 83 L.Ed. 1423; Schneider v. State of New Jersey, 308 U.S. 147, 162-165, 60 S.Ct. 146, 84 L.Ed. 155; Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 451, 58 S.Ct. 666, 82 L. Ed. 949; Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 369, 370, 51 S.Ct. 532, 75 L.Ed. 1117, 73 A.L.R. 1484. See Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 51 S.Ct. 625, 75 L.Ed. 1357; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220. If certain of its provisions operate to prohibit peaceful picketing, they are invalid even though they also prohibit acts that may properly be made illegal. A penal statute that "does not aim specifically at evils within the allowable area of State control but, on the contrary, sweeps within its ambit other activities that in ordinary circumstances constitute an exercise of freedom of speech or of the press * * * lends itself to harsh and discriminatory enforcement by local prosecuting officials, against particular groups deemed to merit their displeasure" and "results in a continuous and pervasive restraint on all freedom of discussion that might reasonably be regarded as within its purview." Thornhill v. Alabama, supra, 310 U.S. at page 97, 60 S.Ct. at page 742, 84 L.Ed. 1093. It is not the function of the court to determine whether the restrictions imposed by the legislation can be validly applied to the facts of a particular case. "Proof of an abuse of power in the particular case has never been deemed a requisite for attack on the constitutionality of a statute purporting to license the dissemination of ideas." Thornhill v. Alabama, supra, 310 U.S. at page 97, 60 S.Ct. at page 741, 84 L.Ed. 1093; Hague v. C. I. O., supra; Lovell v. Griffin, supra; Schneider v. State of New Jersey, supra. Language prohibiting conduct that may be prohibited and conduct that may not affords no reasonably ascertainable standard of guilt and is therefore too uncertain and vague to be enforced. Stromberg v. California, supra, 283 U.S. 369, 370, 51 S.Ct. 532, 75 L.Ed. 1117, 73 A.L.R. 1484; Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242, 261-263, 57 S. Ct. 732, 81 L.Ed. 1066; Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 59 S.Ct. 618, 83 L.Ed. 888; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 57 S.Ct. 255, 81 L.Ed. 278; Hague v. C. I. O., supra; Schneider v. State, supra; In re Harder, 9 Cal.App.2d 153, 155, 49 P.2d 304; Territory of Hawaii v. Anduha, 9 Cir., 48 F.2d 171. A conviction based upon such a statute cannot stand even though the acts of misconduct in the particular case could be validly prohibited by properly drafted legislation. Thornhill v. Alabama, supra; Carlson v. California, supra.

[8] Section 2 of the present ordinance makes it a crime "for any person to loiter, stand, or sit upon any public highway, alley, sidewalk or crosswalk so as to in any manner hinder or obstruct the free passage * * * of persons or vehicles * * *". This language encompasses conduct that is well within the bounds of peaceful picketing sanctioned by the guarantees of due process of law. Thus a picket may be peaceful even though he loiters, stands, or sits upon a public highway, alley, sidewalk, or crosswalk, and thereby constitutes to some extent an obstruction to the free passage of persons and vehicles or an annoyance to persons who do not approve of his presence. See Thornhill v. Alabama, supra; Carlson v. California, supra; In re Harder, supra; Territory of Hawaii v. Anduha, supra; In re Williams, 158 Cal. 550, 111 P. 1035. The sweeping prohibition of section 2 would apply equally against peaceful pickets, shoppers engrossed in a window display, invalids in wheelchairs, acquaintances who stand engaged in conversation. The entire section is therefore invalid even though Yuba County might validly prohibit excessive and unnecessary obstruction of the streets and highways.

[9-11] Section 3 of the ordinance likewise makes conduct generally recognized as peaceful picketing unlawful. Peaceful picketing in the course of a labor dispute involves besetting the premises of another for the purpose of inducing employees to quit their employment or dissuading others from seeking employment. The fact that to some extent compulsion, coercion, intimidation, or threats are employed does not detract from its peaceful nature so long as they constitute only economic, moral, or social pressure and not the pressure of violence. See McKay v. Retail Automobile Salesmen's Local Union No. 1067, 16 Cal.2d 311, 106 P.2d 373; Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 P. 1027, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 550, 16 Ann.Cas. 1165; Lisse v. Local Union No. 31, 2 Cal.2d 312, 41 P.2d 314; Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 P. 324. The character of the picketing is determined not by the existence of a threat but by what is actually threatened. See dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes in Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L.R.A. 722, 57 Am.St.Rep. 443. A picket may point to the possibility of ousting from the union any employee crossing the picket line and thereby compel or coerce him to quit his employment. The provisions of section 3 prohibiting such conduct are invalid.

[12, 13] That part of section 3, however, prohibiting picketing by acts of violence is valid, for there is no constitutional sanction for violence in labor disputes. When part of a statute is declared unconstitutional, the remainder will stand if it is complete in itself and would have been adopted by the legislative body had the latter foreseen the partial invalidation of the statute. Ex parte Frazer, 54 Cal. 94; 5 Cal.Jur. 644; Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 8th Ed., vol. 1, p. 360. Not only is the valid part of the present ordinance complete in itself, but the ordinance provides: "If any section, subsection, sentence, clause or phrase of this ordinance is for any reason held to be unconstitutional or invalid, such decision shall not affect the validity or constitutionality of the remaining portions of this ordinance." See Bacon Service Corp. v. Huss, 199 Cal. 21, 248 P. 235.

[14] The provisions of section 3 prohibiting picketing by acts of violence do not conflict with the general laws of the state relating to assault, battery, riot, disturbing the peace, and unlawful assemblage. An ordinance is invalid if it makes illegal the same acts that are made illegal by the general laws of the state. Cal. Const., art. XI, § 11; In re Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 P. 405; In re Mingo, 190 Cal. 769, 214 P. 850; In re Murphy, 190 Cal. 286, 212 P. 30; Ex parte Stephen, 114 Cal. 278, 46 P. 86; Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A.L.R. 1172. Picketing by acts of violence, however, is an offense distinct from assault, battery, riot, disturbing the peace, or unlawful assemblage, even though it may sometimes involve these acts. The nature of a crime involving violence varies with the purpose for which the violence is employed. This ordinance prohibits the use of violence for the purpose of preventing employees or patrons from entering premises being picketed in connection with a labor dispute. It therefore defines an offense different from general acts of violence unconnected with a labor controversy.

[15, 16] When a petitioner has been convicted of violating a statute that is entirely unconstitutional, the court will ordinarily issue a writ of habeas corpus releasing him from custody. The present ordinance, however, contains a valid provision prohibiting acts of violence. The complaint charges petitioners with picketing by acts of violence and therefore charges a public offense for such acts are not consistent with lawful action. See cases cited in 13 Cal.Jur., pp. 235, 236, note 7; cf. Ex parte Peterson, 119 Cal. 578, 51 P. 859; Ex parte McLaughlin, 16 Cal. App. 270, 116 P. 684; In re Hernandez, 64 Cal.App. 71, 220 P. 423; Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 96 P. 804; In re Ah Sing, 156 Cal. 349, 104 P. 448. Since the punishment imposed on petitioners is not excessive for violation of the valid provision of the ordinance, they can be released by habeas corpus only if it is clear that they were not convicted of violating that provision. Ex parte Morrison, 88 Cal. 112, 25 P. 1064.

The uncertainty surrounding their conviction arises from the ambiguity of the complaint, which charged them with violating any one "and/or" any other provision of the ordinance, count 1 referring to section 2 and count 2 referring to section 3. Petitioners were in effect charged with violating all the provisions of each section of the ordinance or any one provision of each section. They were found guilty "as charged" and sentenced "on said conviction." It cannot therefore be determined from the face of the record whether or not they were found guilty of violating the one valid provision of section 3.

The expression "and/or", which made possible a conviction couched in such general terms, has met with widespread condemnation. Cochrane v. Florida East Coast R. Co., 107 Fla. 431, 145 So. 217; Preble v. Architectural Iron Workers' Union, 260 Ill.App. 435; Tarjan v. National Surety Co., 268 Ill.App. 232; State v. Dudley, 159 La. 872, 106 So. 364; Russell v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 332 Mo. 707, 59 S.W.2d 1061; State v. Douglas, 339 Mo. 187, 95 S.W.2d 1179; Drummond v. City of Columbus, 136 Neb. 87, 285 N.W. 109, 286 N.W. 779; Kornbrodt v. Equitable Trust Co., 137 Or. 386, 2 P.2d 236, 3 P.2d 127; Allen v. State, 138 Tex.Cr. 303, 136 S.W. 2d 232; Cobb v. State, 139 Tex.Cr. 337, 139 S.W.2d 272; Putnam v. Industrial Commission, 80 Utah 187, 14 P.2d 973; Employers' Mutual Liability Ins. Co. v. Tollefson, 219 Wis. 434, 263 N.W. 376; An And/Or Symposium, 18 A. B. A. Journal 574; 18 A. B. A. Journal 456, 524 (editorials); 42 West Va.L.Q. 235; H. H. Parsons, And/Or, 10 Cal.S.B.J. 89, cf. H. Mumper, Unfair Tirade Against the Symbol "And/Or", 10 Cal.S.B.J. 187. It is true that the expression has proved convenient in contracts and other instruments where, by its intentional equivocation, it can anticipate alternative possibilities without the cumbersome itemization of each one. 118 A.L.R. 1367; 43 Yale L. J. 918, 20 Marquette L.Rev. 101. It lends itself, however, as much to ambiguity as to brevity. Thus it cannot intelligibly be used to fix the occurrence of past events. A purported conclusion that either one or both of two events occurred is a mere restatement of the problem, not a decision as to which event actually occurred. If a person is accused of violating an unconstitutional as well as a constitutional provision of a statute and the verdict by the use of "and/or" declares him guilty of violating either one or both provisions, it is an open question whether he is guilty of any punishable offense. The verdict in effect states that the accused is guilty or innocent of violating the constitutional provision. A comparable lack of precision was censured by the United State Supreme Court in Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 368, 51 S.Ct. 532, 535, 75 L.Ed. 1117, 73 A.L.R. 1484: "The verdict against the appellant was a general one. It did not specify the ground upon which it rested. As there were three purposes set forth in the statute, and the jury was instructed that their verdict might be given with respect to any one of them, independently considered, it is impossible to say under which clause of the statute the conviction was obtained. If any one of these clauses, which the state court has held to be separable, was invalid, it cannot be determined upon this record that the appellant was not convicted under that clause. * * * It follows that instead of its being permissible to hold, with the state court, that the verdict could be sustained if any one of the clauses of the statute were found to be valid, the necessary conclusion from the manner in which the case was sent to the jury is that, if any of the clauses in question is invalid under the Federal Constitution, the conviction cannot be upheld."

[17-19] The ambiguity of the judgment in the present case would thus clearly warrant a reversal of the conviction on appeal or other direct attack. People v. Moss, 33 Cal.App.2d, Supp., 763, 767, 87 P.2d 932; People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 503, 508. A habeas corpus proceeding, however, is in the nature of a collateral attack, and a judgment that is collaterally attacked carries with it a presumption of regularity. Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 468, 58 S.Ct. 1019, 82 L.Ed. 1461; see 1 Freeman, Judgments, 5th Ed., 780 et seq.; 15 Cal. Jur. 64, et seq. This presumption of regularity applies to the proceedings of a justice's court only if the judgment affirmatively shows, as in the present case, that the court has jurisdiction over person and subject matter. Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466, 75 P. 55; Hayward v. Pimental, 107 Cal. 386, 40 P. 545; Rowley v. Howard, 23 Cal. 401, 404. See 15 Cal.Jur. 503; 6 Cal.Jur.Supp. 511. The presumption, however, is not conclusive in a habeas corpus proceeding but places upon petitioners the burden of proving that their convictions were based not upon the constitutional but upon the unconstitutional provisions of the ordinance. Johnson v. Zerbst, supra. Unless they can sustain this burden they must be considered as having been convicted of violating the valid provision relating to acts of violence, and the judgment must be upheld.

[20, 21] A petitioner seeking habeas corpus, however, is not confined to the face of the record in attempting to sustain the burden of proving that his conviction was in violation of his constitutional rights. The courts of both the United States and California have declared that the remedy of habeas corpus permits an examination not only of the actual evidence introduced at petitioner's trial but of any necessary additional evidence bearing upon the infringement of petitioner's constitutional rights. Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86, 43 S.Ct. 265, 67 L.Ed. 543; Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 55 S.Ct. 340, 79 L.Ed. 791, 98 A.L.R. 406; Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242, 57 S.Ct. 732, 81 L.Ed. 1066; Johnson v. Zerbst, supra; In re Connor, 15 Cal.2d 161, 99 P.2d 248; In re Connolly, 16 Cal.App.2d 709, 61 P.2d 490; In re Lake, 65 Cal.App. 420, 224 P. 126; In re Chaus, 92 Cal.App. 384, 268 P. 422; see, also, Fiske v. Kansas, 274 U.S. 380, 47 S.Ct. 655, 71 L.Ed. 1108; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 57 S.Ct. 255, 81 L.Ed. 278; Norris v. Alabama, 294 U.S. 587, 55 S.Ct. 579, 79 L.Ed. 1074; Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 53 S.Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158, 84 A.L.R. 527. This examination is made, not to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, but to determine what the verdict actually was, so that the court may decide whether it violates constitutional guaranties. Such an examination will be made in a habeas corpus proceeding whenever a petitioner has been deprived of due process of law, whatever form that deprivation has taken. If a court has no "jurisdiction" to enter a judgment against a defendant after depriving him of such constitutional guarantees as the right to counsel or to a fair trial free from mob domination, it has no "jurisdiction" to enter a judgment against him based upon an unconstitutional statute. An examination of the facts is permissible to determine whether a petitioner was denied due process of law with respect to the procedure at his trial; it is no less permissible to determine whether he was denied due process of law by being convicted of violating unconstitutional legislation.

In Herndon v. Lowry, supra, a defendant was convicted of the crime of attempting to incite an insurrection. On appeal from a denial of his petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the United States Supreme Court examined the evidence introduced at his trial, concluded that it revealed only conduct that was protected by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech, and held that his conviction under the statute was therefore a denial of due process of law requiring the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus.

In Johnson v. Zerbst, supra, a defendant petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that he had been deprived of his constitutional right to be represented by counsel at his trial. The court held that petitioner was entitled to a release on habeas corpus if an examination of the facts supported his allegation, stating, "a prisoner in custody pursuant to the final judgment of a state court of criminal jurisdiction may have a judicial inquiry in a court of the United States into the very truth and substance of the causes of his detention, although it may become necessary to look behind and beyond the record of his conviction. * * *" 304 U.S. at page 466, 58 S.Ct. at page 1024, 82 L.Ed. 1461.

In Moore v. Dempsey, supra, petitioners asked for release by habeas corpus on the grounds that they had been deprived of due process of law because of mob domination of their trial. The court held that the actual facts should be examined to determine the truth of the allegations. In Mooney v. Holohan, supra, the court stated that an examination must be made of facts outside the record to determine whether petitioner was deprived of due process of law at his trial.

The cases of Fiske v. Kansas, supra; De Jonge v. Oregon, supra; Norris v. Alabama, supra; and Powell v. Alabama, supra, all hold that an examination should be made of the evidence introduced in the trial court whenever it is essential to a proper determination of constitutional questions. While not involving writs of habeas corpus, these cases mark the extent of the protection afforded by constitutional guaranties and are therefore applicable to habeas corpus proceedings concerned with infringement of constitutional rights. In Norris v. Alabama, supra [294 U.S. 587, 55 S.Ct. 580, 79 L.Ed. 1074], the court stated: "That the question is one of fact does not relieve us of the duty to determine whether in truth a federal right has been denied. When a federal right has been specially set up and claimed in a state court, it is our province to inquire not merely whether it was denied in express terms but also whether it was denied in substance and effect. If this requires an examination of evidence, that examination must be made. Otherwise, review by this Court would fail of its purpose in safeguarding constitutional rights."

The California cases are equally clear that on habeas corpus a court may examine the evidence introduced at the trial if necessary to determine properly the constitutional question at issue. In the case of In re Connor, supra, this court, following an application for a writ of habeas corpus, examined a transcript of statements made by petitioner at his arraignment to determine whether he had been deprived of his constitutional right to be represented by counsel at his trial. The court, treating the constitutional question as a jurisdictional one, stated: "Furthermore, the function of habeas corpus is to test the jurisdiction of the court to render judgment. It is not limited to the face of the proceeding, but extends to the record of the court below when necessary to determine jurisdiction." [15 Cal.2d 161, 99 P. 2d 250.] The District Court of Appeal in the case of In re Connolly, supra [16 Cal. App.2d 709, 61 P.2d 492], declared: "But the respondent argues that the rule cannot be applied unless the fact of immunity appears on the face of the indictment. The argument is based upon the all too broad statement that the function of habeas corpus is limited to the question of jurisdiction as it appears on the face of the proceedings. The accepted rule in this state (and the only one applicable under the Code sections above cited) is clearly stated in Re Lake, 65 Cal.App. 420, 423, 224 P. 126, 127, where the court says: '* * * While neither writ [habeas corpus or certiorari] is one of error, both extend to the entire record of the court below and to the evidence itself when necessary to determine jurisdiction.'" Penal Code section 1484, moreover, provides that on habeas corpus proceedings the petitioner may "allege any fact to show either that his imprisonment or detention is unlawful, or that he is entitled to his discharge. The court or judge must thereupon proceed in a summary way to hear such proof as may be produced against such imprisonment or detention, or in favor of the same, and to dispose of such party as the justice of the case may require, and have full power and authority to require and compel the attendance of witnesses, by process or subpoena and attachment, and to do and perform all other acts and things necessary to a full and fair hearing and determination of the case."

[22, 23] It is clear from the foregoing authorities that in a habeas corpus proceeding a court must look beyond the face of the record at the actual evidence when necessary to determine whether a petitioner has been deprived of constitutional rights. If the statute under which the petitioner was convicted is entirely unconstitutional, the court will discharge him on habeas corpus without examining the evidence. Conversely, if the statute is entirely constitutional, the conviction will be upheld without examination of the evidence. If, however, as in the present case, the statute is in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional and it cannot be determined from the charge and conviction whether or not petitioner was tried and convicted for violating the valid part, the court must examine the evidence, not to test whether it is sufficient to support a verdict, but to determine whether petitioner was tried and convicted for violating the invalid part alone, in which case the conviction must fall, or whether he was tried and convicted for violating the valid part as well, in which case the conviction must stand. The petitioner has the burden of proving that he was not tried and convicted for violating the valid part of the statute.

[24, 25] Petitioners in the present case have failed to sustain the burden of proving that they were not tried and convicted for acts of violence since the transcripts of testimony at their trials reveal evidence of such acts. Some of the petitioners, along with 75 to 100 other men and women, were engaged in picketing the entrance to the Reed Ranch while others were in a large group picketing the entrance to the Datoni Orchard. Witnesses testified that at the Reed Ranch a large group of pickets stood in the middle of the road and refused to move when automobiles approached, thus forcing the automobiles to stop. An officer testified that he could have driven on only if he "had wanted to kill somebody." Petitioners Bell, Davis and Walker participated in the stopping of cars. Bell was quoted as saying: "We are going to stop every damned automobile that comes in here." Davis, according to a witness, walked up and down the middle of the road giving orders "to stop every car that comes through here." Walker stated that "he was going to stop every damn automobile and to hell with the law. He would take care of them personally." Some of the automobiles were permitted to go through after having been stopped but no automobile, other than one used by officers, passed through the blockade at the Reed Ranch before the arrival of two deputy sheriffs.

The witness Newcomb testified that he was forced to stop at the Datoni Orchard about 3:10 a. m. by a large group of men standing across the road waving flashlights. They gathered about his car and ordered him to go back. A flashlight picture taken by a photographer at the scene shows seventeen men grouped about the car, eight of them directly in front of it. The photographer testified that there were about 65 men on the road and that Newcomb immediately turned around and left. Petitioners Knapp, Hamilton, Hinman, Wiseman, Day, and McKay were in this group and participated in the stopping of cars. Witnesses present at the Reed Ranch and the Datoni Orchard testified that the pickets' action caused them to fear bodily harm.

This evidence reveals conduct exceeding the bounds of peaceful picketing. Pickets may bring themselves to the notice of persons entering the picketed premises, but may not forcibly stop automobiles and intimidate the occupants by gathering in large numbers. Such action is more than peaceful persuasion. It is forceful intimidation and constitutes violence.

Because petitioners have failed to sustain the burden of proving that they were not convicted of the one valid provision of the ordinance prohibiting acts of violence, the writ heretofore issued is discharged and the petitioners are remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Yuba County.

GIBSON, C. J., SHENK and HOUSER, JJ., concurred.

EDMONDS, Justice (concurring).

Although I agree that the petitioners are not entitled to be released upon the writ of habeas corpus, the scope of the review, in my opinion, has been extended beyond that which the law allows. As I read the record in this proceeding, it shows judgments of conviction which the court pronouncing them had jurisdiction to render.

The petitioners were convicted under a complaint which charged them both in the conjunctive and disjunctive with the violation of each section of the ordinance. They now contend that, since a conviction upon charges of peaceful picketing would be an infringement of their constitutional rights, this court is not confined to the complaint and the judgment in considering the issues presented in this proceeding but may look behind the record of conviction and examine the evidence adduced at the trial to determine whether the conviction was for acts which are included within the unconstitutional portions of the ordinance. This argument requires some consideration of the nature and function of the writ of habeas corpus.

Generally speaking, the scope of review on habeas corpus is limited to an examination of the jurisdiction of the court whose judgment of conviction is challenged. Ex parte Parks, 93 U.S. 18, 23 L.Ed. 787; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 25 L.Ed. 717; Knewel v. Egan, 268 U.S. 442, 45 S.Ct. 522, 69 L.Ed. 1036; Bowen v. Johnston, 306 U.S. 19, 59 S.Ct. 442, 83 L.Ed. 455; Ex parte Sternes, 77 Cal. 156, 19 P. 275, 11 Am.St.Rep. 251; Ex parte Long, 114 Cal. 159, 45 P. 1057; In re Carpenter, 36 Cal.App.2d 274, 97 P.2d 476. The writ may not be employed as a vehicle for the correction of errors or irregularities committed within the exercise of an admitted jurisdiction. Ex parte Clarke, 100 U.S. 399, 25 L.Ed. 715; Ex parte Siebold, supra; Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 58 S.Ct. 1019, 82 L.Ed. 1461; 13 Cal.Jur. 218. Nor may it be used as a device to test the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the conviction of the petitioner, a question properly addressed to a reviewing court upon appeal. Harlan v. McGourin, 218 U.S. 442, 31 S.Ct. 44, 54 L.Ed. 1101, 21 Ann.Cas. 849; In re Jacobs, 175 Cal. 661, 166 P. 801; In re Williams, 183 Cal. 11, 190 P.

163; In re Stevenson, 187 Cal. 773, 204 P. 216; Ex parte Drew, 188 Cal. 717, 207 P. 249; 13 Cal.Jur. 219. These are traditional and fundamental principles from which there has been no departure, and although in recent times the concept of jurisdiction has been broadened upon habeas corpus, the question of the guilt or innocence of the petitioner is never a proper subject of inquiry.

Furthermore, a judgment challenged by a writ of habeas corpus carries with it a presumption of validity, and every reasonable intendment must be made in its favor. Johnson v. Zerbst, supra, 304 U.S. at page 468, 58 S.Ct. 1019, 82 L.Ed. 1461; In re Pillsbury, 69 Cal.App. 784, 232 P. 725; 15 Cal.Jur. 64. The proceeding is subject to the rules applicable to collateral assault upon judgments generally. In re Stevenson, supra; Ex parte Stephen, 114 Cal. 278, 46 P. 86. The presumption of validity, however, is rebuttable when the jurisdiction of the convicting court is called into question, and in pursuing its inquiry into the challenged jurisdiction, the petitioned court is not confined to the face of the judgment of conviction but may review the entire proceeding below, including an examination not only of the facts disclosed by the record but of any additional facts, outside of, but not inconsistent with, the record. Ex parte Nielsen, 131 U.S. 176, 9 S.Ct. 672, 33 L.Ed. 118; Ex parte Cuddy, 131 U.S. 280, 9 S.Ct. 703, 33 L.Ed. 154; In re Mayfield, 141 U.S. 107, 11 S.Ct. 939, 35 L.Ed. 635. However, as to all matters not affecting the jurisdiction of the court, the presumption of regularity attaching to the judgment of conviction is conclusive and unrebuttable, and any inquiry beyond the face of the judgment is foreclosed. To hold otherwise, would permit the writ of habeas corpus to be used as a means of correcting error or of testing the sufficiency of the evidence. Accordingly, the presumption that petitioners were convicted under the constitutional portions of the picketing ordinance must be deemed conclusive and an examination of the evidence upon which that conviction was had is improper unless the jurisdiction of the justice's court has been adequately challenged by the allegations of the petition.

As the courts have defined jurisdiction in recent years, it includes, the right to hear and determine concerning the offense charged and the authority of the court to act in a given manner over the person of the accused. Fortenbury v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.2d 405, 106 P.2d 411. Moreover, if during the course of a criminal prosecution the accused is deprived of certain fundamental procedural rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, a judgment of conviction subsequently entered is invalid for lack of jurisdiction. Johnson v. Zerbst, supra; Smith v. O'Grady, 312 U.S. 369, 61 S.Ct. 572, 85 L.Ed. 859; In re Connor, 15 Cal.2d 161, 99 P.2d 248 [denial of the right to counsel]; Frank v. Mangum 237 U.S. 309, 35 S.Ct. 582, 59 L.Ed. 969; Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86, 43 S.Ct. 265, 67 L.Ed. 543 [trial dominated by mob violence]; Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 47 S.Ct. 437, 71 L.Ed. 749, 50 A.L.R. 1243 [denial of the right to an impartial judge]. The remedy of habeas corpus is available to a petitioner asserting a lack of jurisdiction in any of the respects above set forth, and the petitioned court may look behind the record of conviction to test the questioned jurisdiction. As stated in one of these cases: "A court's jurisdiction at the beginning of trial may be lost 'in the course of the proceedings' due to failure to complete the court—as the Sixth Amendment requires—by providing counsel for an accused who is unable to obtain counsel, who has not intelligently waived this constitutional guaranty, and whose life or liberty is at stake." Johnson v. Zerbst, supra.

But when one is being prosecuted for the commission of acts which are charged to have been committed with force and violence and also within the limits of peaceful persuasion, the court does not lose jurisdiction when it determines from the evidence that they fall within the first category and not the second. That is the situation of the petitioners in the present case. The justice's court had jurisdiction over the persons of those charged with violating the ordinance. The offense of committing acts of violence in connection with picketing is one which the court had the power to try, and a conviction for that offense was within the authority of the court to enter. The petitioners do not claim that they were not accorded a fair trial or that they were denied any rights guaranteed to them by the federal Constitution. And although the petitioner for a writ of habeas corpus is entitled to his release if the complaint upon which he was convicted does not charge a public offense (Ex parte McNulty, 77 Cal. 164, 19 P. 237, 11 Am.St.Rep. 257; Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 P. 706), if it attempts, as here, to state an offense of which the court has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts alleged show the commission of that offense will not be inquired into. In re Leach, 215 Cal. 536, 12 P.2d 3; In re Wood, 194 Cal. 49, 227 P. 908. When one has been convicted under a statute or ordinance constitutional in its entirety, the question whether the evidence at the trial is sufficient to bring the case within the ordinance and establish a breach of its provisions, is a question, the improper determination of which, constitutes error only and is not subject to review on habeas corpus. Ex parte Long, 114 Cal. 159, 45 P. 1057; In re Kelso, 147 Cal. 609, 82 P. 241, 2 L.R.A.,N.S., 796, 109 Am.St.Rep. 178; In re Horr, 177 Cal. 721, 171 P. 801. This principle is applicable even though it be contended there is a total lack of evidence to support the conviction. In re Cutler, 1 Cal.App.2d 273, 36 P.2d 441. No different result should obtain when one has been convicted under a severable ordinance, constitutional in part.

In Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242, 57 S.Ct. 732, 81 L.Ed. 1066, the facts were quite different from those now before this court. There, the defendant was convicted of the crime of insurrection as defined in a statute of Georgia. He appealed from a judgment of the state Supreme Court refusing him a discharge upon habeas corpus, contending that the statute was too vague and indefinite to provide a sufficiently ascertainable standard of guilt. The Supreme Court of the United States upheld this contention and characterized the entire statute as uncertain in that it was susceptible of a construction penalizing innocent as well as criminal conduct. In order to determine whether the state court had made an unconstitutional construction and application of the statute, the Supreme Court was compelled to examine the record and to ascertain the specific conduct which was claimed to be unlawful under the statute. This record, the court concluded, showed the commission of lawful acts only, and it held that the statute had been unconstitutionally construed and applied.

If, upon examining the face of a criminal statute, the nature of the conduct which is made unlawful appears to be wholly uncertain, the court must of necessity review the acts attributed to the defendant to determine whether the statute is being given an unconstitutional application. That rule is not applicable, however, where, as here, the statute includes acts of violence in connection with picketing which unquestionably may be made unlawful. The sufficiency of the complaint to charge such acts was a question which the petitioners might properly present upon appeal, together with the point that the evidence showed no acts of violence. But their appeal has been determined adversely to them. That determination constitutes a final adjudication upon the issues of fact which must be conclusively presumed to be a conviction for acts of violence.

This conclusion is in accordance with long established principles. For example in the case of Ex parte Morrison, 88 Cal. 112, 25 P. 1064, petitioner challenged the validity of a judgment convicting him of the crime of vagrancy as defined in section 647 of the Penal Code. He attacked the first clause of this section as unconstitutional. Although the judgment was regular on its face, it did not appear therefrom under which clause of section 647 the conviction was had. In discharging the writ, the court declared, "we cannot assume, for the purpose of passing on this question, or of discharging the prisoner, that this is the particular clause under which the conviction was had." And in In re Dal Porte, 198 Cal. 216, 244 P. 355, 357, petitioner was charged and convicted under two counts, one of which stated an offense beyond the jurisdiction of the court to try. As the finding of guilt was general, it was impossible to ascertain whether the conviction was based upon either or both counts. Admitting that the judgment was erroneous and subject to correction on appeal, the court nevertheless declared: "We are not prepared to say, however, that petitioner is entitled in this proceeding to any relief from said judgment on account of its being based upon a defective count of the complaint. As we have already seen, the charge set forth in the second count of said complaint was one within the jurisdiction of said police court, and the fact that the offense charged in the first count of said complaint was one over which said police court did not have jurisdiction would not be sufficient to oust the court of jurisdiction of the offense over which it had full and complete jurisdiction."

But I agree that if the records of the trials which resulted in the petitioners' conviction may be examined for the purpose of determining whether the petitioners committed acts of violence and physical intimidation, there is substantial evidence to support the judgments which are attacked in this proceeding. For although labor may present its grievances to the public, the obstruction of access to an employer's place of business by such number of persons as to require his employees who desire to work to run the gauntlet under threats of physical harm is not protected by the constitutional guarantees.

Many years ago, this court held that an intentional interference with the relations of an employer and his employees is not tortious if the object sought to be attained has reasonable relevance to labor conditions and peaceful means are used to accomplish it. Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 P. 1027, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 550, 16 Ann.Cas. 1165. That principle was recently restated and applied in holding "that workmen may associate together and exert various forms of economic pressure upon employers, provided they act peaceably and honestly." However, the court laid particular emphasis upon the requirement that labor's acts must be peaceful if they are to come within the protection of the law. Fully recognizing "that the right to picket peacefully and truthfully is one of organized labor's lawful means of advertising its grievances to the public, and as such is guaranteed by the Constitution as an incident of freedom of speech," it also added: "But the law clearly requires that concerted action by union workers must be peaceful. Acts of violence or 'acts * * * amounting to physical intimidation' will be enjoined." McKay v. Retail Auto S. L. Union No. 1067, 16 Cal.2d 311, 106 P.2d 373, 378.

The testimony which is referred to in the opinion of my associates, and other evidence which is shown by the record, fully justifies a conclusion that the picketing, carried on, in part, under cover of darkness and with a show of force toward employees of the Earl Fruit Co. who desired to continue their employment entirely out of proportion to any peaceful purpose, was accompanied by such violence, or threats of violence, as to constitute unlawful means. To say that it comes within the bounds of peaceful picketing is to ignore the realities of the situation.

When pickets patrol the public street which is the approach to their employer's premises and either their number or their conduct is such as to constitute intimidation and put employees or others in fear of bodily harm, they are guilty of unlawful acts. Such picketing goes far beyond that which has been recognized by the courts as a reasonable exercise of the right to tell the facts of a labor dispute and to persuade employees, by peaceful means, to leave their work. The courts have generally recognized that persuasion in the presence of a large number of persons is not peaceful persuasion, and in one of its decisions, the Supreme Court of the United States said that it is the proper function of a court of equity "to prevent the inevitable intimidation of * * * groups of pickets, but to allow missionaries. * * * In going to and from work, men have a right to as free a passage without obstruction as the streets afford, consistent with the right of others to enjoy the same privilege." American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council, 257 U.S. 184, 42 S.Ct. 72, 76, 78, 66 L.Ed. 189, 27 A.L.R. 360.

In the very recent case of Milk Wagon Drivers Union of Chicago, Local 753 v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 312 U.S. 287, 61 S. Ct. 552, 555, 85 L.Ed. 836, 132 A.L.R. 1200, rehearing denied 312 U.S. 715, 61 S.Ct. 803, 85 L.Ed. 1145, the same court laid down the requirement that, to be lawful, picketing must be peaceful and may not have a background of violence. "Peaceful picketing," said the court, "is the workingman's means of communication. It must never be forgotten, however, that the Bill of Rights was the child of the Enlightenment. Back of the guarantee of free speech lay faith in the power of an appeal to reason by all the peaceful means for gaining access to the mind. It was in order to avert force and explosions due to restrictions upon rational modes of communication that the guarantee of free speech was given a generous scope. But utterance in a context of violence can lose its significance as an appeal to reason and become part of an instrument of force. Such utterance was not meant to be sheltered by the Constitution."

The petitioners in that case, as in the one now before this court, relied upon the decision of Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 105, 60 S.Ct. 736, 84 L.Ed. 1093. But as Mr. Justice Frankfurter pointed out, there was no "entanglement with violence" in either the Thornhill case or in Carlson v. California, 310 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 746, 749, 84 L.Ed. 1104, where the court declared: "The power and duty of the State to take adequate steps to preserve the peace and protect the privacy, the lives, and the property of its residents cannot be doubted." Concerning the former case, he said that the court expressly excluded a labor dispute involving violence from the scope of its decision in these words [310 U.S. 88, 60 S.Ct. 746, 84 L.Ed. 1093]: "We are not now concerned with picketing en masse or otherwise conducted which might occasion such imminent and aggravated danger * * * as to justify a statute narrowly drawn to cover the precise situation giving rise to the danger." The Yuba County ordinance, in so far as its valid severable provisions are concerned, is exactly such a statute.

CURTIS, J., concurred.

CARTER, Justice (dissenting).

I dissent.

In my opinion petitioners are entitled to their release on habeas corpus upon the ground that the provisions of the ordinance under which they were charged and convicted are unconstitutional and void.

Since the majority of the court seem to agree that section 2 of the ordinance is invalid, but sustain the validity of the judgment of conviction against the petitioners under section 3 of said ordinance, I will confine my discussion to section 3 only.

Said section provides: "Section 3. It is unlawful for any person to beset or picket the premises of another, or any approach thereto, where any person is employed or seeks employment, or any place or approach thereto where such employee or person seeking employment lodges or resides, for the purpose of inducing such employee or person seeking employment, by means of compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear, to quit his or her employment or to refrain from seeking or freely entering into employment."

In my opinion the above-quoted section is so vague, indefinite and uncertain that it cannot be said to denounce as a crime any act which may be proscribed under the police power of the state, and fails to provide a sufficiently ascertainable standard of guilt.

Before making an analysis of the above-quoted section, I shall call attention to certain rules applicable to the interpretation of statutes and ordinances. They are as follows:

"When the language of an act appears on its face to have a meaning, but it is impossible to give it any precise or intelligible application in the circumstances under which it was intended to operate, it is simply void; for if no judicial certainty can be settled upon as to its meaning, courts are not at liberty to supply the deficiency or make the statute certain. But legislation cannot be nullified on the ground of uncertainty, if susceptible of any reasonable construction that will support it." 26 Am. and Eng. Ency. Law, 2d Ed., 656.

"Where the statutory terms are of such uncertain meaning, or so confused, that the courts cannot discern with reasonable certainty what is intended, they will pronounce the enactment void." Statutory Crimes, 3d Ed., in the third subdivision of section 41.

"Statutes and ordinances which fix crimes, or quasi crimes, should so fix them that there could be no uncertainty. They should be so worded that one could read them, and know whether or not he was violating law. They should not be so worded as to leave their substantive elements to the caprices of either judge or jury. In other words the law should be complete and definite. What would be 'reasonable effort' under this law is left a question for the court or jury. What in the minds of one court or jury might be 'reasonable effort' might not be so considered by another court or jury. Each trial tribunal would be making its own ordinance. This will not do for a law or ordinance criminal in character." Taft v. Shaw, 284 Mo. 531, 225 S.W. 457, 461.

"It is equally true that a mere collection of words cannot constitute a law; otherwise the dictionary can be transformed into a statute by the proper legislative formula. An act of the legislature, to be enforceable as a law, must prescribe a rule of action, and such rule must be intelligibly expressed." State ex inf. Crow v. West Side Street Ry. Co., 146 Mo. 155, 47 S.W. 959, 961.

"An ordinance of a regulatory nature must be clear, certain and definite, so that the average man may with due care after reading the same understand whether he will incur a penalty for his actions or not." 19 R.C.L., p. 810.

"* * * in creating an offence the legislature may define it by a particular description of the act or acts constituting it, or may define it as any act which produces, or is reasonably calculated to produce certain defined or described results." 8 R.C.L., p. 57.

Applying the foregoing rules to the ordinance under consideration, it is clear to my mind that the language contained therein is insufficient to charge an offense within the purview of the police power of the state in view of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that "The freedom of speech and of the press, which are secured by the First Amendment against abridgment by the United States, are among the fundamental personal rights and liberties which are secured to all persons by the Fourteenth Amendment against abridgment by a state. * * *" Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 60 S.Ct. 736, 740, 84 L.Ed. 1093; Carlson v. California, 310 U.S. 106, 60 S.Ct. 746, 84 L.Ed. 1104; Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444, 58 S.Ct. 666, 82 L.Ed. 949; Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 60 S.Ct. 146, 84 L.Ed. 155; Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 666, 45 S.Ct. 625, 69 L.Ed. 1138, 1145; Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 368, 51 S.Ct. 532, 75 L.Ed. 1117, 1121, 73 A.L.R. 1484; Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 707, 51 S.Ct. 625, 75 L.Ed. 1357, 1362; Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233, 244, 56 S.Ct. 444, 80 L.Ed. 660, 665; De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364, 57 S.Ct. 255, 81 L.Ed. 278, 283. See, also, Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 58 S.Ct. 149, 82 L.Ed. 288, decided December 6, 1937. It is also well settled that municipal ordinances adopted under state authority constitute state action and are within the prohibition of the amendment. Raymond v. Chicago Union Traction Co., 207 U.S. 20, 28 S.Ct. 7, 52 L.Ed. 78, 12 Ann.Cas. 757; Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Los Angeles, 227 U.S. 278, 33 S.Ct. 312, 57 L.Ed. 510; Cuyahoga River Power Co. v. Akron, 240 U.S. 462, 36 S.Ct. 402, 60 L.Ed. 743.

The terms, "beset or picket" are not defined in the ordinance here under consideration nor in any statute or court decision of this state. Carlson v. California, supra. Text-writers have defined picketing as "the marching to and fro before the premises of an establishment involved in a dispute, generally accompanied by the carrying and display of a sign, placard or banner bearing statements in connection with the dispute." Section 109 Labor Disputes and Collective Bargaining by Ludwig Teller. Picketing has also been defined by legislative enactment elsewhere as "the act of walking up and down before any place of business * * * and the solicitation of the public or employees through word of mouth or by printed signs or banners, that such place of business is unfair to organized labor or to any voluntary association, group or members of labor organizations; and by requesting through word of mouth or signs that such place of business or employer be boycotted and not patronized by the public; and by personal solicitation through word of mouth or signs that employees * * * cease working in such places of business so picketed." Diemer v. Weiss, 343 Mo. 626, 122 S.W.2d 922, 924. In brief terms, picketing may be said to constitute the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute by representatives of organized labor in the vicinity of the place where the dispute exists. Thornhill v. Alabama, supra.

It now appears to be well settled by both the decisions of this court and those of the Supreme Court of the United States that "the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute must be regarded as within that area of free discussion that is guaranteed by the Constitution." Thornhill v. Alabama, supra; Carlson v. California, supra; Hague v. C. I. O., 307 U.S. 496, 59 S.Ct. 954, 83 L.Ed. 1423; Schneider v. State, supra; Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union, 301 U.S. 468, 57 S.Ct. 857, 81 L.Ed. 1229.

Applying the foregoing definition to section 3 of the ordinance under consideration here, we find that the ordinance makes it "unlawful for any person to * * * picket the premises of another * * * for the purpose of inducing any employee or person seeking employment * * * to quit his or her employment or to refrain from seeking or freely entering into employment."

It appears to be conceded that a statutory enactment couched in the above-quoted language would constitute a clear violation of the constitutional provisions both of this state and of the United States guaranteeing such civil liberties as freedom of speech, freedom of press and freedom of assembly. Thornhill v. Alabama, supra; Carlson v. California, supra; Lovell v. Griffin, supra; Schneider v. State, supra.

But it is insisted that the insertion of the words "by means of compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear," after the clause "for the purpose of inducing such employee or person seeking employment," and before the clause "to quit his or her employment or to refrain from seeking or freely entering into employment" removes section 3 of said ordinance from the category of unconstitutional legislation and renders it a valid enactment prohibiting all picketing where some of the pickets in some manner or other resort to what might be construed to mean "compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear." In view of this argument, let us analyze the last quoted terms and see if they have any significance whatever when used in an ordinance designed to proscribe and prohibit acts and conduct which may be performed in the exercise of one's civil liberties guaranteed by both our state and federal Constitutions.

If picketing constitutes the publicizing of the facts concerning a labor dispute in the vicinity of the premises where said dispute exists, then it must follow that it was the intention of the legislative body which enacted said ordinance to prohibit the dissemination of information concerning such labor dispute by means of "compulsion," etc.

In my opinion this is the only interpretation or construction which can be placed upon the above-quoted language of section 3 of said ordinance and said language is thereby rendered meaningless. To illustrate, how can it be said that a picket disseminated information concerning the facts of a labor dispute by means of "compulsion," or "coercion," or "intimidation," or "threats," or "acts of violence," or "fear"? Certainly the dissemination of information by means of either the spoken or printed word regardless of how loud the voice or how large the printing would not have the effect of creating or bringing about the conditions described as "compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear." At least, it is not possible for me to imagine a situation in which one engaged in picketing in the sense that that term has been defined, doing anything as a picket which would bring about a condition approaching "compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear." Picketing does not mean throwing stones, but a person engaged in picketing may throw stones; picketing does not mean wielding clubs, but a person engaged in picketing may wield a club; picketing does not mean firing guns, but a person engaged in picketing may fire a gun; in brief, picketing does not mean or comprehend the commission of any act or acts of violence, but such acts may be committed by those engaged in picketing. It must be conceded that every act of violence designed to injure the person or property of another now constitutes a violation of some penal provision of the law of this state and subjects the perpetrator thereof to prosecution and punishment, whether committed by a person engaged in picketing or in any other activity. There is no more reason for saying that publicizing the facts of a labor dispute, or the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute through pickets, may be accomplished by means of acts of violence, than to say that preaching the gospel, lecturing on social reforms, teaching political economy or publishing a newspaper may be likewise accomplished. The fact that acts of violence may be committed by one engaged in any of the above pursuits does not change the character of the pursuit nor subject it to restrictions created by legislative enactments under an asserted exercise of the police power. In other words, it is the acts of violence which come within the purview of the police power and not the picketing, preaching, lecturing, teaching or publishing, because acts of violence have no relation to the purpose and object to be accomplished by any of the above-mentioned activities, including picketing, according to the accepted definition of that word. It may be true that a person while engaged in picketing might commit any and every crime known to our law, but certainly the commission of such crimes should not be charged up against the entire picket line or the labor organization under whose auspices the premises are being picketed. As I read our penal statutes, I cannot think of anything in the nature of violence, threats of violence, or acts of violence which are not now denounced as public offenses and punishable as such. Therefore, to enact an ordinance denouncing the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute by means of acts of violence, places such ordinance in the category of those denounced by the above-quoted rules as being so vague, indefinite and uncertain that they are absolutely meaningless. Such, in my opinion, is the situation with reference to section 3 of the ordinance here under consideration. To carry the discussion a little further in order to disclose the absurdity of the contention that since section 3 of said ordinance prohibits "picketing by means of acts of violence" it is a valid exercise of the police power of the state, let us assume that the ordinance denounced as a crime any of the following: "preaching by means of acts of violence"; or "lecturing by means of acts of violence"; or "teaching by means of acts of violence"; or "publishing a newspaper by means of acts of violence"; or "distributing a newspaper by means of acts of violence"; or "parading by means of acts of violence." Obviously, any such ordinance would be declared void on its face as being too vague, uncertain and indefinite to constitute a public offense. The Supreme Court of Missouri by unanimous opinion in the case of Deimer v. Weiss, supra, declared a similar ordinance void for uncertainty, and I have not been able to find respectable authority to the contrary.

The ordinance here under consideration falls squarely within the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242, 57 S.Ct. 732, 733, 81 L.Ed. 1066, where a statute of the state of Georgia purporting to prohibit acts and conduct tending to incite insurrection was under attack. It appears from the opinion in that case that "The petition alleged the judgment and sentence were void and appellant's detention illegal because the statute under which he was convicted denies and illegally restrains his freedom of speech and of assembly and is too vague and indefinite to provide a sufficiently ascertainable standard of guilt, and further alleged that there had been no adjudication by any court of the constitutional validity of the statute as applied to appellant's conduct." (Emphasis added.) The court at page 255 of its opinion in 301 U.S., at page 738 of 57 S.Ct., 81 L.Ed. 1066, said:

"The affirmance of conviction upon the trial record necessarily gives section 56 the construction that one who seeks members for or attempts to organize a local unit of a party which has the purposes and objects disclosed by the documents in evidence may be found guilty of an attempt to incite insurrection.

"The questions are whether this construction and application of the statute deprives the accused of the right of freedom of speech and of assembly guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, and whether the statute so construed and applied furnishes a reasonably definite and ascertainable standard of guilt." (Emphasis added.)

On page 263 of its opinion in 301 U.S., on page 741 of 57 S.Ct., 81 L.Ed. 1066, in the Herndon case the court quotes with approval from its decision in United States v. L. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U.S. 81, 41 S.Ct. 298, 65 L.Ed. 516, 14 A.L.R. 1045, the following pertinent declaration:

"'Observe that the section forbids no specific or definite act. It confines the subject-matter of the investigation which it authorizes to no element essentially inhering in the transaction as to which it provides. It leaves open, therefore, the widest conceivable inquiry, the scope of which no one can foresee and the result of which no one can foreshadow or adequately guard against. In fact, we see no reason to doubt the soundness of the observation of the court below in its opinion to the effect that, to attempt to enforce the section would be the exact equivalent of an effort to carry out a statute which in terms merely penalized and punished all acts detrimental to the public interest when unjust and unreasonable in the estimation of the court and jury. * * *' [255 U.S. at page 89, 41 S.Ct. at page 300, 65 L.Ed. 516, 14 A.L.R. 1045.]"

"The decisions relied on by the state held the Sherman Law (15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1–7, 15 note) furnished a reasonable standard of guilt because it made a standard long recognized by the common law the statutory test.

"The statute, as construed and applied, amounts merely to a dragnet which may enmesh any one who agitates for a change of government if a jury can be persuaded that he ought to have foreseen his words would have some effect in the future conduct of others. No reasonably ascertainable standard of guilt is prescribed. So vague and indeterminate are the boundaries thus set to the freedom of speech and assembly that the law necessarily violates the guarantees of liberty embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment." (Italics added.)

What is the ascertainable standard of guilt prescribed in the ordinance here under consideration? The obvious answer to this question must be that it contains no such standard. The statement therein that "it shall be unlawful" to commit an "act of violence" amounts to nothing more than to say that "it is unlawful to do an unlawful act" without defining what constitutes the unlawful act. Nowhere in the ordinance is there any indication of what is meant by the expression "It is unlawful for any person to beset or picket the premises of another * * * for the purpose of inducing such employee or person seeking employment, by means of compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear, to quit his or her employment or to refrain from seeking or freely entering into employment." It is obvious that if we apply the accepted definition of the word "picket" (to disseminate information concerning or to publicize the facts of a labor dispute) the italicized words become meaningless and no crime is defined.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Thornhill v. Alabama, supra, in commenting upon similar broad and sweeping provisions of an Alabama statute, made the following comment:

"The numerous forms of conduct proscribed by section 3448 are subsumed under two offenses: the first embraces the activities of all who 'without a just cause or legal excuse' 'go near to or loiter about the premises' of any person engaged in a lawful business for the purpose of influencing or inducing others to adopt any of certain enumerated courses of action; the second, all who 'picket' the place of business of any such person 'for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or interfering with or injuring any lawful business or enterprise of another.' It is apparent that one or the other of the offenses comprehends every practicable method whereby the facts of a labor dispute may be publicized in the vicinity of the place of business of an employer. The phrase 'without a just cause or legal excuse' does not in any effective manner restrict the breadth of the regulation; the words themselves have no ascertainable meaning either inherent or historical. Compare Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453, 455, 59 S.Ct. 618, 619, 83 L. Ed. 888. The courses of action, listed under the first offense, which an accused—including an employee—may not urge others to take, comprehends those which in many instances would normally result from merely publicizing, without annoyance or threat of any kind, the facts of a labor dispute. An intention to hinder, delay or interfere with a lawful business, which is an element of the second offense, likewise can be proved merely by showing that others reacted in a way normally expectable of some upon learning the facts of a dispute. The vague contours of the term 'picket' are nowhere delineated. Employees or others, accordingly, may be found to be within the purview of the term and convicted for engaging in activities identical with those proscribed by the first offense. In sum, whatever the means used to publicize the facts of a labor dispute, whether by printed sign, by pamphlet, by word of mouth or otherwise, all such activity without exception is within the inclusive prohibition of the statute so long as it occurs in the vicinity of the scene of the dispute." (Italics added.)

Likewise, in the case of Carlson v. California, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States in striking down as unconstitutional and void an ordinance of Shasta County, California, similar to the ordinance here under consideration because of its "sweeping and inexact terms," made this very pertinent declaration:

"The sweeping and inexact terms of the ordinance disclose the threat to freedom of speech inherent in its existence. It cannot be thought to differ in any material respect from the statute held void in Thornhill's case. The carrying of signs and banners, no less than the raising of a flag, is a natural and appropriate means of conveying information on matters of public concern. Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 51 S.Ct. 532, 75 L.Ed. 1117, 73 A.L.R. 1484. For the reasons set forth in our opinion in Thornhill v. Alabama, supra, publicizing the facts of a labor dispute in a peaceful way through appropriate means, whether by pamphlet, by word of mouth or by banner, must now be regarded as within that liberty of communication which is secured to every person by the Fourteenth Amendment against abridgement by a state."

In reviewing the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in connection with my study of the case at bar and the preparation of this opinion, I have been strongly impressed with the decided liberal trend of the decisions of that great court, which in its pronouncements in the field of those fundamental and basic personal rights and liberties referred to as civil liberties, have exemplified profound vision and foresight and eminent fairness in extending the constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and of the press not only the strong, the wealthy and the powerful, but likewise the weak, the humble and the oppressed. It is these pronouncements which will protect a defenseless minority from being legislated against and their freedom of expression curtailed by those who happen to be in the majority or who control the legislative processes for the time being. Such a situation was depicted by Mr. Justice Murphy in speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Thornhill v. Alabama, supra, when he said:

"A like threat is inherent in a penal statute, like that in question here, which does not aim specifically at evils within the allowable area of State control but, on the contrary, sweeps within its ambit other activities that in ordinary circumstances constitute an exercise of freedom of speech or of the press. The existence of such a statute, which readily lends itself to harsh and discriminatory enforcement by local prosecuting officials, against particular groups deemed to merit their displeasure, results in a continuous and pervasive restraint on all freedom of discussion that might reasonably be regarded as within its purview. It is not any less effective or, if the restraint is not permissible, less pernicious than the restraint on freedom of discussion imposed by the threat of censorship. An accused, after arrest and conviction under such a statute, does not have to sustain the burden of demonstrating that the State could not constitutionally have written a different and specific statute covering his activities as disclosed by the charge and the evidence introduced against him. Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 155, 162, 163, 60 S.Ct. 146, 148, 151, 84 L.Ed. 155. Where regulations of the liberty of free discussion are concerned, there are special reasons for observing the rule that it is the statute, and not the accusation or the evidence under it, which prescribes the limits of permissible conduct and warns against transgression. Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 368, 51 S.Ct. 532, 535, 75 L.Ed. 1117, 73 A.L.R. 1484; Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 155, 162, 163, 60 S.Ct. 146, 151, 84 L.Ed. 155. Compare Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 59 S.Ct. 618, 83 L.Ed. 888." (Emphasis added.)

So zealously has the Supreme Court of the United States guarded and protected these fundamental personal rights and liberties that in the case of Schneider v. State, supra, that court struck down as unconstitutional and void four ordinances enacted respectively by the cities of Los Angeles, California, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Worcester, Massachusetts, and Irvington, New Jersey, designed to prohibit the distribution of handbills, leaflets, circulars, etc., in said cities. Mr. Justice Roberts speaking for the court in said case, declared [308 U.S. 147, 60 S.Ct. 151, 84 L.Ed. 155]:

"It is argued that the circumstance that in the actual enforcement of the Milwaukee ordinance the distributor is arrested only if those who receive the literature throw it in the streets, renders it valid. But, even as thus construed, the ordinance cannot be enforced without unconstitutionally abridging the liberty of free speech. As we have pointed out, the public convenience in respect of cleanliness of the streets does not justify an exertion of the police power which invades the free communication of information and opinion secured by the Constitution.

"It is suggested that the Los Angeles and Worcester ordinances are valid because their operation is limited to streets and alleys and leaves persons free to distribute printed matter in other public places. But, as we have said, the streets are natural and proper places for the dissemination of information and opinion; and one is not to have the exercise of his liberty of expression in appropriate places abridged on the plea that it may be exercised in some other place. * * *

"The freedom of speech and of the press secured by the First Amendment * * * against abridgment by the United States is similarly secured to all persons by the Fourteenth [Amendment] against abridgment by a state.

"Although a municipality may enact regulations in the interest of the public safety, health, welfare or convenience, these may not abridge the individual liberties secured by the Constitution to those who wish to speak, write, print or circulate information or opinion. * * *

"This court has characterized the freedom of speech and that of the press as fundamental personal rights and liberties. The phrase is not an empty one and was not lightly used. It reflects the belief of the framers of the Constitution that exercise of the rights lies at the foundation of free government by free men. It stresses, as do many opinions of this court, the importance of preventing the restriction of enjoyment of these liberties.

"In every case, therefore, where legislative abridgment of the rights is asserted, the courts should be astute to examine the effect of the challenged legislation. Mere legislative preferences or beliefs respecting matters of public convenience may well support regulation directed at other personal activities, but be insufficient to justify such as diminishes the exercise of rights so vital to the maintenance of democratic institutions. And so, as cases arise, the delicate and difficult task falls upon the courts to weigh the circumstances and to appraise the substantiality of the reasons advanced in support of the regulation of the free enjoyment of the rights."

The chief contention of the prosecuting officers in the case at bar is that the ordinance here in question may be upheld as a valid exercise of police power. While the realm within which the police power operates may be somewhat indefinite, it may not be invoked to abridge the fundamental right of freedom of expression guaranteed by constitutional mandate. The Constitution is the bulwark of our civil liberty and it should be so construed as to protect that liberty against encroachment even under the guise of the police power. While some of its provisions have at times been emasculated by enthusiastic advocates of the police power doctrine, the Constitution still remains the fundamental law of the land and will continue to be such so long as the ideal of civil liberty is predominate in the hearts and minds of the American people.

In my opinion, the ordinance here in question trenches upon the right of free expression guaranteed by both our state and federal Constitutions, and should therefore be stricken down. If "picketing" means "the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute," then the right to picket, as well as the right to preach, lecture, teach, or publish a newspaper, all fall in the same category. If the Constitution protects one of these rights, it protects the others. If a crime is committed by a person while exercising one or more of these rights, he may be prosecuted, convicted and punished for the crime, not for the exercise of the right to picket, preach, lecture, teach, or publish a newspaper. In my opinion, any legislative enactment designed to abridge or limit any of the above-mentioned rights flies squarely in the face of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press, and should be declared null and void by the courts under their constitutional power.

From what I have said in the foregoing opinion, it is obvious that section 3 as well as section 2 of the ordinance here under consideration is void, and there can be no doubt but that habeas corpus is the only remedy available to petitioners to test the validity of said ordinance. See cases collected and commented on in 13 Cal.Jur. p. 225, sec. 8.

In view of my determination that the ordinance is invalid and void because the language employed therein is too vague, uncertain and indefinite to provide a sufficiently ascertainable standard of guilt and that the acts denounced by it cannot be proscribed because they are not within the purview of the police power of the state, the complaint therefore fails to charge a public offense, and it is unnecessary to review the evidence presented during the trial in the justice's court.

The majority opinions in this case are predicated upon the theory that since section 3 of the ordinance in question purports to prohibit "picketing by means of acts of violence" (whatever this phrase means), it defines a crime within the purview of the police power of the county of Yuba, and notwithstanding the defendants were found guilty of violating all of the provisions of both sections 2 and 3 of the ordinance (a portion of the charge being based on obviously invalid provisions of the ordinance), the judgment against them is nevertheless immune from attack on habeas corpus.

I am of the opinion, that even if it can be said that section 3 of the ordinance sufficiently defines a crime as held by a majority of the court, the conviction of the defendants should not be allowed to stand for the reason that the complaint which forms the basis of the prosecution is wholly insufficient to charge a public offense, and the judgment against petitioners is void for the reason that they were found guilty of the commission of lawful as well as unlawful acts.

Section 3 of the ordinance in question makes unlawful, "picketing by means of compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, acts of violence, or fear." All of these means, except "acts of violence" may be resorted to by those who are peacefully and therefore lawfully engaged in publicizing a labor dispute by means of picketing or boycotting.

That there is such a thing as moral compulsion, coercion, intimidation, threats, and fear is a proposition recognized in experience and by many court decisions, and in my opinion, these words do not necessarily imply conduct of an unlawful character when applied to a labor dispute.

Such words may be used to define the usual, ordinary and customary moral, social and economic pressure which inheres in every labor dispute and particularly where picketing is resorted to.

It must be conceded that it is within the constitutional right of a person engaged in a labor dispute to advise those who contemplate crossing a picket line, that if they do so, future social or business relations with them will be withheld. It must also be conceded that such advice constitutes a threat, and it also amounts to compulsion, intimidation and coercion. Such compulsion, intimidation and coercion is the result of fear of the withholding of such social or business relations which may have been both pleasant and profitable to the person who is threatened with the loss thereof. Obviously, conduct constituting such threats, compulsion, intimidation, coercion or fear cannot be proscribed by penal statute or ordinance for the reason that the same would constitute a violation of the constitutional guarantee of free speech.

Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition, defines "compulsion" as follows:

"1. Act of compelling, or state of being compelled; act of driving or urging by force or by physical or moral constraint; subjection to force. Cf. Coercion.

"I would give no man a reason upon compulsion."

"2. Anything that compels; as, to live under compulsion." The same work defines "coercion" as follows:

"1. The act, process, or power of coercing; specif., the application to another of such force, either physical or moral, as to constrain him to do against his will something he would not otherwise have done; compulsion. Coercion may cause the act produced to be a nullity so far as concerns legal ability. Cf. Duress.

"2. The application of legal or governmental measures to a group or nation, so as to bring its outward conformity."

And "intimidation" is defined by the same work as follows:

"To make timid or fearful; to inspire or affect with fear; to make fearful; to frighten; specif., to deter, as by threats; to overawe; cow.

"Now guilt, once harbored in a conscious breast,

"Intimidates the brave, degrades the great. Johnson.

"Syn.—Terrify, daunt, deter, abash. See Frighten.

"Ant.—Embolden, hearten, inspirit. See Encourage.

"Act of making timid or fearful or of deterring by threats; state of being intimidated, as the voters were kept from the polls by intimidation."

It will be observed from the foregoing definitions that the mere assertion that compulsion, coercion or intimidation has been used or resorted to for the accomplishment of an object or purpose or in the performance of an act, it does not necessarily follow therefrom that the means employed was unlawful, immoral or unjust. In fact, it is inconceivable that a labor dispute could result in a strike, and that striking employees and their sympathizers could picket and boycott places of business, without the owners, employees or patrons of such places of business being subjected to some degree of moral, social or economic compulsion, coercion or intimidation. It appears to be settled beyond any question by the authorities which I have cited above, and by many other authorities both in this and other jurisdictions, that the moral, social and economic compulsion, coercion and intimidation which may be occasioned as the result of peaceful picketing, boycotting and publicizing of labor disputes, cannot be proscribed by statute or prohibited by injunction because such conduct is permissible as a lawful exercise of the constitutional right of free speech, free press and free assemblage.

What is said with reference to the meaning of the words "compulsion," "coercion" and "intimidation" when applied to peaceful picketing and boycotting, is equally true with reference to the word "threat." It cannot be denied that a person has the right to threaten that which he has a lawful right to do, and that such threat cannot be proscribed by statute or ordinance, or prohibited by injunction. The late Mr. Justice Holmes, while a member of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in the case of Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N.E. 1077, 1081, 57 Am.St. Rep. 443, 35 L.R.A. 722, made this observation in one of his history-making dissenting opinions. He said:

"I pause here to remark that the word 'threats' often is used as if, when it appeared that threats had been made, it appeared that unlawful conduct had begun. But it depends on what you threaten. As a general rule, even if subject to some exceptions, what you may do in a certain event you may threaten to do—that is, give warning of your intention to do—in that event, and thus allow the other person the chance of avoiding the consequence. So, as to 'compulsion,' it depends on how you 'compel.' * * * So as to 'annoyance' or 'intimidation.'"

In the case of Lisse v. Local Union No. 31, 2 Cal.2d 312, at page 318, 41 P.2d 314, at page 316, this court quoted with approval from its decision in the case of Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 P. 324, as follows:

"The right of united labor to strike, in furtherance of trade interests (no contractual obligation standing in the way) is fully recognized. The reason for the strike may be based upon the refusal to comply with the employees' demand for the betterment of wages, conditions, hours of labor, the discharge of one employee, or the engagement of another—any one or more of the multifarious considerations which in good faith may be believed to tend toward the advancement of the employees. After striking, the employee may engage in a 'boycott,' as that word is here employed. As here employed, it means not only the right to the concerted withdrawal of social and business intercourse, but the right by all legitimate means—of fair publication, and fair oral or written persuasion—to induce others interested in, or sympathetic with, their cause, to withdraw their social intercourse and business patronage from the employer. They may go even further than this, and request of another that he withdraw his patronage from the employer, and may use the moral intimidation and coercion of threatening a like boycott against him if he refuse so to do. This last proposition necessarily involves the bringing into a labor dispute between A and B, C, who has no difference with either. It contemplates that C, upon the request of B, and under the moral intimidation lest B boycott him, may thus be constrained to withdraw his patronage from A, with whom he has no controversy." (Emphasis added.)

In the case of Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 610, 98 P. 1027, 1039, 21 L.R.A.,N.S., 550, 16 Ann.Cas. 1165, Mr. Justice Sloss in his concurring opinion quoted with approval from the dissenting opinion of the late Mr. Justice Holmes, in the case of Vegelahn v. Guntner, supra, as follows:

"'If it be true that workingmen may combine with a view, among other things, to getting as much as they can for their labor, just as capital may combine with a view to getting the greatest possible return, it must be true that, when combined, they have the same liberty that combined capital has to support their interests by argument, persuasion, and the bestowal or refusal of those advantages which they otherwise lawfully control.'

"The terms 'intimidation' and 'coercion,' so frequently used in the discussion of this question, seem to me to have no application to such acts as were here committed. One cannot be said to be 'intimidated' or 'coerced,' in the sense of unlawful compulsion by being induced to forego business relations with A, rather than lose the benefit of more profitable relations with B. It is equally beside the question to speak of 'threats' where that which is threatened is only what the party has a legal right to do."

The Supreme Court of Indiana, in the case of Local Union No. 26, etc., v. City of Kokomo, 211 Ind. 72, 5 N.E.2d 624, at page 628, 108 A.L.R. 1111, discusses the meaning of the words "compulsion" and "coercion" in relation to a labor dispute in the following language:

"The city ordinance now before the court makes all picketing of the employer's premises, or the approach thereto, unlawful. No force or violence is necessary to make the act of picketing unlawful and punishable. Peaceable acts upon the part of the employees are authorized expressly by chapter 12 of the Acts of 1933. The allegations of the complaint show no acts involving fraud or violence. The 1933 act authorizes the doing of all acts alleged in the complaint, which alleges that such acts were performed by lawful means and without fraud or violence, or any intention or purpose to injure the employer. The act of striking or picketing necessarily involves compulsion and coercion, and unless the same is performed by acts of fraud or violence, is lawful and permissible under the statute.

"The act of picketing is a means of 'compulsion and coercion,' but if it is exercised in a legal manner and without fraud or violence, it is lawful under the statute, yet it is the clear intention of the ordinance to prevent such acts. The overt act of assembling and congregating for concerted action in a peaceable, lawful manner is made punishable by the ordinance. The ordinance is repugnant to the declared purpose and object of the statute."

I think the foregoing authorities clearly hold that to some extent moral, social and economic compulsion, coercion and intimidation inheres in every labor dispute where picketing and boycotting is resorted to by striking employees and their sympathizers, and that such compulsion, coercion and intimidation, so long as it is exercised without fraud, force or violence, does not transcend the realm of peaceful picketing, and cannot be proscribed by statute or ordinance. This conclusion is sustained by the trend of recent decisions, particularly those of the Supreme Court of the United States, which I have cited herein. The clear purport of these decisions is to the effect that any statute or ordinance which proscribes or prohibits peaceful picketing is in clear violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Of course, it is elementary that a person engaged in picketing is amenable to all of our penal statutes denouncing as crimes all acts of force, violence, menacing threats, riots, routs, disturbing of the peace, unlawful assembly, assault and battery, etc., and my attention has not been called to any acts which one engaged in picketing might perpetrate in violation of the civil rights of another, or inimical to public peace and safety, which are not now denounced as crimes by the penal statutes of this state and punishable as such.

The complaint against petitioners follows the language of the ordinance and the petitioners were charged as follows:

"That on or about the 9th day of July, 1939, and within the limits of the County of Yuba, in the State of California, said defendants did then and there wilfully and unlawfully beset and/or picket the premises and/or the approach thereto of another, to-wit, the Earl Fruit Company located approximately seven miles southwest of the City of Marysville, in the County of Yuba, State of California, and commonly known as the New England Ranch where persons were employed and/or sought employment, for the purpose of inducing such employees and/or persons seeking employment by means of compulsion, and/or coercion and/or intimidation and/or threats and/or acts of violence and/or to quit his or her employment and/or to refrain from seeking or freely entering into said employment."

It appears to be well settled that where a statute is so framed that lawful as well as unlawful acts may be punished under it, a complaint charging a violation of the law must specifically set out the alleged unlawful conduct of the accused, and negative lawful conduct on his part. Otherwise, a complaint under such a law fails to charge a public offense, which is the situation we have in the case at bar. Ex parte Peterson, 119 Cal. 578, 51 P. 859; Ex parte McLaughlin, 16 Cal.App. 270, 116 P. 684; In re Hernandez, 64 Cal.App. 71, 220 P. 423.

Tested by the rule announced in the foregoing authorities, the complaint in the case at bar was clearly insufficient to charge the petitioners with the commission of a public offense. As I have heretofore pointed out, the ordinance is clearly invalid in so far as it purports to denounce as a public offense picketing by means of compulsion, coercion, or intimidation as such words are defined in the authorities relating to picketing cases. Such being the case, the complaint against petitioners charges them with the doing of lawful as well as unlawful acts, and is therefore insufficient to charge a public offense and is insufficient to support a judgment of conviction against petitioners for a violation of section 3 of said ordinance.

Furthermore, the complaint in the case at bar charges both in the conjunctive and disjunctive the violation of every act denounced by section 3 of the ordinance. This method of pleading is clearly improper. It is impossible to determine from such a complaint what specific acts or conduct of the defendants the prosecution intends to prove for the purpose of establishing their guilt. Under the complaint in this case, the defendants could have been found guilty of a violation of section 3 of said ordinance if they did nothing more than stand on the side of the road peacefully holding a piece of cardboard in their hands containing a statement that a labor dispute was in progress on the adjacent premises. Such a complaint is clearly insufficient to charge a public offense, and may be tested on habeas corpus. Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 96 P. 804; In re Ah Sing, 156 Cal. 349, 104 P. 448.

The trial court made no attempt to segregate the charges in the complaint charging an alleged unlawful offense from those charging the commission of purely lawful acts. This is demonstrated not only by the allegations of the petition, but also by those of the return. Both allege that the jury found the defendants guilty "as charged in the complaint," and that the sentence imposed was imposed "on said conviction." I think it is clear that such a complaint could not authorize the trial court to try the accused for acts which are lawful, nor could it confer jurisdiction on the trial court to convict the accused for the doing of lawful acts, and to sentence them for the doing of such lawful acts. That is exactly what was done in the instant case. The defendants were found guilty "as charged in the complaint" and sentence was imposed "on said conviction." That means that the jury found that the defendants were guilty of all the "offenses" charged in the complaint, including those predicated upon those portions of the statute which are admittedly unconstitutional. It also means that the sentence was partially predicated on the unconstitutional portions of the statute. It certainly needs no citation of authority to establish the proposition that a trial court has no jurisdiction to enter a judgment convicting an accused of acts which are lawful. Petitioners have exhausted the only other remedy available to them, namely, an appeal. On that appeal the constitutionality of the statute was in issue, and the court to which the appeal was taken had jurisdiction to reverse the judgment of conviction and retry the case upon issues raised by a plea of not guilty of the unlawful act charged. Since this is so, habeas corpus is now the only remedy available to petitioners.

On a habeas corpus proceeding the only question involved is one of jurisdiction, namely, did the court below have the lawful authority to make or issue the particular order, judgment or process under attack. See the many cases from the United States Supreme Court, California Supreme Court and other state courts collected and commented on in 22 Am.Jur. 159, § 26; 13 Cal. Jur. 222, § 7. All courts are agreed on this point. While there is some confusion in the cases as to the meaning of the term "jurisdiction," as used in habeas corpus proceedings, the overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that the term includes more than the question as to whether the trial court had jurisdiction over the person and subject matter. It is now settled that jurisdiction over the person and subject matter is not alone conclusive, but that the jurisdiction of the court to make or render the order or judgment that serves as the basis of the imprisonment is a proper subject of inquiry. Stated another way, jurisdiction to render the particular order or judgment in question is deemed as essential as is jurisdiction of the person or subject matter. See cases collected and commented on in 22 Am.Jur. 161, § 27; 76 A.L.R. 469.

Moreover, it must be remembered that petitioners were convicted in an inferior court and not by a superior court. As to such courts, no presumption will be indulged as to the regularity of the proceedings therein. It has been consistently held that, as to justice's courts, nothing will be presumed in favor of their jurisdiction. Antilla v. Justice's Court, 209 Cal. 621, 290 P. 43, and numerous other authorities cited in the foot note to 6 Cal.Jur. 10 Yr. Supp. 611, § 85.

Even if it be conceded, as erroneously held in the majority opinions, that there is a presumption of regularity of the proceedings in a justice's court, there is no basis for the application of such a rule here, for the reason that it affirmatively and conclusively appears on the face of the record itself that petitioners were charged, convicted and sentenced for the commission of acts which both this court and the Supreme Court of the United States have held to be beyond the power of the state or its political subdivisions to proscribe.

Tested by these standards, and keeping in mind the fact that the convictions were here had in an inferior court, the judgment of conviction is subject to collateral attack on habeas corpus. The trial court, although it may have had jurisdiction of the person and subject matter, had no jurisdiction to convict and sentence the petitioners for offenses based wholly or in part on an unconstitutional statute. While it is true that habeas corpus will not always issue where other remedies are available, it is settled that habeas corpus properly may be used to test the constitutionality of a statute (see cases collected and commented on in 13 Cal.Jur. 225, § 8), and that the fact that a remedy by appeal may exist is not a complete bar to the proceeding. Certainly, where, as in this case, the petitioners appeal and raise the question of the constitutionality of the statute on such appeal, and, where the court to which the appeal is taken has complete jurisdiction to pass on the question, but, nevertheless affirms the invalid judgment, habeas corpus is available.

A writ of habeas corpus should therefore be granted and the petitioners discharged from custody.

WHITECHAT et al. v. GUYETTE.

L. A. 17813.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 6, 1942.

Rehearing Denied March 6, 1942.

1. Automobiles ⇐181(2)

Where a motorist picks up a hitchhiker, the pleasure derived by the motorist is not a benefit sufficient to be considered "compensation" within meaning of statute providing that no person who as a guest accepts a ride in any vehicle on a highway without giving compensation for such ride has right of action against the motorist for injuries, unless motorist was intoxicated or guilty of willful misconduct. Vehicle Code, § 403, St.1935, p. 154.

See Words and Phrases, Permanent Edition, for all other definitions of "Compensation".

2. Automobiles ⇐181(2)

The benefits of hospitality, companionship or good fellowship accruing to the owner or operator of an automobile as result of a simple pleasure trip are not "compensation" within meaning of statute providing that no person who as a guest accepts a ride in any vehicle without giving compensation for such ride, has right of action for injuries unless motorist was intoxicated or guilty of willful misconduct. Vehicle Code, § 403, St.1935, p. 154.

3. Automobiles ⇐181(2)

Even if there is something tangible in the way of contribution of money from occupant of automobile to motorist, a sharing of expenses or even full payment of gas and oil by occupant, on trip of purely social nature, there is not a benefit sufficient to be termed "compensation" within meaning of statute providing that no person who as a guest accepts a ride in a vehicle without giving compensation for such ride, has any right of action for injuries, unless resulting from intoxication or willful misconduct of the motorist. Vehicle Code, § 403, St.1935, p. 154.

4. Automobiles ⇐181(2)

If occupant of automobile and motorist are engaged in a business venture for their mutual advantage, and ride is an integral part of that business venture, then motorist is in receipt of benefits sufficient to be classified as "compensation" within meaning of statute providing that no person who as a guest accepts a ride in a vehicle without giving compensation for such ride has right of recovery for injuries unless they resulted from intoxication or willful misconduct of motorist, and the occupant becomes a "passenger" who may recover for injuries suffered as a result of the motorist's negligence. Vehicle Code, § 403, St.1935, p. 154.
